- On February 7, 2001, six correctional officers with the Arkansas Department of Corrections beat and repeatedly shocked two naked and handcuffed victims with a hand-held stun gun and cattle prod. During a separate incident, three of the six defendants shocked and beat another handcuffed inmate. Ultimately, five officers entered guilty pleas while the sixth was convicted at trial. They were sentenced to terms of incarceration ranging from 24 to 78 months under 18 U.S.C. § 242 for imposing cruel and unusual punishment under color of law. Between March 3, 2001 and August 21, 2001, another three correctional officers with the Arkansas Department of Corrections pled guilty to assaulting an inmate while his hands were handcuffed behind his back. They were later sentenced to terms of incarceration ranging from 8 to 18 months in prison under 18 U.S.C. § 242 for imposing cruel and unusual punishment under color of law;

- On January 23, 2001, a Florida Department of Corrections officer with the Metro Dade Jail was convicted of assaulting a female inmate resulting in multiple contusions to her face, back, and neck. He was sentenced to 17 months in prison under 18 U.S.C. § 242 for imposing cruel and unusual punishment under color of law;

- On November 9, 2000, a correctional officer captain from a state of Florida jail pled guilty to having forcible sexual contact with a female inmate and was thereafter sentenced to 15 months in prison. He was prosecuted under 18 U.S.C. § 242 for willful deprivation of the victim's liberty without due process under color of law;

- On November 2, 2000, seven federal correctional officers from the U.S. Penitentiary in Florence, Colorado, were indicted for systematically beating inmates and making false statements to cover-up their illegal conduct. On June 24, 2003, the jury convicted the three ringleaders on conspiracy and substantive counts. They were sentenced to 30 and 41 months in prison for, among other charges, the violation of 18 U.S.C. § 241 for conspiring to impose cruel and unusual punishment under color of law;

- On March 23, 2000, a U.S. Bureau of Prisons correctional officer in Oklahoma City was convicted of engaging in various degrees of sexual misconduct with five female inmates. As a result, he was sentenced to 146 months in prison under 18 U.S.C. § 242 for imposing cruel and unusual punishment under color of law;

- On February 15, 2000, a Mississippi chief of police was convicted of striking an arrestee several times in the head with a baton while the victim was handcuffed in the back of a patrol car. He was sentenced to 13 months in prison under 18 U.S.C. § 242 for a willful unreasonable seizure under color of law;

- On December 13, 1999, New York City Police Officer, Justin Volpe, was sentenced to thirty years in prison under 18 U.S.C. § 242, for brutally sodomizing Abner Louima in a New York City police station, while acting under the color of law. Five other officers were convicted of obstructing justice during the investigation of the assault of Louima and a second arrestee and three of the officers were incarcerated for sentences ranging from three to five years. The convictions of two of these officers were, however, reversed by the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, which found their conduct did not violate federal obstruction of justice law.

22. Criminal prosecutions of complaints of abuse at the state and local level. Additionally, prosecutions of abuse at the state and local level continue, some examples of which are cited below:

- In July 2004, a District of Columbia police officer was found guilty by a D.C. Superior Court jury of simple assault after shoving the barrel of his gun into the cheek of a man, following a confrontation at a gas station;

- On April 1, 2004, three Miami, Florida police officers were convicted on conspiracy charges after they took part in a scheme to plant guns near the bodies of two fleeing robbers shot to death by police. Sentences ranged from five to ten years;

- In 2002, a New York City, New York police officer was convicted of sodomy and reckless endangerment after forcing a 16-year old prostitute to engage in oral sex. The officer was sentenced to 7 years in prison;

- On November 1, 2000 the Appellate Court of Illinois upheld the decision by a municipal police board to dismiss a Chicago police officer for striking a detained suspect in the head and mouth.

23. Federal criminal prosecutions of violations of procedural rights. Complaints about failures to accord due process or "procedural rights" by individual law enforcement officers continue to be made to federal and state authorities. As described in the Initial Report, the Criminal Section of the Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division is charged with reviewing such complaints made to the Federal Government and ensuring the vigorous enforcement of the applicable federal criminal civil rights statutes. The Department of Justice is committed to investigating all allegations of willful violations of constitutional rights and to prosecute federal law violations should action by the local and state authorities fail to vindicate the federal interest. For example, as of January 1, 2005, the Civil Rights Division is conducting two separate ongoing investigations in two different states involving allegations that local police officers used threats of force to coerce information or a confession from an arrestee.

24. Civil Pattern or Practice Enforcement. As discussed in the Initial Report, the Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division may institute civil actions for equitable and declaratory relief pursuant to the Pattern or Practice of Police Misconduct provision of the Crime Bill of 1994, 42 U.S.C. § 14141 (Section 14141), which prohibits law enforcement agencies from engaging in a pattern or practice of violating people's civil rights. Since October 1999, the Civil Rights Division has negotiated 16 settlements with law enforcement agencies. These settlements include two consent decrees regarding the Detroit, Michigan Police Department, and consent decrees covering Prince George's County, Maryland and Los Angeles, California police departments. Other recent settlements include those entered into with police departments in the District of Columbia; Cincinnati, Ohio; Buffalo, New York; Villa Rica, Georgia; and Cleveland, Ohio. As of January 1, 2005, there are currently 13 ongoing investigations of law enforcement agencies.

25. The resolution of the Division's investigation of the Detroit Michigan Police Department illustrates the impact of the Division's law enforcement misconduct program. On June 12, 2003, the Division filed a complaint alleging a pattern or practice of conduct by Detroit officers subjecting individuals to uses of excessive force, false arrests, illegal detentions and unconstitutional conditions of confinement. On the same date, the Division and the City of Detroit filed two proposed consent decrees and a Joint Motion to Appoint a Monitor. The consent decrees require reform in the following areas: use of force, arrest and witness detention practices, and holding cell conditions. Both consent decrees enhance the Police Department's policies, as well as require the supervision, accountability, and training necessary to implement and sustain the policies.

26. CRIPA. The Civil Rights of Institutionalized Persons Act (CRIPA), 42 U.S.C. § 1997 et seq., which permits the Attorney General to bring civil lawsuits against state institutions regarding the civil rights of their residents, including the conditions of their confinement and use of excessive force, is another statute pursuant to which the Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division continues to prevent unlawful use of force. By August 2004, the Civil Rights Division had initiated CRIPA actions regarding approximately 400 facilities, resulting in approximately 120 consent decrees and settlements governing conditions in about 240 facilities, since CRIPA was enacted in 1980. CRIPA enforcement has been a major priority of the Division. Since October 1999, the Division has opened 52 new investigations covering 66 facilities. The Division has also entered into 39 settlement agreements including seven consent decrees. As of January 1, 2005, there are currently 59 active investigations covering 69 facilities.

27. Federal enforcement actions addressing prison conditions. As stated above, the Civil Rights Division investigates conditions in state prisons and local jail facilities pursuant to CRIPA, and investigates conditions in state and local juvenile detention facilities pursuant to either CRIPA or Section 14141. These statutes allow the Department of Justice to bring legal actions for declaratory or equitable relief for a pattern or practice of unconstitutional conditions of confinement. Some examples of these investigations follow:

- On July 16, 2004, the Civil Rights Division reached an out-of-court agreement with the Wicomico County Detention Center in Salisbury, Maryland regarding systematic violations of prisoners' federally protected civil rights. The Division's three-year investigation revealed evidence that the Detention Center failed to provide required medical and mental health care, failed to provide adequate inmate safety, and failed to provide sufficiently sanitary living conditions. Under the terms of the agreement, the Detention Center will address and correct the deficiencies identified by the Division;

- On June 7, 2004, the Civil Rights Division filed a lawsuit challenging the conditions of confinement at the Terrell County Jail in Dawson, Georgia. The Division's complaint alleges that the jail routinely violates federally protected rights, including failing to protect inmate safety, and failing to provide required medical and mental health care.

28. The Division has also recently issued letters reporting its findings regarding conditions at the McPherson and Grimes Correctional Units in Newport, Arkansas, the Garfield County Jail and County Work Center in Enid, Oklahoma, the Patrick County Jail in Virginia, and the Santa Fe Adult Detention Center in New Mexico.

29. Litigation of prison conditions in state courts. Additionally, inmates have been successful in challenging prison conditions in state courts as violations of state and federal law. Some examples follow:

- On April 29, 2003, the Supreme Court of Montana held that the Montana State Prison system violated the Montana Constitutional rights of inmates housed in filthy, uninhabitable prison cells. Inmates were forced to inhabit cells that contained blood, feces, vomit and other types of debris. The Montana Supreme Court held that such living conditions were an "affront to the inviolable right of human dignity." Walker v. State, 68 P.3d 872, 885 (Mont. 2003);

- On October 5, 2000, the Supreme Court of Arkansas found that the established constitutional right against cruel and unusual punishment included a prison inmate's right to be reasonably protected from attacks by other prisoners. Boyd v. Norris, No. 00-536, 2000 Ark. LEXIS 458, at *2 (Ark. Oct. 5, 2000).

Article 3 (Non-refoulement)

30. The United States continues to recognize its obligation not to "expel, return ('refouler') or extradite a person to another state where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture". The United States is aware of allegations that it has transferred individuals to third countries where they have been tortured. The United States does not transfer persons to countries where the United States believes it is "more likely than not" that they will be tortured.[5] This policy applies to all components of the United States government. The United States obtains assurances, as appropriate, from the foreign government to which a detainee is transferred that it will not torture the individual being transferred. If assurances were not considered sufficient when balanced against treatment concerns, the United States would not transfer the person to the control of that government unless the concerns were satisfactorily resolved. The procedures for evaluating torture concerns in the immigration removal and extradition context are described in greater detail below.

31. Creation of the Department of Homeland Security (DHS). Since the United States submitted the Initial Report and subsequent to the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, the United States Government restructured several agencies within the Executive Branch, creating the U.S. Department of Homeland Security (DHS). See Homeland Security Act of 2002,

Public Law 107-296, 116 Stat. 2310. As part of this restructuring, the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) was abolished and its functions were transferred from the U.S. Department of Justice to the new DHS. Pursuant to the Homeland Security Act, all authorities exercised by the Commissioner of the INS, on behalf of the Attorney General, were transferred to the Secretary of Homeland Security. The Executive Office for Immigration Review (EOIR), whose immigration judges preside over removal proceedings and adjudicate Torture Convention claims, remain within the Department of Justice. Immigration removal proceedings, and the adjudication of Torture Convention claims within those proceedings, remain unchanged since the Initial Report, but the functions described in that report as implemented by INS are now performed by DHS.[6]

32. Observance of Article 3 obligations in the immigration removal context. As discussed in the Initial Report, regulations implementing Article 3 of the Torture Convention permit aliens to raise Article 3 claims during the course of immigration removal proceedings. These regulations fully implement U.S. obligations under Article 3 and set forth a fair and rule-bound process for considering claims for protection. Individuals routinely assert Article 3 claims before immigration judges within the EOIR, whose decisions are subject to review by the Board of Immigration Appeals, and ultimately, to review in U.S. federal courts. In exceptional cases where an arriving alien is believed to be inadmissible on terrorism-related grounds, Congress has authorized alternate removal procedures in limited circumstances that do not require consideration or review by EOIR. See INA § 235(c). The implementing regulations provide that removal pursuant to section 235(c) of the Act shall not proceed "under circumstances that violate … Article 3 of the Convention Against Torture." See 8 C.F.R. 235.8(b)(4).

33. Article 3 protection is a more limited form of protection than that afforded to aliens granted asylum under the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA). This more limited form of protection is similar to withholding of removal, see INA§ 241(b)(3), through which the United States implements its non-refoulement obligations under the Refugee Protocol. An alien granted protection under the Torture Convention may be removed to a third country where there are no substantial grounds for believing that the alien will be subjected to torture. Furthermore, the regulations contain special streamlined provisions for terminating Article 3 protection for an alien who is subject to criminal and security-related bars, when substantial grounds for believing the alien would be tortured if removed to a particular country no longer exist. Finally, in a very small number of appropriate cases, pursuant to 8 C.F.R. § 208.18(c), the U.S. may consider diplomatic assurances from the country of proposed removal that the alien will not be tortured if removed there. In such removal cases, the Secretary of Homeland Security (and in cases arising prior to the enactment of the Homeland Security Act, the Attorney General), in consultation with the Department of State, would carefully assess such assurances to determine whether they are sufficiently reliable so as to allow the individual's removal consistent with Article 3 of the Torture Convention. The United States reserves the use of diplomatic assurances for a very small number of cases where it believes it can reasonably rely on such assurances that the individuals would not be tortured. Since the Initial Report, the United States has removed several individuals to their countries based on assurances that they would not be tortured. However, as is the case in the extradition context, the United States credits assurances and removes or extradites individuals only when it determines that it can remove or extradite a person consistent with its obligations under Article 3.

34. In practice, the record demonstrates that individuals seeking protection under Article 3 of the Torture Convention have asserted torture claims and in many cases have obtained protection under the regulations implementing the Convention. In the period from 1999, when the regulations implementing Article 3 of the Convention went into effect, through 2003, the available data indicates the following statistics regarding grants of protection by immigration judges based on the Torture Convention:[7]

	Grants of Torture Convention protection by immigration judges
FY 2000	519
FY 2001	554
FY 2002	546
FY 2004	532

35. However, these statistics do not convey the full extent to which U.S. law affords protection against return to individuals who "more likely than not" will be tortured upon their return. In light of the similarities between the harm feared by asylum and torture applicants, the same application form is used to request both forms of protection and most individuals who assert torture claims simultaneously assert asylum claims. In such cases, if an individual is eligible for asylum, the immigration judge may grant asylum and thus not reach the torture claim. Accordingly, the statistics on grants of torture protection cited above may reflect cases where individuals were deemed ineligible for a grant of asylum by virtue of the bars to such relief (e.g., individuals who committed serious crimes) under U.S. law and U.S. obligations under the 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees or because they failed to demonstrate that the persecution feared would be "on account" of one of the protected grounds specified in the definition of "refugee" set forth at § 101(a)(42) of the Immigration and Nationality Act. Therefore, for a more complete understanding of the extent to which protection against return is afforded to aliens, it is relevant to note the following available statistics on grants of asylum and withholding of removal:[8]

	Grants of asylum by DHS (former INS)	Grants of asylum by an immigration judge	Grants of withholding of removal by an immigration judge
FY 2001	20 290	7 956	3 463
FY 2002	18 880	8 663	3 544
FY 2003	11 434	10 913	4 417
FY 2004	10 278	10 825	4 723

36. As the United States implements Article 3, the contours of elements unique to Torture Convention claims, such as the meaning of "torture" and government "acquiescence," are taking shape in the United States through the development of interpretive case law. Since the Initial Report, there have been a number of precedent-setting decisions relating to Article 3 protection under the Torture Convention issued by the EOIR and by various federal district and circuit courts throughout the United States. Precedent administrative decisions by EOIR are available at http://www.usdoj.gov/eoir/vll/intdec/lib_indecitnet.html, and include:

- Matter of S-V-, 22 I&N Dec. 1306 (BIA 2000) (Applicant for Torture Convention protection must establish that the torture feared would be inflicted by or with the acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity; therefore, protection does not extend to persons who fear private entities that a government is unable to control);

- Matter of G-A-, 23 I&N Dec. 366 (BIA 2002) (An Iranian Christian of Armenian descent demonstrated eligibility for Torture Convention protection by establishing that it is more likely than not that he will be tortured if deported to Iran based on a combination of factors, including his religion, his ethnicity, the duration of his residence in the United States, and his drug-related convictions in this country. The evidence of record demonstrated that Armenian Christians were subject to harsh and discriminatory treatment in Iran, that persons associated with narcotics trafficking, like G-A, faced particularly severe punishment, and that Iranians who had spent an extensive amount of time in the United States were perceived to be opponents of the Iranian Government or even pro-American spies. The combination of these traits, and the evidence of widespread use of torture in Iran, demonstrated that the respondent was likely to be subjected to torture if deported to Iran);

- Matter of J-E-, 23 I&N Dec. 291 (BIA 2002) (For an act to constitute "torture" it must satisfy each of the following five elements in the definition of torture set forth at 8 C.F.R. § 208.18(a): (1) the act must cause severe physical or mental pain or suffering; (2) the act must be intentionally inflicted; (3) the act must be inflicted for a proscribed purpose; (4) the act must be inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official who has custody or physical control of the victim; and (5) the act cannot arise from lawful sanctions. Neither the indefinite detention of criminal deportees by Haitian authorities nor the substandard prison conditions in Haiti constitute torture within the meaning of 8 C.F.R. § 208.18(a) where there is no evidence that the authorities intentionally detain deportees or create and maintain conditions in order to inflict torture. Isolated instances of mistreatment that may rise to the level of torture as defined in the Torture Convention are insufficient to establish that it is more likely than not that the respondent will be tortured if returned to Haiti).

37. Relevant decisions by federal courts on Article 3 claims are issued daily and are too numerous to list in this report. Generally, precedent decisions are publicly available on the Internet. Attached in Annex 6 is a sampling of federal court decisions on Article 3 claims.

38. The United States remains committed to providing Article 3 protection to all aliens in its territory who require such protection, and recognizes that there are no categories of aliens who are excluded from protection under Article 3. As such, some aliens who are subject to criminal- or security-related grounds and are thus ineligible for other immigration benefits or protection may be eligible for protection under Article 3. As described in paragraph 171 of the Initial Report, the United States provides a more limited form of protection - "deferral of removal" - to aliens otherwise subject to exclusion grounds. At the time the Initial Report was submitted, implementing regulations authorized continued detention of aliens granted deferral of removal. In 2001, the Supreme Court held in Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678 (2001), discussed also in paragraph 132, that existing statutory authority under INA § 241(a)(6) to detain aliens with final orders of removal is generally limited to such detention as necessary to achieve removal in the reasonably foreseeable future. While the Zadvydas decision limits the authority of the Department of Homeland Security to detain certain aliens granted deferral of removal, DHS remains committed to ensuring the proper balance between United States obligations under the Torture Convention and DHS's mission to improve the security of the United States.

39. Observance of Article 3 obligations in the extradition context. As described in the Initial Report, in U.S. practice, an extradition judge's decision whether to certify extraditability is not dependent upon consideration of any humanitarian claims, including claims under the Torture Convention. After the Secretary of State receives a certification of extraditability from a magistrate or judge, the Secretary of State must determine whether a fugitive who has been found extraditable should actually be extradited to a requesting State. In determining whether a fugitive should be extradited, the Secretary of State is authorized to consider de novo any and all issues properly raised before the extradition court, as well as any other considerations for or against surrender, including whether it is more likely than not that the fugitive would face torture in the requesting State.

40. Pursuant to Department of State regulations set forth in the Initial Report, whenever allegations relating to torture are raised by the fugitive or other interested parties, appropriate policy and legal offices within the Department of State review and analyze information relevant to a particular case. Information provided by the relevant regional bureau, country desk, or U.S. embassy also plays an important role in the evaluation of torture claims. Based on the analysis of relevant information, the Secretary of State may decide to surrender the fugitive to the requesting State, deny surrender of the fugitive, or condition the extradition on the requesting State's provision of assurances, deemed to be credible by the Secretary of State, related to torture or aspects of the requesting State's criminal justice system that protect against mistreatment, such as regular access to counsel. Whether such assurances are sought is determined on a case-by-case basis, fully bearing in mind U.S. obligations under Article 3 of the Torture Convention.

41. The Secretary of State will evaluate claims for protection under Article 3 of the Torture Convention after judicial extradition proceedings have been completed. This position is based on the longstanding "rule of non-inquiry," which leaves to the consideration of the Secretary of State questions regarding the treatment extraditees may receive following their surrender for extradition. In U.S. practice, the Secretary of State is uniquely well-suited to determine the risks that a fugitive would be subject to torture upon his return to a requesting state. In appropriate cases, it may be necessary for the Secretary of State to decide against surrender or to obtain assurances as necessary from the foreign government to persuade the Secretary of State that the United States would be acting in compliance with Article 3 of the Convention.

42. The issue of whether federal courts in the United States can consider an extradition fugitive's claims under the Torture Convention was litigated in Cornejo-Barreto v. Seifert. A panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit concluded that a fugitive facing extradition has a statutory right to judicial review of his claims under the Torture Convention, which attaches not during the extradition or habeas corpus proceedings, but after all the legal avenues are exhausted and the Secretary of State has signed the surrender warrant. *Cornejo-Barreto v. Seifer*t, 218 F.3d 1004 (9th Cir. 2000). A different panel of the Ninth Circuit subsequently rejected this conclusion and, in agreement with the position of the Executive Branch, held that the Secretary of State's determination to extradite a fugitive is not subject to judicial review. Cornejo-Barreto v. Seifert, 379 F.3d 1075, 1089 (9th Cir. 2004). A majority of the Ninth Circuit judges voted to rehear the case en banc, but prior to the date of the rehearing, the Mexican government withdrew its extradition request pursuant to the dismissal of the Mexican state prosecution that served as the basis for the request. Upon motion of the government, the Ninth Circuit then dismissed the case as moot and vacated the second panel decision. Cornejo-Barreto v. Seifert, 839 F.3d 1307 (9th Cir. 2004). In Mironescu v. Costner, 345 F.Supp. 2d 538 (M.D.N.C. 2004) a district court recently held that a petitioner could not seek habeas review, asserting a CAT Article 3 claim, when the Secretary of State had not yet determined whether to extradite the petitioner, but concluded that it was inappropriate, given the stage of the proceedings, to decide whether the petitioner could seek habeas review after the Secretary has made a determination to extradite.

43. Since enactment of the Department of State regulations, torture claims have been raised in less than 1% of extradition cases and surrender warrants have been issued in all cases. In some of those cases, it was determined that the evidence submitted by the claimants provided no basis to conclude that it would be more likely than not that the claimants would be tortured. In several cases, assurances, which were deemed adequate, were received from the requesting country.

Article 4 (Torture as a criminal offense)

44. As discussed in the Initial Report and as restated in paragraph 16 above, within the United States, acts which would constitute torture under the Convention are punishable under state or federal law. This is also true of attempts to commit torture, conspiracies to commit torture and those who aid and abet the commission of an act of torture. Acts of torture committed outside the United States, as defined by the extraterritorial criminal torture statute, codified at 18 U.S.C. § 2340, in which the alleged offender is a national of the United States, or the alleged offender is present in the United States (irrespective of the nationality of the victim or alleged offender), are punishable under 18 U.S.C. § 2340A. The same prohibitions apply to persons who attempt to commit, conspire to commit, or aid and abet the commission of acts of torture within the definition contained in 18 U.S.C. § 2340.

Article 5 (Jurisdiction)

45. Since the submission of the Initial Report, two pieces of legislation, described below, were enacted that provide additional but distinct statutory bases for asserting jurisdiction over acts committed beyond the territory of the United States in addition to those discussed at paragraph 185 of the Initial Report. In addition to the extraterritorial criminal torture statute, which establishes extra-territorial jurisdiction over certain offenses involving torture, the statutes discussed below extend criminal jurisdiction over an array of offenses, which may include torture, when committed within the "Special Maritime and Territorial Jurisdiction of the United States" (SMTJ). See 18 U.S.C. § 7. As discussed in the Initial Report, certain provisions of the federal criminal code apply to acts taking place outside United States geographical territory, but which fall within the SMTJ.

46. On November 22, 2000, the President signed into law the "Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act (MEJA)," codified at 18. U.S.C. §§ 3261 et seq. This statute extends criminal jurisdiction over certain categories of individuals for conduct outside the United States that would constitute an offense punishable by imprisonment for more than 1 year if the conduct had been engaged in within the SMTJ. As reflected in House Report No. 106-778(I) which was adopted by the House Judiciary Committee when it considered the statute, the background and purpose of the statute was to amend federal law to extend the application of its criminal jurisdiction to persons, including civilians, both United States citizens and foreign nationals, who commit acts while employed by or otherwise accompanying the U.S. Armed Forces outside the United States. It also extends federal jurisdiction to active duty members of the Armed Forces who commit acts while outside the United States, with one or more other defendants, at least one of whom is not subject to the UCMJ. See 18 USC 3261(d)(2). It also extends federal jurisdiction to former members of the Armed Forces who commit such acts while they were members of the Armed Forces, but who are not tried for those crimes by military authorities and later cease to be subject to the Uniform Code of Military Justice. Because many federal crimes, such as sexual assault, arson, robbery, larceny, embezzlement, and fraud, did not have extraterritorial effect, there was a "jurisdictional gap" that in many cases allowed such crimes to go unpunished. Although host nations have jurisdiction to prosecute such acts committed within their territory, they frequently declined to exercise jurisdiction when an American was the victim or when the crime involved only property owned by Americans. Accordingly, the statute was designed to close this gap by establishing a new federal crime involving conduct that would constitute an offense punishable by imprisonment for more than 1 year if the conduct had been engaged in within the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the U.S. As of January 1, 2005, there have been two prosecutions under MEJA, neither involving torture.

47. An additional legislative development that extended U.S. criminal jurisdiction extraterritorially was enacted on October 26, 2001, when the USA PATRIOT Act amended § 7 of Title 18 of the United States Code, which defines the Special Maritime and Territorial Jurisdiction (SMTJ) of the United States. In pertinent part, a new paragraph 9 added to § 7 provides that, with respect to an offense that would otherwise apply within the SMTJ, committed by or against a national of the United States, premises of United States military or other United States Government missions or entities in foreign States are within the SMTJ. This paragraph, however, does not apply with respect to an offense committed by a person described in section 3261(a) of Title 18, United States Code, which codifies a provision of the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act described above.[9]

48. The MEJA and SMTJ statutes each provide separate bases for asserting U.S. jurisdiction over extraterritorial crimes. Each statute was designed to address a different problem: MEJA was designed primarily to address the jurisdictional gap over civilians employed by, or accompanying, the armed forces overseas other than in times of a declared war; the expanded SMTJ in 18 U.S.C. §7(9), contained in the USA PATRIOT Act, was enacted as part of a comprehensive program to deal with the Global War on Terrorism. While neither statute was specifically designed to address torture, both statutes in fact complement the separate jurisdictional reach of the extraterritorial criminal torture statute. This is because, depending on the status of the offender or the victim, or the location of the offense, the U.S. may be able to assert jurisdiction over other crimes, which are related to torture, but may not meet the statutory elements of 18 U.S.C. §§ 2340 and 2340A, i.e. murder. It became apparent in 2004, however, that there was an unintended legislative anomaly to the enactment of 18 U.S.C. §7(9).

49. By expanding the territory within the SMTJ to include premises of United States military or other United States Government missions or entities in foreign States, the SMTJ statute had the effect of narrowing the reach of the extraterritorial criminal torture statute. The statute, by definition, only applies "outside the United States." The term "United States" was originally defined as including "all areas under the jurisdiction of the United States including any of the places described in sections 5 and 7 of this title [Title 18 of the U.S. Code, § 7 of which defines the Special Maritime and Territorial Jurisdiction of the United States] and section 46501(2) of title 49." Thus, when the USA PATRIOT Act expanded the SMTJ, the extraterritorial criminal torture statute no longer applied to areas included in the expanded SMTJ. This anomaly was corrected by § 1089 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2005 (NDAA05), which amended 18 U.S.C. §2340(3) to read as follows: "'United States' means the several States of the United States, the District of Columbia, and the commonwealths, territories, and possessions of the United States." By narrowing the definition of the United States, and making that definition part of the extraterritorial criminal torture statute, the reach of that statute is expanded prospectively, and the anomaly presented by the expansion of the SMTJ is now avoided. It also became apparent in 2004, that the MEJA statute did not cover situations involving contractors, unless they were employed by the Department of Defense. In October 2004, §1088 of the NDAA05 amended MEJA so that it covered a much broader group of contractors. 18 U.S.C. §3267's definition of the term "employed by the Armed Forces outside the United States" in MEJA was amended to include "employees, contractors and subcontractors" of "any other Federal agency or any provisional authority, to the extent such employment relates to supporting the mission of the Department of Defense overseas."

50. The extraterritorial criminal torture statute. As discussed above in paragraph 12, the USA PATRIOT Act amended the extraterritorial criminal torture statute, codified at 18 U.S.C. §§ 2340, 2340A, to also provide extraterritorial jurisdiction over conspiracy to commit such offenses. As of January 1, 2005, the United States has considered applying the statute in several cases, but it has not initiated any prosecutions under this provision to date. In some cases, investigations are pending. As is necessarily true of any successful criminal prosecution, the available evidence must establish the various elements of the offense.

Accordingly, in order for the extraterritorial criminal torture statute to apply, the conduct must fall within the definition of torture, it must have been committed subsequent to the effective date of the statute (November 20, 1994), and it must have been committed "outside the United States."

51. The extraterritorial criminal torture statute is available to prosecute U.S. and foreign nationals "acting under the color of law," provided that the enumerated elements of the offense are met. As a result of initial investigations in some cases, although criminal charges have not been brought under the extraterritorial criminal statute, immigration charges have resulted. Also, as discussed above, U.S. employees and contractors may also be subject to other criminal statutes governing their conduct extraterritorially, which apply in a broader range of circumstances than those described in the extraterritorial criminal torture statute. For example, depending on the circumstances, U.S. employees and contractors may be subject to those criminal statutes defining crimes within the SMTJ, which as discussed above in paragraph 47, generally includes overseas facilities (except for certain persons, such as members of the armed forces and those employed by or accompanying them, who are subject to MEJA or the United States Code of Military Justice). Those statutes defining crimes within the SMTJ prohibit, for example, assault (18 U.S.C. § 113), maiming (18 U.S.C. § 114), manslaughter (18 U.S.C. § 1112), and murder (18 U.S.C. § 1111).

52. In the context of U.S. detention operations overseas, these criminal prohibitions may be available to prosecute abuses of detainees by particular members of the military (as noted, members of the military are also subject to the Uniform Code of Military Justice), intelligence and other non-military personnel. For example, on June 17, 2004, the Department of Justice announced that a contractor working for the Central Intelligence Agency had been indicted on charges stemming from the death of a prisoner in Afghanistan, Mr. Abdul Wali. The four-count indictment alleges that in June 2003 the contractor beat an Afghan prisoner who had surrendered voluntarily at the front of a U.S. detention facility near Asadabad in the northeast Kunar province of Afghanistan. The indictment includes two counts of assault causing serious injury and two counts of assault with a deadly weapon. Each count carries a maximum penalty of ten years in prison and a $250,000 fine upon conviction. The indictment charges that the assaults occurred within the expanded SMTJ provided by 18 U.S.C. §7(9).

Article 6 (Detention and preliminary inquiry in cases of extradition) and Article 7 (Extradite or prosecute)

53. As described in the Initial Report, federal law and bilateral extradition treaties provide the legal basis by which the United States can either extradite or prosecute individuals alleged to have committed offenses involving torture, as required by Article 7 of the Convention. Acts which would constitute or involve the offense of torture, as defined under the Convention, and as interpreted by the understandings expressed by the United States at the time of ratification, are crimes under state or federal law, and subject to prosecution by the appropriate authorities. The crime of torture also continues to fall within the scope of extradition treaties concluded by the United States since the time of its Initial Report.

Article 8 (Extraditable offenses)

54. Consistent with Article 8 of the Convention, any act of torture within the meaning of the Convention continues to be an extraditable offense under relevant United States law and extradition treaties with countries that are also party to the Convention. The crime of torture continues to fall within the scope of extradition treaties concluded by the United States since the time of its Initial Report.

55. Since the Initial Report, the United States has received a small number of requests for extradition involving individuals wanted for serious human rights abuses or war crimes. Since October 1999, the United States extradited Elizaphan Ntakirutimana to the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, which had requested his extradition for genocide, complicity in genocide, and crimes against humanity.

Article 9 (Mutual legal assistance)

56. As discussed in the Initial Report, United States law permits both law enforcement authorities and the courts to request and to provide many forms of "mutual legal assistance" in criminal cases covered by the provisions of the Torture Convention.

Article 10 (Education and Information)

57. As described in the Initial Report, a variety of training programs exist at the federal, state and local level to educate law enforcement personnel, corrections officers and immigration officials in the proper treatment of persons in custody, including information related to the prohibition against torture and other abuses. Training programs for the U.S. Armed Forces, particularly regarding the prohibition of torture and other standards governing detentions by the U.S. Armed Forces in Afghanistan, Guantanamo Bay, and Iraq are described in greater detail in Annex 1.

58. The United States continues to attach considerable importance to the task of providing education and information regarding the prohibition against torture and other abuses to persons who may be involved in the custody, interrogation, and treatment of persons arrested, detained or imprisoned. In furtherance of this effort, and as was the case with the Initial Report, this report will be posted on the U.S. Department of State web site: http://www.state.gov/g/drl.

59. As part of a broader effort to educate and inform the public, on June 26, 2004 honoring the U.N. International Day in Support of Victims of Torture, President Bush reaffirmed the U.S. commitment to ending torture and stated that the U.S. "stands against and will not tolerate torture." See Annex 2. In so doing, the President informed the public and the international community of U.S. programs aimed at combating torture and assisting victims of torture. President Bush issued a similar statement in honor of victims of torture on June 26, 2003, which can be found at http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2003/06/20030626-3.html, and the Department of State has also issued similar statements. Additionally, as allegations of abuses have surfaced with respect to detentions of foreign nationals by the U.S. Armed Forces

(see Annex 1), U.S. officials have repeatedly condemned the use of torture. At the same time, the U.S. Congress, advocacy groups, and the press have directed considerable attention to these issues.

Article 11 (Interrogation techniques)

60. As described in the Initial Report, police interrogation of criminal suspects is strictly regulated by court-made rules based on constitutional law. As a result, the methods and practices of interrogation of criminal suspects and their treatment while in custody are routinely subject to judicial review and revision.

61. Concerns have been raised about what detention and interrogation practices were authorized on the basis of the memorandum drafted by the Department of Justice's Office of Legal Counsel in August 2002 interpreting the extraterritorial criminal torture statute (discussed at paragraph 13). On June 22, 2004, upon the release of numerous government documents related to interrogation techniques and U.S. laws regarding torture, then White House Counsel Alberto Gonzales stated the following:

> "The administration has made clear before and I will reemphasize today that the President has not authorized, ordered or directed in any way any activity that would transgress the standards of the torture conventions or the torture statute, or other applicable laws. [L]et me say that the U.S. will treat people in our custody in accordance with all U.S. obligations including federal statutes, the U.S. Constitution and our treaty obligations. The President has said we do not condone or commit torture. Anyone engaged in conduct that constitutes torture will be held accountable."[10]

62. Interrogation techniques employed by U.S. government personnel and contractors have been reviewed in light of the revised Department of Justice Office of Legal Counsel memorandum of December 30, 2004. See Annex 1.

Article 12 (Prompt and impartial investigation)

63. As noted in the Initial Report, as a matter of law, policy and practice, the competent authorities at all levels of Government and in all components of the U.S. government should proceed with a thorough, prompt and impartial investigation whenever they have reason to believe that an act of torture or other abuse has been committed within their jurisdiction. The discussion under Article 2 above demonstrates the commitment of the law enforcement mechanisms in the United States to investigate and rigorously prosecute such abuses in cases within their respective spheres of jurisdiction. Depending on the circumstances, and as noted in the discussion referred to above, this may include prosecutions of misconduct that may arise at the federal, state, county or local law enforcement levels.

Article 13 (Right to complain)

64. As indicated in the Initial Report, individuals who allege that they have been subject to torture or other forms of mistreatment have numerous opportunities to bring complaints and to have their cases promptly and impartially examined by competent authorities.

65. Legislation on Victims' Rights. On October 30, 2004, President Bush signed H.R. 5107, known as the Justice for All Act of 2004. [Pub. L. 108-405] Title I of that Act amends the Federal criminal code to grant victims specified rights, including: (1) the right to be protected from the accused, to be heard at any public proceeding involving release, plea, or sentencing, and to be treated with fairness and respect; (2) the right to timely notice of any public proceeding involving the crime or any release or escape of the accused and to proceedings free from unreasonable delay; (3) the right to confer with the Government attorney; and (4) the right to full and timely restitution. It also authorizes grants to help states implement and enforce their own victims' rights laws. Other provisions of the law relate to the expanded and improved use of DNA evidence in the criminal justice system.

66. Victims' Assistance Programs. The Office for Victims of Crime (OVC) within the U.S. Department of Justice administers programs authorized by the Victims of Crime Act of 1984, as amended, in addition to the Crime Victims Fund (the Fund), which is also authorized by the same statute. The Fund is composed of criminal fines and penalties, special assessments, and bond forfeitures collected from convicted federal perpetrators, as well as gifts and donations received from the general public. Money deposited in this fund is used to support a wide range of activities on behalf of crime victims, including victim compensation and assistance services, demonstration programs, training and technical assistance, program evaluation and replication, and programs to assist victims of terrorism and mass violence.

67. OVC administers two major formula grant programs: Victim Assistance and Victim Compensation. During the past decade, these two grant programs have greatly improved the accessibility and quality of services for federal and state crime victims nationwide.

68. Victim Assistance. Each year, all 50 states, the District of Columbia and various U.S. territories are awarded OVC funds to support community-based organizations that serve crime victims. Approximately 6,400 grants are made to domestic violence shelters, rape crisis centers, child abuse programs, and victim service units in law enforcement agencies, prosecutors' offices, hospitals, and social service agencies. These programs provide services including crisis intervention, counseling, emergency shelter, criminal justice advocacy and emergency transportation. States and territories are required to give priority to programs serving victims of domestic violence, sexual assault, and child abuse. Additional funds must be set aside for underserved victims, such as survivors of homicide victims and victims of drunk drivers.

69. Victim Compensation. All 50 states, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico and Guam have established compensation programs for crime victims. These programs reimburse victims for crime-related expenses such as medical costs, mental health counseling, funeral and burial costs, and lost wages or loss of support. Compensation is paid only when other financial resources, such as private insurance and offender restitution, do not cover the loss. Some expenses are not covered by most compensation programs, including theft, damage, and property loss. Although each state compensation program is administered independently, most programs have similar eligibility requirements and offer comparable benefits.

70. Congress has twice re-authorized the Torture Victims Relief Act (TVRA) [P.L. 105-320], since its initial enactment in 1998. Most recently, the TVRA Reauthorization Act of 2003 [P.L. 108-179], which authorized further increases in funding, was signed by the President on December 15, 2003. The Act authorizes funding for the U.S Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) to support treatment centers inside the U.S. and for programs for the treatment of victims of torture abroad. The Act also authorizes funding for the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID) to support centers in foreign countries and programs for the treatment of victims of torture. Finally, as a result of the Act's authorizations of appropriations to the United Nations Voluntary Fund for Victims of Torture, the United States continues to lead the world in its support of the United Nations Voluntary Fund For Victims of Torture. Appropriations to the Fund, distributed through the Department of State, were:

Fiscal Year	Amount
1999	$3 million
2000	$5 million
2001	$5 million
2002	$5 million
2003	$5 million
2004	$5.5 million

71. Domestic Assistance to Victims of Torture. Since the late-1990's the National Institute of Mental Health of the National Institutes of Health within the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services has funded research for survivors of torture and related trauma. HHS, in coordination with other Departments and Congress, has reached out to representatives from the human rights, refugee, and medical communities to discuss treatment for torture survivors.

72. The Office of Refugee Resettlement (ORR) within the Agency for Children and Families (ACF) of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) awards funds to assist survivors of torture. In fiscal year (FY) 2000, the first year of this program, Congress appropriated $7.5 million for services and rehabilitation for survivors of torture. From FY 2001 through 2004, Congress has appropriated $10 million each year to HHS, which has supported 25 torture treatment programs in fifteen states.

73. The activities funded by ORR include the following: training refugee resettlement staff, English language teachers, volunteers and community services staff to identify torture survivors and refer them to the services they need; orienting refugees to the help available from mental health services; and orienting mental health professionals to serve refugees effectively across language and cultural barriers.

74. ORR works with a network of non-profit organizations around the country whose mission is to serve the needs of torture survivors. The services needed by survivors of torture are a combination of medical care, spiritual healing, psychological help and other social and legal services. The Center for Victims of Torture (CVT) in Minneapolis, Minnesota provides technical assistance to these organizations. CVT has assisted centers in building data management systems to manage clients, aided in the development of fundraising, and trained professionals in the particulars in treating members of this population. Other examples of projects funded under this program include: the Arab Community Center for Economic and Social Services in Dearborn, Michigan, which operates a career counseling and training center to assist survivors identify career options; Community Mental Health Services in Falls Church, Virginia, which has a transitional housing program to provide housing for survivors for up to six months; and Solace/Safe Horizon, which provides survivors with culturally and linguistically appropriate mental health services.

75. Foreign Assistance to Victims of Torture. In keeping with its legislative mandate under the Torture Victims Relief Act of 1998 and its subsequent reauthorizations, the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID) works through the Victims of Torture Fund (VTF) to assist the treatment and rehabilitation of individuals who suffer from the physical and psychological effects of torture. According to the International Rehabilitation Council for Torture Victims (IRCT), rehabilitation aims to empower the torture victim to regain the capacity, confidence, and ability to resume as full a life as possible. In FY 2000, Congress appropriated $7,500,000 to USAID for assistance to survivors of torture. For FY 2001 and 2002, Congress appropriated $10,000,000 in each year. The appropriation levels for FY 2003 and 2004 were $7,950,000 each year.

76. Toward this end, the Fund administers treatment programs based in 26 countries that span four regions (Latin America and the Caribbean, Africa, Asia and the Near East, and Europe and Eurasia). Currently, VTF is supporting treatment programs that attend to the medical, psychological, and social needs of torture survivors and their families. In addition to treatment services, some programs include advocacy, training, technical assistance, and research.

77. To complement the work that the Fund supports in the particular countries, the Fund also supports a global initiative through support for the Center for Victims of Torture (CVT) to strengthen the capacity of 15 treatment centers located in Africa, Asia, the Near East, Latin America, and Eastern Europe and to enhance their organizational and financial sustainability, clinical capacity and services, and advocacy campaigns.

78. Additionally, the Fund supports several regional initiatives. In Latin America and the Caribbean, the Fund supports the Inter-American Institute for Human Rights (IIHR) and the Center for Justice and International Law (CEJIL) and their collaborative work to provide psychological support for victims or relatives bringing claims of torture and cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment before the Inter-American system of human rights. In Southern Africa, the Fund works through the Inter-African Network for Human Rights and Development (Afronet), a host organization for the Southern Africa Human Rights NGO Network (SAHRINGON), to strengthen the capacity of selected human rights nongovernmental organizations in the region to monitor, document, and advocate against torture and violence. In West Africa, the Fund supports the International Rescue Committee (IRC), the CVT, and Search for Common Ground (SFCG) in their program collaborating with national and sub-regional social organizations and employing a cross-border approach to facilitate the return and rehabilitation of refugees and to improve access to information.

Article 14 (Right of redress and/or compensation)

79. As described in the Initial Report, the legal system of the United States provides a variety of mechanisms through which persons subjected to torture or other abuse may seek redress, which are consistent with the obligations assumed by the United States upon ratification of the Convention.

80. Civil actions in state and federal courts. Individuals continue to file civil suits in state and federal courts seeking redress against officials for allegedly violating their rights, which may involve seeking monetary damages or equitable or declaratory relief. One of the most common methods by which prisoners seek redress against state and municipal officials is by means of a civil law suit for violations of fundamental rights pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Some examples of such civil litigation follow:

- On February 20, 2003, the city of Oakland, CA agreed to a $10.9 million settlement with dozens of plaintiffs in federal court who said they were victimized by four Oakland police officers, infamously known as the "Riders." Allegations included excessive use of force, planting of evidence, and assault and battery. In addition to the monetary settlement, the Oakland Police Department was compelled to make systemic changes to bolster the accountability of the department;

- On September 26, 2002, the Court of Appeals of Arizona upheld the decision of a trial court jury that handed down a judgment against a local sheriff in an incident where an inmate in the county jail brutally attacked another inmate. The incident gave rise to a civil rights claim for damages under § 1983. The sheriff was found by the jury to have demonstrated deliberate indifference to inmate safety. The jury awarded, and the appellate court affirmed the award of compensatory and punitive damages;

- On April 5, 2002, a federal jury awarded a NY woman nearly $1.7 million in punitive and compensatory damages in a § 1983 civil rights suit after being victimized by the excessive force of a NY police officer;

- In June 2001, the city of Asbury Park, NJ agreed to a $5 million settlement with the family of a man who hung himself while in custody of the police. The police failed to notice the man committing suicide, despite video surveillance of his holding cell, until such a late point that he was left in a permanent vegetative state. The suit was settled just prior to June 11, 2001, the scheduled start date for the trial;

- In 2001, the District of Columbia spent over $3 million to settle allegations of police and prison guard brutality. Nearly $2 million was spent to settle 45 prisoner abuse cases that included inmate-on-inmate violence and beatings by prison guards. The remaining money was used to settle 48 allegations of police brutality and false arrest.

81. Alien Tort Statute. As discussed in the Initial Report, the Alien Tort Statute (ATS), which was enacted in 1789 and is currently codified at 28 U.S.C. § 1350, provides that "[the] district courts shall have original jurisdiction in any civil action by an alien for a tort only, committed in violation of the law of nations or a treaty of the United States." The United States Supreme Court recently had occasion to consider the ATS in Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, 124 S.Ct. 2739 (2004). While adopting a restrictive interpretation of the range of civil actions that could be brought under this statute consistent with the intent of the legislators who originally enacted it, the Court left open the possibility that federal courts may recognize as a matter of federal common law claims for damages based on alleged violations of the law of nations.

82. Torture Victims Protection Act (TVPA). As described in the Initial Report, the 1992 Torture Victims Protection Act allows both foreign nationals and United States citizens to claim damages against any individual who engages in torture or extrajudicial killing under "actual or apparent authority, or under color of law of any foreign nation." It allows suits for redress for torture or extrajudicial killings perpetrated by officials of foreign governments. In July 2002, following a four week trial of a suit brought under the TVPA, a federal jury in the Southern District of Florida in West Palm Beach returned a verdict of $54.6 million against two Salvadoran generals for their responsibility for the torture of three Salvadorans in the early 1980s. Romagoza Arce v. Garcia, No. 99-8364 CIV-Hurley (S.D. Fla. Feb 17, 2000). The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit subsequently reversed this decision on the grounds that the claims were time-barred by the statute of limitations. Romagoza Arce v. Garcia, No. 02-14427 (11th Cir. 2005).

83. Treatment and rehabilitation. As noted in the Initial Report, the United States continues to hold the view that in addition to monetary compensation, States should take steps to make available other forms of remedial benefits to victims of torture, including medical and psychiatric treatment as well as social and legal services. For examples of the U.S. commitment to such programs, see paragraphs 66-78.

84. The United States continues to be a haven for victims of persecution in foreign lands, including torture victims. Various private facilities exist in the United States for the treatment of individuals who suffered torture abroad. The CVT in Minneapolis, Minnesota, established in 1985, is the nation's pre-eminent comprehensive torture treatment center. Other facilities exist in the following locations: Hotevilla, Arizona; Phoenix, Arizona; Los Angeles, California; San Diego, California; San Francisco, California; San Jose, California; Denver, Colorado; Clearwater, Florida; Chicago, Illinois; Baltimore, Maryland; Dearborn, Michigan; Lincoln, Nebraska; New York, New York; Columbus, Ohio; Portland, Oregon; Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; and Falls Church, Virginia.

Article 15 (Coerced statements)

85. United States law continues to provide strict rules regarding the exclusion of coerced statements and the inadmissibility of illegally obtained evidence in criminal trials.

86. Also, some states have taken steps recently to further protect the rights of the accused. In 2003, Illinois passed a crime law that requires police to videotape or audiotape questioning of suspects in homicide cases for the entirety of the interview. The reform measure joins Illinois with Alaska and Minnesota as the leading states to require such tapings.

Article 16 (Other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment)

87. As the President of the United States explained on the United Nations International Day in Support of Victims of Torture, in addition to its commitment to investigating and prosecuting all acts of torture, the United States will "undertake to prevent other cruel and unusual punishment in all territory under our jurisdiction." See Annex 2.

88. In the United States a robust legal and policy framework operates to give effect to U.S. obligations under Article 16 of the Torture Convention. Article 16 requires that States parties act to "prevent in any territory under its jurisdiction other acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment which do not amount to torture as defined in Article 1, when such acts are committed by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity." The particular undertakings of Article 16 are those specified in Articles 10-13, "with the substitution for references to torture of references to other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment." As we did in the Initial Report, we note the reservation to Article 16 included by the United States in its instrument of ratification: "That the United States considers itself bound by the obligation under Article 16 to prevent 'cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment,' only insofar as the term 'cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment' means the cruel, unusual, and inhumane treatment or punishment prohibited by the Fifth, Eighth, and/or Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States." As described in the Initial Report, federal and state law provide extensive protections against conduct that may amount to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

89. The Initial Report addressed a number of specific issues of concern where law enforcement authorities acted in a manner inconsistent with the legal framework described above. Many of the shortcomings described in the Initial Report continue to arise in particular instances. At the same time, however, U.S. law continues to provide effective mechanisms at the federal and state level to address such abuses and to prevent their recurrence.

90. As we noted earlier in paragraph 18, although the examples cited below in the discussion under Article 16, like other examples cited throughout the report, do not necessarily involve acts of torture as defined under Article 1 of the Convention, as ratified by the United States, or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment as defined under Article 16 of the Convention, as ratified by the United States, they are included to illustrate the commitment of the United States, or as the case may be, the sub-Federal level authorities in the United States, to prevent and prosecute serious abuses, whether or not they fall within these definitions of torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

91. Police brutality. Efforts continue to be made to punish and prevent police brutality. Indeed, the discussion in paragraph 21 above that includes an illustrative list of prosecutions of law enforcement officers who employed unlawful force illustrates both the continuing problems that arise in this area as well as the resolve of the United States to take action to both punish the perpetrators of such abuses and to prevent their recurrence. As discussed in the Initial Report, and as evidenced by the discussion above, certain excessive use of force by law enforcement officers violates the United States Constitution and federal law, as well as the law of the state where the incident occurs. United States law, at both the federal and state level, continues to provide victims of such abuses several methods for seeking compensation and rehabilitation as well as grounds for punishing those who have used excessive force.

92. Conditions of Confinement. U.S. law enforcement authorities continue to work to improve conditions of confinement in detention facilities within the United States. In fact, the discussion in paragraph 27 above provides an illustration of such problems, as well as the mechanisms employed by the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice to challenge conditions of confinement in various prisons and other remedies available under federal and state law. United States law, at both the federal and state level, continues to provide inmates themselves with several methods to challenge conditions of confinement. Indeed, it is common practice in prisons and jails throughout the United States for inmates to challenge conditions of confinement in federal and state courts as evidenced by the numerous district and appellate court decisions handed down every year in federal reporters (collections of federal case decisions), and as further exemplified by the discussion under paragraph 27 above. Additionally, various non-governmental organizations continue to employ advocacy and litigation to draw attention to sub-standard conditions in the nation's prisons. For example, as a result of a class-action lawsuit over conditions for prisoners in a county jail in Washington State filed by the ACLU's National Prison Project in February 2002, a U.S. District Court approved a settlement agreement in January 2004 to improve conditions for inmates in the jail.

93. As indicated in the Initial Report, the United States Constitution, along with federal and state laws, establishes standards of care to which all inmates are entitled. The Federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) meets its constitutional and statutory mandates by confining inmates in prisons and community-based facilities that are safe, humane, and appropriately secure, and that provide opportunities and programs to help inmates develop the personal and work-related skills they will need to maintain a crime-free lifestyle after release.

94. The BOP strives to ensure that all inmates in its custody are treated fairly and with dignity. The agency does not tolerate abuse of inmates, and takes all allegations of staff misconduct and the mistreatment of inmates very seriously. Every allegation is investigated vigorously and thoroughly. If warranted, offending staff are referred for prosecution.

95. Supermaximum security prisons. For certain violent inmates, supermaximum security ("supermax") facilities may be necessary, for among other reasons, to protect the safety of the community at large and of other members of the prison population. As discussed in the preceding paragraphs, U.S. law requires that prisons throughout the United States satisfy U.S. constitutional requirements. When they fail to do so, a variety of remedies are available, as described under Article 2 above. For example, in March 2003, the ACLU and others settled a lawsuit brought against Wisconsin's Department of Corrections regarding conditions at its supermax prison in Boscobel, Wisconsin. The settlement agreement included a ban on seriously mentally ill prisoners being housed in the facility; a modest improvement to exercise provision and rehabilitation programs; and a reduction in the use of restraints and electro-shock control devices.

96. Sexual abuse of prisoners. Law enforcement authorities in the United States continue to prevent and punish acts of sexual abuse committed against prisoners. Illustrative of the problem of sexual abuse in correctional facilities are the facts animating United States v. Arizona and United States v. Michigan, both filed in 1997 and dismissed in 1999 and 2000, respectively, subject to a settlement whereby state prisons agreed to make significant changes in conditions of confinement for female inmates. In these cases, brought pursuant to CRIPA, described above, the Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division sought to remedy a pattern or practice of sexual misconduct against female inmates by male staff, including sexual contact and unconstitutional invasions of privacy.

97. Enhancing the protections already in place under U.S. law, the Prison Rape Elimination Act of 2003 (PREA) [Pub. L. 108-79] was enacted by Congress to address the problem of sexual assault of persons in the custody of U.S. correctional agencies. The Act applies to all public and private institutions that house adult or juvenile offenders and is also relevant to community-based agencies. On September 4, 2003, President George W. Bush signed PREA into law. The purpose of the Act is to: (a) establish a zero-tolerance standard for the incidence of rape in prisons in the United States; (b) make the prevention of prison rape a top priority in each prison system; (c) develop and implement national standards for the detection, prevention, reduction, and punishment of prison rape; (d) increase the available data and information on the incidence of prison rape, consequently improving the management and administration of correctional facilities; (e) standardize the definitions used for collecting data on the incidence of prison rape; (f) increase the accountability of prison officials who fail to detect, prevent, reduce, and punish prison rape; (g) protect the Eighth Amendment rights of federal, state, and local prisoners; (h) increase the efficiency and effectiveness of federal expenditures through grant programs such as those dealing with health care, mental health care, disease prevention, crime prevention, investigation, and prosecution, prison construction, maintenance, and operation, race relations, poverty, unemployment, and homelessness; and (i) reduce the costs that prison rape imposes on interstate commerce.

98. Additionally, the Director of the Bureau of Prisons has repeatedly affirmed, both to BOP staff and the public, the agency's zero tolerance standard for sexual abuse of inmates. The agency is committed to developing systemic approaches to prevent and control sexual abuse in prisons. As part of this initiative, in 1997 the BOP issued a policy on sexual abuse and sexual assault prevention and intervention programs. Program Statement 5324.04, Sexual Abuse/Assault Prevention Programs, updated December 31, 1997, addresses (1) prevention of sexual assaults on inmates, (2) the safety and treatment needs of inmates who have been sexually assaulted, and (3) discipline and prosecution of those who sexually assault inmates. The policy requires that all staff receive training annually to recognize the physical, behavioral, and emotional signs of sexual assault, understand the identification and referral process when a sexual assault occurs, and have a basic understanding of sexual assault prevention and response techniques.

99. BOP staff receive training annually on this topic. BOP staff members know that inmates must report inappropriate conduct by staff and that inmates will be safeguarded against any reprisals by staff or inmates. BOP staff members also know that if they become aware of sexual activity occurring between staff and inmates, they must report such conduct or be subject to disciplinary action. In addition, all federal inmates receive a pamphlet about sexual abuse; and, during orientation to the institution, inmates are taught that it is illegal for a staff member to have sexual contact with an inmate, how they should report such contact, and what process they will go through once a report is made.

100. The BOP takes seriously all allegations of sexual misconduct and refers such matters to appropriate investigative agencies. Allegations of mistreatment of prisoners are ordinarily investigated by the Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division or the Office of Inspector General. Some examples follow:

- On November 25, 2003, the Division reported its findings of its investigation of the McPherson Correctional facility in Newport, Arkansas. The Division found that serious problems existed at the McPherson facility with regard to sexual misconduct. The Division noted lapses in supervision of staff and inmates, privacy violations, and substandard investigations;

- On March 6, 2003, the Division reported its findings regarding the Santa Fe County Adult Detention Center in which the Division recommended that the Detention Center make more concerted efforts to guide and train staff, avoid leaving female inmates isolated and vulnerable, and improve the system of reporting and investigating allegations of sexual misconduct.

101. Examples of prosecutions of law enforcement officers for abusing female detainees and inmates by the U.S. Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division include the following examples:

- On September 24, 2003, a North Carolina state police officer pleaded guilty to a felony civil rights charge for coercing women, whom he stopped or arrested, into having sex with him. He was sentenced to ten years in prison;

- On November 9, 2000, a correctional officer captain from a jail in Florida pled guilty to having forcible sexual contact with a female inmate and was sentenced to 15 months in prison;

- On March 23, 2000 a U.S. Bureau of Prisons correctional officer in Oklahoma City was convicted of engaging in various degrees of sexual misconduct with five female inmates. He was sentenced to 146 months in prison;

- January 23, 2001 a Florida Department of Corrections officer with the Metro Dade Jail was convicted of assaulting a female inmate resulting in multiple contusions to her face, back and neck. He was sentenced to 17 months in prison.

102. Restraint devices. The use of restraint and electro-shock devices continues to form the basis of allegations of abuse by law enforcement officers. Advocacy groups have directed considerable attention to publicizing such allegations and taking legal action to remedy alleged abuses. According to a 2002 Amnesty International report, between 2000 and 2002, at least four inmates died in the United States after being subdued in a restraint chair. In February 2001, the American Civil Liberty Union's National Prison Project and the Connecticut branch of the ACLU filed a lawsuit against the Connecticut Department of Corrections alleging that Connecticut prisoners held in a Virginia state prison, Wallens Ridge State Prison, were being subjected to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the U.S. Constitution, by being placed in mechanical restraints for prolonged periods for minor offenses.

103. At the federal level, whether inmates are in the custody of the Federal Bureau of Prisons, or the U.S. Marshals Service (USMS), the use of restraint devices, including electro-shock devices, is permissible, subject to imposition in a manner consistent with the applicable policies and procedures. As described in greater detail below, such devices are sparingly used, if at all, and only as a last resort.

104. In federal prisons, the BOP's Program Statement 5566.05, Use of Force and Application of Restraints on Inmates, updated December 31, 1996, applies. It outlines specific procedures and protocols for the use of force and restraints. The BOP authorizes staff to use force only as a last alternative after all other reasonable efforts to resolve a situation have failed. Staff are authorized to use only the amount of force necessary to gain control of the inmate; to protect and ensure the safety of inmates, staff, and others; to prevent serious property damage; to enforce institution regulations; to prevent a crime or to apprehend someone who is believed to have committed a crime; and to ensure the security and good order of the institution. Staff may immediately use force if it is determined through sound correctional judgment that an inmate's behavior constitutes an immediate, serious threat to the safety of another individual, or to the security of the institution and its property. Staff may use force in an immediate (rather than calculated) fashion if it is determined through sound correctional judgment that an inmate's behavior constitutes an immediate, serious threat to the safety of another individual, or to the security of the institution and its property.

105. Staff are authorized to apply physical restraints to gain control of an inmate who appears to be dangerous because the inmate is assaulting another individual, destroying government property, attempting suicide, inflicting injury upon himself or herself, or displaying signs of imminent violence. Four-point restraints can be used when the warden has determined that this method is the only means available to maintain control of an inmate. The BOP uses soft four-point restraints unless soft restraints have been previously proven ineffective on the inmate. The BOP's use of restraint chairs is intended only for short-term use, such as transporting an inmate on or off of an airplane. The BOP policy outlines procedures that call for the guidance of health care personnel in the application of restraints and for qualified staff to regularly check the restraints and the inmate's medical condition.

106. The BOP routinely removes inmates from secure institutions, typically for medical treatment, inmate transfers, and court appearances. The safety of citizens and staff, as well as the security of inmates, is paramount during these moves. Some of these escorted trips involve high-risk inmates who require full physical restraints. To increase security and reduce the risk to the community in these instances, "stun belts" have been adopted for agency use, but only for Maximum custody inmates who require greater security than can be afforded through conventional restraints. To date the BOP has not activated the stun belt on an inmate.

107. The stun belt is a defensive device. Only trained, qualified staff members at the supervisory level are authorized to apply and activate a stun belt during an escorted trip. When activated, it produces a medically tested, less than lethal electrical charge of 50,000 volts, which temporarily immobilizes the inmate without causing permanent injury, allowing staff to regain immediate control of the situation. The stun belt has been determined to be essentially harmless to individuals in good health. The BOP medical staff have reviewed the stun belt and concluded the technology is medically safe for use on the great majority of the BOP's inmate population. The exceptions are: 1) pregnant female inmates, 2) inmates with heart disease, 3) inmates with multiple sclerosis, 4) inmates with muscular dystrophy, and 5) inmates who are epileptic. As part of pre-escort screening, inmates identified as having these conditions are prohibited from wearing the belt.

108. When federal pretrial detainees are remanded to the custody of the U.S. Marshals Service, USMS policies and procedures regarding restraints apply. However, the USMS does not operate any facilities that house pretrial detainees. Rather, the USMS contracts with state, local, and private jails throughout the United States to house and care for federal pretrial detainees. Although the daily safekeeping and care of federal pretrial detainees is the responsibility of these jails, the jails must nonetheless undergo regular USMS inspections under the standards promulgated by the U.S. Department of Justice and the American Correctional Association.

109. Stun belts are also used for courtroom security purposes to control potentially violent defendants. The stun belt is placed underneath the clothing of the individual, on the individual's waist, and is activated by remote control.

110. The USMS has distributed approximately 200 stun belts to district offices across the country, principally for use on high-risk federal prisoners in courtrooms. The use of stun belts is strictly regulated pursuant to USMS policy and procedures, including application and activation guidelines and reporting procedures. Any deputy who is authorized to employ the device must successfully complete a four-hour basic certification program, including a written and practical examination, ensuring that he/she is competent in the proper use of the belt. Stun belts are placed on federal prisoners in court only with the court's approval and are not utilized where a prisoner's medical condition would pose a danger with its application. In fact, the actual practice of the USMS reveals that stun belts have been sparingly activated. The USMS reports that there have been two instances in which USMS staff have intentionally activated the device. In both instances they were deployed in courtroom settings and the detainee suffered no injuries in either case. In addition, current FAA regulations have not approved the use of stun belts on board aircraft.

111. The USMS believes that, although resort to activation of stun belts is infrequent in U.S. courts, stun belts are a proper, safe, legal and effective part of the USMS overall courtroom security program. In instances in which USMS personnel must physically control a prisoner, this device, if activated, would allow USMS personnel to restrain the prisoner in a manner that presents less of a physical danger to U.S. personnel and others requiring protection from the accused. Alternatively, USMS personnel must either choose to strike a violent defendant with an expandable baton or with a hand/foot technique. Chemical/pepper spray is another option.

However, the use of such spray in the courtroom poses substantial difficulties in the cross contamination of other parties such as the judge and jurors, as well as a higher probability of physical injury to the prisoner and the USMS personnel. Finally, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit recently upheld the constitutionality of placing a stun belt on a defendant for security purposes in the courtroom. Hawkins v. Comparet, 251 F.3d 1230, 1240-42 (9th Cir. 2001). In that decision, the court recognized the effectiveness of the stun belt to ensure courtroom security without prejudicing a defendant's right to a fair trial. See also United States v. Joseph, 333 F.3d 587, 590-591 (5th Cir. 2003), cert. denied, 124 S.Ct. 446 2003).

112. At the state level, while the use of electro-shock devices continues in many state courts and prisons, some state courts have taken steps to curtail the application of such devices. In 2001, the Supreme Court of Indiana banned the use of stun belts on defendants in court. Wrinkles v. State, 749 N.E. 2d 1179, 1194 (Ind. 2001).

113. More recently, other states have also limited the use of stun belts. In 2002, the California Supreme Court ruled that the use of a stun belt requires a showing, on the record, of a manifest need for such restraints, supported by evidence of "violence or a threat of violence or other nonconforming conduct" by the defendant. People v. Mar, 52 P.3d 95, 104-5 (Cal. 2002). Illinois courts have begun taking steps to limit the use of stun belts during state trials. In 2004, the Appellate Court ruled that the use of stun belts must be held to the same stringent requirements as those for other physical restraints, and that failure to do so constituted a violation of the defendant's due process rights. People v. Martinez, 808 N.E.2d 1089 (Ill.App.Ct. 2004).

114. Detention of juveniles. The Department of Justice continues to make it a priority to investigate and remedy unlawful conditions in juvenile justice facilities across America. Between October 1, 1999 and January 1, 2005, the Civil Rights Division authorized 16 investigations covering 26 juvenile justice facilities, issued eight findings letters - letters detailing patterns or practices of civil rights violations and minimum remedial measures to remedy the violations - regarding conditions in 17 juvenile justice facilities, and entered 11 settlement agreements involving 26 facilities. In fiscal year 2004, the Civil Rights Division authorized five investigations of five facilities; issued three findings letters regarding conditions at six facilities; filed one lawsuit involving two facilities; and entered three consent decrees or agreements regarding four facilities.

115. The Civil Rights Division's investigations of juvenile facilities have revealed that, in various locations throughout the country, there are facilities that contravene the constitutional and/or statutory rights of the resident inmates. In December 2003, the Division sued Mississippi over the conditions of confinement at the Oakley Training School in Raymond, Mississippi and the Columbia Training School in Columbia, Mississippi. The Division's investigation found evidence of numerous abusive practices, including hogtying, pole-shackling, and placing suicidal students for extended periods of time into a "dark room," naked, with only a hole in the floor for a toilet. Children who became ill during strenuous physical exercise were made to eat their vomit. As of January 1, 2005, the Civil Rights Division remains in litigation with the State of Mississippi.

116. Although practice varies within prisons at the state level, in federal prisons, juveniles are not regularly held in prison with the regular prison population. Federal law prohibits juvenile offenders held in custody of federal authorities from being placed in correctional institutions or detention facilities in which they could have regular contact with adult offenders. See 18 U.S.C. § 5039.

117. Care and Placement of Unaccompanied Alien Children. In March 2003, § 462 of the Homeland Security Act of 2002 transferred functions under U.S. immigration laws regarding the care and placement of unaccompanied alien children (UACs) from the Commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service to the Office of Refugee Resettlement (ORR) within the Administration for Children and Families (ACF) at the Department of Health and Human Services.

118. Responsibilities of ORR under the law include: making and implementing placement determinations and policies, identifying sufficient qualified placements to house UACs, ensuring that the interests of the child are considered in decisions related to the care and custody of UACs, reuniting UAC with guardians and/or sponsors, overseeing the infrastructure and personnel of UAC facilities, conducting investigations and inspections of facilities housing UACs, collecting and comparing statistical information on UACs, and compiling lists of qualified entities to provide legal representation for UACs.

119. The UAC Program has accomplished a great deal since its inception within ORR. The program has made great strides in improving overall services within facilities, including enhanced clinical and mental health services. The program has also been faced with a dramatic increase in the number of apprehended juveniles due to increased Department of Homeland Security border initiatives. As a result, the program has added over 300 shelter/foster care beds to accommodate the influx, marking a significant achievement for this program. This was accomplished without reliance on secure detention facilities. In fact, since March 2003 the program has dramatically reduced its reliance on secure detention by ensuring that only those with a severe criminal background are placed in a secure juvenile facility. Children are never mixed with an adult population, since the current facilities under contract are licensed to serve only juvenile populations. Currently, less than 2 percent of the total UAC population is in a secure environment. Finally, all facilities are required to ensure an appropriate level of care in terms of education, counseling, recreation and mental health services.

120. Abuse of the institutionalized. Between October 1 1999 and January 1, 2005, pursuant to CRIPA, described above in paragraph 26, the Civil Rights Division authorized 5 investigations covering 8 facilities housing persons with mental illness, 6 investigations covering 6 facilities housing persons with developmental disabilities, and 10 investigations covering 10 nursing homes. During that period, the Civil Rights Division entered into four settlement agreements concerning three facilities housing persons with mental illness, 10 settlement agreements concerning 17 facilities housing persons with developmental disabilities, and 3 settlements concerning 3 nursing homes. During that period, pursuant to CRIPA, the Civil Rights Division issued findings letters regarding conditions in 7 facilities for persons with mental illness, 5 facilities for persons with developmental disabilities, and 11 nursing homes. Some examples of these investigations follow:

- On January 12, 2004, the U.S. Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division and the State of Louisiana filed a complaint and consent decree in United States v. Louisiana (M.D. La.) regarding the Hammond and Pinecrest Developmental Centers. The action resolved an investigation into allegations of a pattern or practice of violations at the two facilities. Pinecrest and Hammond are the two largest state-owned and operated residential facilities in Louisiana serving persons with developmental disabilities. Staff at one of the facilities have been arrested for abuse such as kicking a resident, dragging him to his room, placing a blanket over his head, and hitting him. At the other facility, staff had left residents alone for long periods of time and when the residents were eventually found, they were found in appalling and unclean conditions. The Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division and the State of Louisiana entered into a consent decree in which the State agreed to remedy the alleged constitutional deficiencies;

- On February 17, 2004, the Civil Rights Division filed a complaint and a consent decree in United States v. Breathitt County, Kentucky (E.D. Ky.) regarding Nim Henson Geriatric Center, a case concerning unconstitutional conditions at the county nursing home, including the use of inappropriate medications for an elderly population, unnecessary medical interventions such as feeding tubes, and residents with untreated bed sores. For example, during the Division's investigation, the Division found that in many instances, residents' medical records contained no clinical justification for their medications, and frequently certain medications appeared to be prescribed inappropriately. Often, powerful psychotropic medications were administered to patients based solely on nurses' observations that they were "agitated," and a high number of Nim Henson residents displayed symptoms consistent with many of the harmful side effects of harmful medication use, particularly muscular rigidity, swallowing difficulties, restricted speech and movement, and mental confusion. The consent decree contains remedial measures addressing these and all of the Division's other findings of unconstitutional conditions at Nim Henson;

- In October 2001, the Civil Rights Division obtained the first court-ordered comprehensive community service plan for persons with developmental disabilities after President Bush signed the New Freedom Initiative (a domestic initiative to help Americans with disabilities by increasing access to assistive technologies, expanding educational opportunities, increasing the ability of Americans with disabilities to integrate into the workforce, and promoting increased access into daily community life). In 1997, the Division investigated all six of the residential facilities for persons with developmental disabilities operated by the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. The Division found dire conditions at the institutions such as no running water, broken toilets, showers and sinks, as well as medication and food shortages. Many residents were found in filthy conditions and suffered serious injuries such as black eyes, deep cuts to the head, bruises, and significant weight loss. The Division responded quickly, filing suit and securing a series of agreements to remedy deficient conditions. The Division reached agreement on a comprehensive community-based service plan whereby the Commonwealth would create a community system to serve the residents with developmental disabilities in the most integrated setting. As a result, the Commonwealth closed its deficient institutions and created a good community system. Virtually all of the residents who had been institutionalized in dire conditions now live in clean, safe homes staffed by caring and involved staff. The Division has conducted several monitoring tours of community placements and programs. Most recently, the Commonwealth committed to increasing its mental health care for former residents of institutions now living in the community.

121. Prisoners on chain gangs. Chain gangs are employed by a minority of states, where their use has sparked controversy. However, the use of chain gangs is not per se unconstitutional.

122. The Bureau of Prisons does not employ chain gangs. While only a minority of states and some local jurisdictions employ chain gang work crews, one county in Arizona has attracted particular attention for its approach. Maricopa County, Arizona operates four chain gangs, two for adult males, one for females, and one for juveniles. Common duty for chain gang members is to bury indigent members of the community. In the past, federal authorities have in some instances taken measures to regulate state authorities who have employed chain gangs.

123. Some states have stopped using chain gangs for a variety of reasons, including safety concerns for inmates. Although Alabama was the first state to resurrect the practice in 1995, it ended its chain gangs only two years later. Inmate safety was a significant factor behind Alabama's decision after a guard shot an inmate who attacked a fellow prisoner while they were chained together and the victim could not escape. Also, in 2002, the Alabama Supreme Court ruled that prison guards could be held liable for injuries suffered by a prisoner while on a chain gang.

124. One of the issues involved in the investigations by the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice into two Alabama prisons involved use of the "hitching post." The Department of Justice concluded that Alabama's systematic use of the hitching post constituted improper corporal punishment. Later, in Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730 (2002), the Supreme Court agreed with the petitioner and the United States (which participated as a "friend of the court") that the use of the "hitching post" was, under the alleged circumstances, an unconstitutional practice. In that case, a hitching post referred to a metal bar located outdoors to which inmates were attached by means of mechanical restraints. The Court held that it is unconstitutional for prison officials to, with deliberate indifference to the health or safety of inmates, expose inmates to the "unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain." Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 737 (2002) (internal quotation marks omitted).

125. Adult aliens in immigration custody. The Department of Homeland Security continues to address allegations that arise about the treatment of aliens held in immigration detention. Within the Department of Homeland Security, the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), Office of Detention and Removal Operations (DRO) detains approximately 19,000 aliens in Service Processing Centers, Contract Detention Facilities and local facilities through Inter-governmental Service Agreements (IGSA). ICE regularly meets at both the national and local levels with various non-governmental organizations (NGOs) (such as the American Immigration Lawyers Association, the American Bar Association, Catholic Charities, Las Americas) to address such allegations. A national NGO working group meets in Washington, D.C. at ICE Headquarters. ICE also regularly meets with consular officials to address allegations of mistreatment.

126. In a particularly noteworthy development since the Initial Report, in November 2000, the former Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) promulgated the National Detention Standards (NDS). These 36 standards were the result of negotiations between the American Bar Association, the Department of Justice, the INS and other organizations involved in pro bono representation and advocacy for immigration detainees. The NDS provides policy and procedures for detention operations. Previously, policies governing detention operations were not consolidated in one location, but were instead sent to field officers via periodic memoranda containing guidance and policy statements. As a result, local differences among INS detention offices were possible.

127. The NDS are comprehensive, encompassing areas from legal access to religious and medical services, marriage requests to recreation. The four legal access standards concern visitation, access to legal materials, telephone access, and group presentations on legal rights. In July 2003, the 37th standard was introduced for Staff-Detainee Communication, which is discussed further at paragraph 137. Effective March 2003, the Office of Detention and Removal Operations became a division of ICE within the Department of Homeland Security. Effective September 2004, the Detainee Transfer standard was added. The 38 NDS can be accessed by the public and other interested parties via the Internet at http://www.ice.gov/graphics/dro/opsmanual/index.htm.

128. ICE is committed to ensuring that the conditions of confinement for aliens detained pursuant to ICE authority meet or exceed the National Detention Standards. These standards are based on current ICE detention policies, Bureau of Prisons' Program Statements and the widely accepted American Correctional Association Standards for Adult Local Detention Facilities, but are tailored to serve the unique needs of ICE detainees. All ICE facilities are required to comply with such standards. Additionally, wherever possible, ICE works with private contract facilities and state, local and federal government agencies which are holding aliens under Intergovernmental Service Agreements to ensure that non-ICE facilities comply with ICE's detention standards.

129. On January 24, 2002, DRO completed and implemented the Detention Management Control Program (DMCP) to operational components at all levels. The DMCP replaced the outdated INS Jail Inspection Program. The purpose of the DMCP is to prescribe policies, standards, and procedures for ICE detention operations and to ensure detention facilities are operated in a safe, secure and humane condition for both detainees and staff. The DMCP consists of a series of events designed to ensure that reviews/inspections of detention facilities are conducted in a uniform manner.

130. All Service Processing Centers, Contract Detention Facilities, and Intergovernmental Service Agreements are reviewed annually using procedures and guidance as outlined in DMCP. During FY 2003, a cumulative total of 8 Special Assessments were conducted as a result of reported significant incidents, reported deficiencies, at-risk detention reviews or significant media event. Some examples follow:

- A special assessment was prompted at a facility in Oklahoma following an escape. Health, welfare and safety issues were identified during the assessment. Corrective actions taken by ICE included the removal of all ICE detainees from the facility and the termination of the agreement;

- Following an escape of a detainee, a special assessment was conducted at a facility used in Washington. The population was ordered reduced due to health, welfare and safety issues. Monthly site visits were instituted until the facility became compliant with the contract and applicable standards. The contractor removed the Warden and Assistant Warden;

- After allegations of assault on a detainee by staff at a parish jail in Louisiana, a special assessment was conducted. The officer was arrested and prosecuted by the Parish District Attorney, other staff were terminated, and disciplinary action initiated. No further action by ICE was required.

131. ICE concluded capacity studies for its Service Processing Centers (SPCs) in 2003. These studies were conducted by an independent agency. They determined the proper population levels at each facility based on operational, design, and emergency capacity parameters. Pursuant to completion of these studies, ICE issued policy directives mandating facility compliance with assessed appropriate population levels.

132. Another noteworthy development since the Initial Report affecting the rights of aliens is the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678 (2001), which established, as a matter of statutory interpretation, certain limitations upon the government's ability to detain aliens. In Zadvydas, discussed above at paragraph 38, the Supreme Court construed INA § 241(a)(6), 8 U.S.C. § 1231(a)(6), the statute authorizing immigration detention of aliens after the issuance of a final order of removal, to require that an alien who "has effected entry into the United States" and been ordered removed may only be detained for a period reasonably necessary to remove the alien. The Court held that detention for six months after a final removal order is entered is presumptively reasonable. After six months, however, detention may not be reasonable absent evidence that removal is likely to occur in the reasonably foreseeable future or evidence that "special circumstances," such as a national security threat or an alien's dangerousness, may warrant continued detention. District and appellate courts have also held that where the alien has created the delay in removal, the alien's continued detention does not violate the statute. In light of this ruling, the regulations governing detentions of aliens were revised. Specifically, 8 C.F.R. § 241.4 was revised in November 2001 to provide post-order custody review procedures for inadmissible and deportable criminal and other aliens in detention whose prompt removal is delayed or impracticable because their own governments have not agreed to their return. To implement the standards established in Zadvydas, an additional provision was promulgated. Section 241.13 of Title 8 of the C.F.R. establishes procedures to determine whether there is a significant likelihood that an alien who has effected an entry into the U.S. will be removed in the reasonably foreseeable future.

133. Finally, in January 2005 in Clark v. Martinez, 125 S.Ct. 716 (2005), the Supreme Court of the United States held that the construction of 8 U.S.C. § 1231(a)(6), which the Court announced in Zadvydas (discussed above), applies to aliens "ordered removed who are inadmissible under § 1182" of Title 8 of the United States Code, which sets forth the general classes of aliens ineligible to receive visas and ineligible for admission to the United States. Thus, the Court held that such aliens may be detained only as long as "reasonably necessary" to remove them from the United States and that the six-month presumptive detention period prescribed in Zadvydas applies to such aliens. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the detention of Sergio Suarez Martinez and Daniel Benitez, both Mariel Cubans who have been ordered removed and who are inadmissible under § 1182, was subject to the limitations articulated in Zadvydas.[11]

134. Immigration detentions connected with September 11 investigations. In response to the attacks against the United States on September 11, 2001, the United States initiated an investigation to identify any accomplices to the terrorists who committed the September 11 attacks and to prevent a future attack. Department of Justice officials from numerous components, including employees of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), the former Immigration and Naturalization Service, the United States Marshals Service, the Bureau of Prisons, the Criminal Division, and many United States Attorney's Offices, along with officials at the state level, worked tirelessly to do everything within their legal authority to protect against another terrorist attack. As a result of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's (FBI) investigation, known as "PENTTBOM" (Pentagon Twin Towers Bombing), 762 aliens were detained on immigration charges after the attacks.

135. During the course of these detentions and in their aftermath, individual detainees, their families and human rights and immigrant rights groups asserted a broad range of allegations of abuses resulting from the investigations and detentions. These assertions included that individuals did not receive prompt notice of the charges on which they were being held, that they were deprived of procedural protections, that the immigration proceedings were closed to the public, and in some cases, that detainees were physically abused. Several lawsuits have been filed. At least one has been settled, while others are still pending.

136. On June 2, 2003, the U.S. Department of Justice Office of the Inspector General (OIG) issued a report entitled "The September 11 Detainees: A Review of the Treatment of Aliens Held on Immigration Charges in Connection with the Investigation of the September 11 Attacks." The report is available at http://www.usdoj.gov/oig/special/0306/full.pdf. The OIG undertook this investigation pursuant to its responsibilities under the Inspector General Act and pursuant to its responsibilities under the USA PATRIOT Act, section 1001 of which requires the OIG to designate an official to review information and receive complaints alleging abuses of civil rights and civil liberties by employees and officials of the Department of Justice. The report described DOJ's response to the attacks, including the PENTTBOM investigation. The OIG's report focused on the 762 aliens who were detained on immigration charges after the attacks. The report examined all aspects of the detainees' treatment, from the serving of the charging document to the policies governing the conditions of the detainees' confinement during their detention. Some of the detainees were held in Bureau of Prisons facilities, while others were held at INS detention centers or in state or local facilities under contract with INS. The report described the manner in which the BOP classified the detainees - initially putting them under its witness security group - and the problems this created for those who attempted to communicate with them. The report made 21 recommendations to address the issues identified in the DOJ OIG review. The recommendations covered a broad range of issues, including, inter alia, the adoption of clearer and more objective criteria to govern arrests, the development of more effective means of coordination and communication between the various law enforcement agencies involved in such investigations, and the need for new standards governing conditions of detention.

137. Both the Department of Justice and the Department of Homeland Security have responded to the various recommendations identified by the Department of Justice's OIG. The respective responses of the agencies, as well as the analyses of such reports by the Department of Justice's OIG, are available at: www.usdoj.gov/oig/special/0306/analysis.htm and http://www.usdoj.gov/oig/special/0401/index.htm. As evidenced by their responses to the OIG's report, in some cases the respective Departments adopted new policies, such as the adoption by the Department of Homeland Security's Immigration and Custom Enforcement (ICE) of a new detention standard on Staff-Detainee Communication. The central goal of this new standard is to ensure that ICE personnel monitor detention conditions and promptly address concerns that arise. The standard also includes specific timeframes during which officers must respond to certain enumerated detainee requests.

138. On December 18, 2003, DOJ's Office of Inspector General issued a supplemental report entitled "Supplemental Report on September 11 Detainees' Allegations of Abuse at the Metropolitan Detention Center (MDC) in Brooklyn, New York." This report is available at http://www.usdoj.gov/oig/special/0312/final.pdf. The report described the investigation conducted by the OIG concerning allegations that staff members of the Federal Bureau of Prisons' Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn, New York physically and verbally abused aliens who were detained in connection with the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. It supplemented Chapter 7 of the June 2003 OIG report described above, in which the OIG found evidence that the conditions of detention at the MDC were excessively restrictive and unduly harsh. According to the OIG, those allegations included inadequate access to counsel, sporadic and mistaken information to detainees' families and attorneys about where they were being detained, lockdown for at least 23 hours a day, cells remaining illuminated 24 hours a day, detainees placed in heavy restraints whenever they were moved outside their cells, limited access to recreation, and inadequate notice to detainees about the process for filing complaints about their treatment. In its June 2003 report, the OIG also noted that there was evidence that some MDC correctional officers physically and verbally abused some September 11 detainees, particularly during the months immediately following the September 11 attacks. The December 2003 supplemental report contained the results of the OIG's completed investigation into the allegations of abuse at the MDC. It recommended that the BOP consider taking disciplinary action against ten current BOP employees, counseling two current MDC employees, and informing employers of four former staff members about the OIG's findings against them. The Bureau of Prisons is continuing its investigation of the allegations of staff misconduct based on the OIG's report and recommendation and will consider appropriate action based on the results of that investigation.

139. Separate from the OIG's investigation into the MDC, allegations of abuse at the MDC were also investigated by the Bureau of Prisons' Office of Internal Affairs, the Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division and the United States Attorney's Office for the Eastern District of New York. Following a very thorough review, the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorney's Offices determined that there was no criminal conduct at the MDC facility. However, even if a matter is declined criminally at the Department of Justice, the OIG can continue that investigation to determine if there was misconduct that should result in disciplinary or other administrative action. In this case, the OIG did pursue the investigation as an administrative matter after prosecution was declined, and as noted above, the BOP Office of Internal Affairs is continuing its investigation into this matter.

140. Capital punishment. The issue of capital punishment remains a matter of active discussion within the United States. As was true when the United States submitted its Initial Report, a majority of the people in a majority of the states, and of the country as a whole, have chosen through their democratically elected representatives to provide the possibility of capital punishment for the most serious of crimes. Capital punishment is permitted by 38 states and by the Federal Government, whereas 12 states and the District of Colombia prohibit its use.

141. As has been explained elsewhere in this report and as discussed in detail in the Initial Report, the reservation to Article 16 contained in the U.S. instrument of ratification limits U.S. obligations under Article 16 of the Convention to the prohibitions against "cruel, unusual and inhumane treatment or punishment prohibited by the Fifth, Eighth, and/or Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States." Moreover, the United States understanding, also included in the U.S. instrument of ratification, states that "The United States understands that international law does not prohibit the death penalty, and does not consider this Convention to restrict or prohibit the United States from applying the death penalty consistent with the Fifth, Eighth and/or Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, including any constitutional period of confinement prior to the imposition of the death penalty."

142. Accordingly, as stated in the Initial Report, the United States considers the issue of capital punishment to be outside the scope of its reporting obligations under the Torture Convention. Nevertheless, in an annex to the Initial Report, the United States provided for the information of the Committee a summary of some aspects of the issue. As a matter of courtesy to the Committee, the United States provides updated information on this issue in Annex 7.

III. ADDITIONAL INFORMATION REQUESTED BY THE COMMITTEE

143. By letter of May 21, 2004, the Committee requested "updated information concerning the situation in places of detention in Iraq, up to the time of the submission of the report." This and other relevant information regarding U.S. military operations is provided in Annex 1 for the Committee's review.

IV. OBSERVATIONS ON THE COMMITTEE'S CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

144. The United States has carefully considered the Committee's Conclusions and Recommendations. Observations of the United States on those conclusions and recommendations appear below.

The Committee expressed concern over "The failure of the State Party to enact a federal crime of torture in terms consistent with Article 1 of the Convention."

145. As was discussed in considerable detail in the Initial Report, every act of torture within the meaning of the Convention, as ratified by the United States, is illegal under existing federal and/or state law, and any individual who commits such an act is subject to penal sanctions as specified in criminal statutes at either the state or federal level. While the specific legal nomenclature and definitions vary from jurisdiction to jurisdiction, it is clear that any act of torture falling within the Convention would in fact be criminally prosecutable in every jurisdiction within the United States. The United States appreciates many merits in the suggestion advanced by the Committee. However, as the United States substantively has fulfilled the requirements of the Convention in this respect and for the reasons it determined to apply at the time it became party to the Convention, the United States has decided to retain the current statutory regime within the United States on this point.

The Committee expressed concern over "The reservation lodged to Article 16, in violation of the Convention, the effect of which is to limit the application of the Convention."

146. The Committee's use of the phrase "in violation of the Convention" is confusing as a matter of international treaty law. By their nature, reservations alter the scope of treaty obligations assumed by State Parties. Accordingly, reservations that are not prohibited by a treaty or by the applicable international law rules relating to reservations are not violations of that treaty. As the Torture Convention does not prohibit the making of a reservation and as the reservation in question is not incompatible with the object and purpose of the Convention, there is nothing in the U.S. reservation that would be unlawful or otherwise constitute a violation of the Convention.

147. The decision by the United States to condition its ratification upon a reservation to Article 16 (construing its obligations under Article 16 to prevent "cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment" only insofar as the term means the cruel, unusual and inhumane treatment or punishment prohibited by the Fifth, Eighth and/or Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution) was made after careful deliberation. Indeed, the existence of this reservation was a critical element in the decision by the United States to become a State Party to the Convention. The rationale set forth in the Initial Report, in particular the vague and ambiguous nature of the term "degrading treatment," remains equally valid at this time.

The Committee expressed concern over "The number of cases of police ill-treatment of civilians, and ill-treatment in prisons (including instances of inter-prisoner violence). Much of this ill-treatment by police and prison guards seems to be based upon discrimination."

148. Please see discussion under under Article 2 and Article 16 above. In a country of some 280 million people with a prison population of over 2 million people it is perhaps unavoidable, albeit unfortunate, that there are cases of abuse. Continuing U.S. efforts to deal with these problems and punish perpetrators of such acts are set out throughout this report. The United States fully agrees that the rights of detainees should be protected, in particular against unlawful discrimination.

The Committee expressed concern over "Alleged cases of sexual assault upon female detainees and prisoners by law enforcement officers and prison personnel. Female detainees and prisoners are also very often held in humiliating and degrading circumstances."

149. Please see discussion under Article 16 above.

The Committee expressed concern over "The use of electro-shock devices and restraint chairs as methods of constraint, which may violate the provisions of Article 16 of the Convention."

150. Please see discussion under Article 16 above.

The Committee expressed concern over "The excessively harsh regime of the 'supermaximum' prisons."

151. Please see discussion under Article 16 above.

The Committee expressed concern over "The use of 'chain gangs', particularly in public."

152. Please see discussion under Article 16 above.

The Committee expressed concern over "The legal action by prisoners seeking redress, which has been significantly restricted by the requirement of physical injury as a condition for bringing a successful action under the Prison Litigation Reform Act."

153. The Prison Litigation Reform Act of 1996 (PLRA), which was enacted as part of Pub. L. 104-134, contains several provisions designed to curtail frivolous lawsuits by prison inmates. One such provision is the requirement that no action shall be brought with respect to prison conditions under federal law by a prisoner until such administrative remedies as are available are exhausted. Another is the provision that no federal civil action may be brought by a prisoner for mental or emotional injury suffered while in custody without a prior showing of physical injury. Courts of appeals have held that the physical injury requirement does not prevent a prisoner from obtaining injunctive or declaratory relief. E.g., Thompson v. Carter, 284 F.3d 411, 418 (2d Cir. 2002). Moreover, the "physical injury" requirement has been challenged in U.S. courts and its constitutionality has been upheld. Since their enactment in 1996, the statutory amendments provided by the PLRA have achieved their fundamental purpose of restricting frivolous lawsuits by inmates that were disrupting the efficient operation of the federal judicial system.

The Committee expressed concern over "The holding of minors (juveniles) with adults in the regular prison population."

154. Please see discussion under Article 16.

Recommendations

"enact a federal crime of torture in terms consistent with Article 1 of the Convention and withdraw its reservations, interpretations and understandings relating to the Convention."

155. As described above, the United States respectfully disagrees with the Committee regarding the necessity and advisability of enacting a new federal crime of torture when existing U.S. law already provides that every act of torture within the meaning of the Torture Convention, as ratified by the United States, is prohibited by criminal law under existing federal and/or state law.

156. The United States respectfully reminds the Committee that the United States reached its conclusion that it would be necessary to condition U.S. ratification of the Convention on certain reservations, understandings and declarations as a result of a serious and careful review of U.S. law. The Initial Report sets forth the rationale for each of those reservations, understandings and declarations. While the United States has considered its existing reservations, understandings, and declarations in light of the Committee's recommendation, there have been no developments in the interim that have caused the United States to revise its view of the continuing validity and necessity of the conditions set forth in its instrument of ratification.

"take such steps as are necessary to ensure that those who violate the Convention are investigated, prosecuted and punished, especially those who are motivated by discriminatory purposes or sexual gratification."

157. Much of this report has described actions taken within the United States that are consistent with this recommendation. The United States Government is aware of continuing allegations of specific types of abuse and ill-treatment in particular cases. The United States believes that, overall, the country's law enforcement agencies and correctional institutions set and maintain high standards of conduct for their officers and treatment for persons in their custody. The United States believes that there is a deterrent effect on prospective individual conduct due to the successful federal and state criminal prosecutions of law enforcement officers who are responsible for abuse. It also realizes that such conduct has not been eradicated and that its efforts in this regard must continue.

158. The discussion under Article 2 above provides accounts of examples of the Department of Justice's efforts to prosecute law enforcement officers for misconduct, as exemplified by the 284 convictions of law enforcement officers for violating federal civil rights statutes between October 1, 1999 and January 1, 2005. When sufficient evidence of a violation of an individual's constitutional rights is established, such cases are prosecuted by the Federal Government and substantial sentences are adjudged. Please refer also to the discussion under Article 16 above regarding police brutality and the action taken to remedy such abuses. In addition to federal law enforcement efforts, local and state prosecutions are also brought.

159. Recognizing that female offenders have different social, psychological, educational, family, and health care needs than male offenders, the Bureau of Prisons continues to design and implement special programs for women offenders. However, the BOP treats all inmates, male and female, in a firm, fair, and consistent manner, with a primary focus being the maintenance of the inmates' dignity and humanity. Prospective employees undergo a rigorous pre-employment screening and background check to ensure the highest standards of integrity. Once employed, staff receive initial training and refresher training at least annually throughout their careers regarding the importance of proper treatment of inmates, and appropriate boundaries between staff and inmates.

160. Despite these measures, there have been unfortunate instances where staff have violated these standards of trust. Federal law expressly criminalizes sexual activity between correctional workers and inmates in federal prisons. Every allegation is investigated thoroughly. In cases where an allegation of inappropriate conduct by a staff member towards an inmate is substantiated, offending staff are referred for prosecution, to eradicate this deplorable behavior. Examples of prosecutions of such conduct are provided in the discussion under Article 16 above.

"Abolish electro-shock stun belts and restraint chairs as methods of restraining those in custody; their use almost invariably leads to breaches of Article 16 of the Convention."

161. The policies regarding the use of restraint chairs adopted by the Department of Justice reflect an awareness that the use of restraint chairs and stun belts, while lawful, should nevertheless be carefully circumscribed. The Bureau of Prisons' use of restraint chairs is intended only for short-term use, such as transporting an inmate on or off of an airplane. In the course of several investigations, the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice has investigated the use of the restraint chair in non-federal jails and prisons. The Civil Rights Division has recommended that such devices should only be used to keep an inmate from hurting himself or others, when less restrictive means of controlling the inmate have failed. The use of such devices should be carefully controlled and the inmate should be monitored at least every 15 minutes, vital signs should be checked and opportunities for movement, eating, and toileting should be provided. Restraints should be removed as soon as the inmate is no longer a threat to himself or others.

162. In the course of its investigations of adult correctional facilities, juvenile correctional facilities and law enforcement agencies pursuant to the Civil Rights of Institutionalized Persons Act (CRIPA) and the Pattern or Practice of Police Misconduct provision of the Crime Bill of 1994, described above, the Civil Rights Division has recommended limitations on the use of electro-shock weapons in both law enforcement agencies and corrections facilities, as well as increased training for officers using such weapons. However, the per se use of such restraints does not violate constitutional standards. Used appropriately, stun belts, stun guns, certain types of choke holds, and pepper spray can be effective tools for law enforcement under certain conditions where use of force is warranted due to the actions of a suspect whom the police are justifiably attempting to detain or arrest and in the correctional setting. In particular, these devices sometimes can be used as effective alternatives where more serious or deadly force would otherwise be justified. In the corrections setting, medical screening is required to determine if use of stun devices and pepper spray is contraindicated.

"Consider declaring in favor of Article 22 of the Convention."

163. At the time it undertook its domestic procedures to become a State Party to the Convention, the United States Executive and Legislative Branches gave substantial thought to the question of whether to avail the United States of the procedure set forth in Article 22. Since receiving the Committee's recommendation, the United States has further considered whether to make a declaration recognizing the competence of the Committee to consider communications made by or on behalf of individuals claiming to be victims of a violation of the Convention by the United States. While noting that at any time it could decide to reconsider the issue, the United States continues to decline to make such a declaration. As has been discussed at considerable length throughout this report, the United States legal system affords numerous opportunities for individuals to complain of abuse, and to seek remedies for such alleged violations. Accordingly, the United States will continue to direct its resources to addressing and dealing with violations of the Convention pursuant to the operation of its own domestic legal system.

"Ensure that minors (juveniles) are not held in prison with the regular prison population."

164. As stated under Article 16 above, in federal prisons, juveniles are not regularly held in prison with the regular prison population. Federal law prohibits juvenile offenders held in custody of federal authorities from being placed in correctional institutions or detention facilities in which they could have regular contact with adult offenders. See 18 U.S.C. § 5039. When a juvenile must be temporarily detained in an adult facility, it is for a minimal period of time and "sight and sound" separation from the adult offenders is ensured within the institution. The Bureau of Prisons has less than 300 juvenile offenders in its custody, and all such offenders are housed in contract facilities. All juvenile offenders in BOP custody are required to receive 50 hours per week of quality programming (e.g., GED, drug treatment, sex offender treatment, violent offender treatment).

165. The United States appreciates this opportunity to update its Initial Report on the operation of the Convention within the United States and looks forward to further work with the Committee Against Torture on these important issues.

PART ONE

INDIVIDUALS UNDER THE CONTROL OF U.S. ARMED FORCES CAPTURED DURING OPERATIONS AGAINST AL-QAIDA, THE TALIBAN AND THEIR AFFILIATES AND SUPPORTERS

I. BACKGROUND ON THE WAR AGAINST AL-QAIDA, THE TALIBAN AND THEIR AFFILIATES AND SUPPORTERS

The United States and its coalition partners are engaged in a war against al-Qaida, the Taliban, and their affiliates and supporters. There is no question that under the law of armed conflict, the United States has the authority to detain persons who have engaged in unlawful belligerence until the cessation of hostilities. Like other wars, when they start we do not know when they will end. Still, we may detain combatants until the end of the war.

At the same time, the commitment of the United States to treat detainees humanely is clear and well documented.[12] A discussion of allegations of mistreatment of detainees appears in Part One, III.B and Part Two, III.B.

To understand U.S. actions in continuing to detain members of al-Qaida, the Taliban, and their affiliates and supporters, whether captured committing acts of belligerency themselves or directly supporting hostilities in aid of such enemy forces, the United States submits a brief summary of events in its war against al-Qaida, the Taliban, and their affiliates and supporters.

Summary of unlawful belligerent acts committed by al-Qaida

Although the events of September 11, 2001 indisputably brought conflict to U.S. soil, al-Qaida had engaged in acts of war against the United States long before that date. The reality is that for almost a decade before September 11, 2001, al-Qaida and its affiliates waged a war against the United States, although it did not show the depth of its goals until the morning of September 11, 2001.

In 1996, Usama bin Ladin issued a fatwa declaring war on the United States. In February 1998, he repeated the fatwa stating that it was the duty of all Muslims to kill U.S. citizens - civilian or military - and their allies everywhere. Six months later, on August 7, 1998, al-Qaida attacked two U.S. Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, killing over 200 people and injuring approximately 5,000.

In 1999, an al-Qaida member attempted to carry out a bombing plot at the Los Angeles International Airport during the Millennium Celebrations. U.S. law enforcement foiled this attack, arresting Ahmed Ressam at Port Angeles at the U.S./Canadian border. The United States now knows that in October 2000, al-Qaida directed the attack on a U.S. naval warship, the USS Cole, while docked in the port of Aden, Yemen.[13] This attack killed 17 U.S. sailors and injured 39.

The horrific events of September 11, 2001 are well known. On that day, the United States suffered massive and brutal attacks carried out by nineteen al-Qaida suicide hijackers who crashed three U.S. commercial jets into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, and were responsible for the downing of one commercial jet in Shanksville, Pennsylvania. These attacks resulted in approximately 3,000 individuals of 78 different nationalities reported dead or missing.

The United Nations Security Council immediately condemned these terrorist acts as a "threat to international peace and security" and recognized the "inherent right of individual or collective self-defense in accordance with the United Nations Charter." U.N. Sec. Council Res. 1368, U.N. Doc. No. S/RES/1368 (Sept. 12, 2001) (at <http://daccessdds.un.org/doc/UNDOC/GEN/N01/533/82/PDF/N0153382.pdf?OpenElement> (Visited March 1, 2005)); see U.N. Sec. Council Res. 1373, U.N. Doc. No. S/RES/1373 (Sept. 28, 2001) (at <http://www.un.org/News/Press/docs/2001/sc7158.doc.htm> (visited March 1, 2005)) (deciding that all States shall take certain steps to combat terrorism).

On September 12, 2001, less than 24 hours after the terrorist attacks against the United States, NATO declared the attacks to be an attack against all the 19 NATO member countries. The Allies - for the first time in NATO's history - invoked Article 5 of the Washington Treaty, which states that an armed attack against one or more NATO member countries is an attack against all. NATO followed this landmark decision by implementing practical measures aimed at assisting the United States. (At <http://www.nato.int/terrorism/index.htm#a> (visited February 26, 2005)).

On September 11, 2001, the Organization of American States (OAS) General Assembly immediately "condemned in the strongest terms, the terrorist acts visited upon the cities of New York and Washington, D.C." and expressed "full solidarity" with the government and people of the United States. Immediately thereafter, the foreign ministers of the States Parties to the 1947 Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance (the Rio Treaty) declared, "these terrorist attacks against the United States of America are attacks against all American states." The ministers passed a resolution agreeing to "use all legally available measures to pursue, capture, extradite, and punish" anyone in their territories believed to be involved in terrorist activities. (At <http://www.oas.org/Assembly2001/assembly/gaassembly2000/GAterrorism.htm> (visited February 28, 2005)).

The Prime Minister of Australia also considered the attacks to be an armed attack justifying action in self-defense under Article IV of the ANZUS Treaty. See Statement of the Prime Minister, Application of Anzus Treaty to Terrorist Attacks on the United States, September 14, 2001, (at <http://www.pm.gov.au/news/media_releases/2001/media_release1241.htm> (visited February 26, 2005)).

The seriousness of the threat al-Qaida and its supporters posed to the security of the United States compelled it to act in self-defense. On October 7, 2001, President Bush invoked the United States' inherent right of self-defense and, as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces of the United States, ordered U.S. Armed Forces to initiate action against terrorists and the Taliban regime harboring them in Afghanistan. The U.S. Armed Forces "initiated actions designed to prevent and deter further attacks on the United States .. [including] measures against Al Qaeda terrorist training camps and military installations of the Taliban regime in Afghanistan." Letter from John Negroponte, U.S. Permanent Representative to the U.N., to Richard Ryan, President of the U.N. Security Council, U.N. Doc. No. S/2001/946 (Oct. 7, 2001), 40 I.L.M. 1281 (2001). (At <http://www.un.int/usa/s-2001-946.htm> (visited March 1, 2005)). The attacks commenced when United States and coalition forces launched "strikes against al Qaeda terrorist training camps and military installations of the Taliban regime in Afghanistan . . . designed to disrupt the use of Afghanistan as a terrorist base of operations, and to attack the military capability of the Taliban regime." (At <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2001/10/20011007-8.html> (visited March 1, 2005)).

President Bush later stated that "[i]nternational terrorists, including members of al Qaida, have carried out attacks on United States diplomatic and military personnel and facilities abroad and on citizens and property within the United States on a scale that has created a state of armed conflict that requires the use of the United States Armed Forces." U.S. Military Order; Detention, Treatment, and Trial of Certain Non-Citizens in the War Against Terrorism (Nov. 13, 2001), 66 Fed. Reg. 57,833 (2001), at Section 1(a). (At <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2001/11/print/20011113-27.html> (visited March 1, 2005)).

Al-Qaida continues to wage armed conflict against the United States and its allies. On December 22, 2001, an al-Qaida associate, Richard Reid, attempted to destroy a U.S. airliner using explosives concealed in his shoe, a plot that the airline passengers foiled. In April 2002, al-Qaida firebombed a synagogue in Djerba, Tunisia, killing at least 20 people and injuring dozens. In June 2002, al-Qaida detonated a bomb outside the U.S. Consulate in Karachi, Pakistan, killing 11 persons and injuring 51. On October 6, 2002, al-Qaida was most likely responsible for a suicide attack against the French oil tanker, the MV Limburg, off the coast of Yemen, killing one and injuring four. On October 8, 2002, al-Qaida gunmen attacked U.S. Marines on Failaka Island in Kuwait, killing one U.S. Marine and wounding another. On November 28, 2002, in Mombasa, Kenya, al-Qaida detonated a car bomb in front of the Paradise Hotel, killing 15 persons and wounding 40 others. That same day, terrorists launched two anti-aircraft missiles at a civilian aircraft, and narrowly missed downing a Boeing 757 taking off from Mombassa en route to Israel. Al-Qaida claimed responsibility for the attacks.

On May 12, 2003, al-Qaida suicide bombers in Saudi Arabia attacked three residential compounds for foreign workers, killing 34, including 10 U.S. citizens, and injuring 139 others. On November 9, 2003, al-Qaida was responsible for the assault and bombing of a housing complex in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, that killed 17 and injured 100 others. On November 15, 2003, two al-Qaida suicide truck bombs exploded outside the Neve Shalom and Beth Israel Synagogues in Istanbul, killing 20 and wounding 300 more. On November 20, 2003, two al-Qaida suicide truck bombs exploded near the British consulate and the HSBC Bank in Istanbul, killing 30, including the British Consul General, and injuring more than 309. In December 2003, al-Qaida conducted two assassination attempts against Pakistan President Musharraf.

In 2004, the Saudi-based al-Qaida network and associated extremists launched at least 11 attacks, killing more than 60 people, including 6 Americans, and wounding more than 225. Al-Qaida primarily focused on targets associated with U.S. and Western presence and Saudi security forces located in Riyadh, Yanbu, Jeddah, and Dhahran.

In October 2004, Abu Mus'ab al-Zarqawi announced a merger between his organization, Jama`at al-Tawhid was-al-Jihad or JTJ and Usama bin Ladin's al-Qaida. Bin Ladin endorsed Zarqawi as his official emissary in Iraq in December. The new organization, Al-Qaida of Jihad organization in the Land of the Two Rivers or QJBR, has the immediate goal of establishing an Islamic state in Iraq. Prior to the merger of the two organizations, Zarqawi's groups had been conducting a number of attacks in Iraq, including the attack responsible for the death of the Secretary-General's Special Representative for Iraq.

In conclusion, it is clear that al-Qaida and its affiliates and supporters have planned and continue to plan and perpetrate armed attacks against the United States and its coalition partners, and they directly target civilians in blatant violation of the laws of war.

II. DETAINEES - CAPTURING, HOLDING, RELEASING, AND/OR TRYING

A. Brief overview of the detainee populations held by the U.S. Armed Forces at Guantanamo Bay and in Afghanistan

During the course of the war in Afghanistan, the U.S. Armed Forces and allied forces have captured or procured the surrender of thousands of individuals fighting as part of the al-Qaida and Taliban effort. The law of war has long recognized the right to detain combatants until the cessation of hostilities.[14] Detaining enemy combatants prevents them from returning to the battlefield and engaging in further armed attacks against innocent civilians and U.S. forces. Further, detention serves as a deterrent against future attacks by denying the enemy the fighters needed to conduct war. Interrogations during detention enable the United States to gather important intelligence to prevent future attacks during ongoing hostilities.

The first group of enemy combatants captured in the war against al-Qaida, the Taliban, and their affiliates and supporters arrived in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, in January 2002. The United States has approximately 520 detainees in custody at Guantanamo (at http://www.defenselink.mil/releases/2005/nr20050419-2661.html (visited April 28, 2005)) and slightly more than 500 detainees in Afghanistan. These numbers represent a small percentage of the total number of individuals the United States has detained, at one point or another, in fighting the war against al-Qaida and the Taliban.

Since the war began in Afghanistan (and long before the U.S. Supreme Court decisions in the detainee cases of June 2004), the United States has captured, screened and released approximately 10,000 individuals. It transferred to Guantanamo fewer than ten percent of those screened. The United States only wishes to hold those enemy combatants who are part of or are supporting Taliban or al-Qaida forces (or associated forces) and who, if released, would present a threat of reengaging in belligerent acts or directly aiding and supporting ongoing hostilities against the United States or its allies. We have made mistakes: of the detainees we have released, we have later recaptured or killed about 5% of them while they were engaged in hostile action against U.S. forces.

Detainees in Afghanistan and Guantanamo include many senior al-Qaida and Taliban operatives and leaders, in addition to rank-and-file jihadists who took up arms against the United States. The individuals currently held by the United States were at one time actively committing belligerent terrorist acts as part of al-Qaida, the Taliban or their affiliates and supporters who engaged in hostilities against the United States and its allies. Generally, the enemy combatants held at Guantanamo Bay comprise enemy combatants who are part of al-Qaida, the Taliban, or affiliated forces, or their supporters, whether captured committing acts of belligerency themselves or directly supporting hostilities in aid of such enemy forces. Examples of enemy combatants held in U.S. custody include:

- Terrorists linked to major al-Qaida attacks on the United States, such as the East Africa U.S. Embassy bombings and the USS Cole attack;
- Terrorists who taught or received training on arms, explosives, surveillance, and interrogation resistance techniques at al-Qaida camps;
- Terrorists continuing to express their desire to kill Americans if released. In particular, some have threatened their guards and the families of the guards;
- Terrorists who have sworn personal allegiance ("bayat") to Usama bin Ladin; and
- Terrorists linked to several al-Qaida operational plans, including the targeting of U.S. facilities and interests.

Representative examples of specific Guantanamo detainees include:

- An al-Qaida explosives trainer who has provided information on the September 2001 assassination of Northern Alliance leader Ahmad Shah Masoud;
- A Taliban fighter linked to al-Qaida operatives connected to the East Africa U.S. Embassy bombings;
- An individual captured on the battlefield, with links to a financier of the September 11th plots, who attempted to enter the United States in August 2001 to meet hijacker Mohammed Atta;
- Two individuals associated with senior al-Qaida members developing remotely detonated explosive devices for use against U.S. forces;
- A member of an al-Qaida supported terrorist cell in Afghanistan that targeted civilians and was responsible for a grenade attack on a foreign journalist's automobile;
- An al-Qaida member who plotted to attack oil tankers in the Persian Gulf;
- An individual who served as a bodyguard for Usama bin Ladin;
- An al-Qaida member who served as an explosives trainer for al-Qaida and designed a prototype shoe bomb and a magnetic mine; and
- An individual who trained al-Qaida associates in the use of explosives and worked on a plot to use cell phones to detonate bombs.

B. Status of detainees at Guantanamo Bay and in Afghanistan

On February 7, 2002, shortly after the United States began operations in Afghanistan, President Bush's Press Secretary announced the President's determination that the Geneva Convention "appl[ies] to the Taliban detainees, but not to the al Qaeda international terrorists" because Afghanistan is a party to the Geneva Convention, but al Qaeda - an international terrorist group - is not. Statement by the U.S. Press Secretary, The James S. Brady Briefing Room, in Washington, D.C. (Feb. 7, 2002) (at <http://www.state.gov/s/l/38727.htm> (visited March 1, 2005)). Although the President determined that the Geneva Convention applies to Taliban detainees, he determined that, under Article 4, such detainees are not entitled to POW status. Id. He explained that:

> Under Article 4 of the Geneva Convention, … Taliban detainees are not entitled to POW status . . . .
> The Taliban have not effectively distinguished themselves from the civilian population of Afghanistan. Moreover, they have not conducted their operations in accordance with the laws and customs of war …
> Al Qaeda is an international terrorist group and cannot be considered a state party to the Geneva Convention. Its members, therefore, are not covered by the Geneva Convention, and are not entitled to POW status under the treaty.

Statement by the U.S. Press Secretary, The James S. Brady Briefing Room, in Washington, D.C. (Feb. 7, 2002) (at <http://www.state.gov/s/l/38727.htm> (visited March 1, 2005)); see also, White House Memorandum - Humane Treatment of al Qaeda and Taliban Detainees, February 7, 2002, at 2(c) & (d) (released and declassified in full on June 17, 2004). (At <http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-srv/nation/documents/020702bush.pdf > (visited March 1, 2005)).

After the President's decision, the United States concluded that those who are part of al-Qaida, the Taliban or their affiliates and supporters, or support such forces are enemy combatants whom we may detain for the duration of hostilities; these unprivileged combatants do not enjoy the privileges of POWs (i.e., privileged combatants) under the Third Geneva Convention.[15] International law, including the Geneva Conventions, has long recognized a nation's authority to detain unlawful enemy combatants without benefit of POW status.[16] See, e.g., INGRID DETTER, THE LAW OF WAR 148 (2000) ("Unlawful combatants … though they are a legitimate target for any belligerent action, are not, if captured, entitled to any prisoner of war status."); see also United States v. Lindh, 212 F. Supp. 2d. 541, 558 (E.D. Va. 2002) (confirming the Executive branch view that "the Taliban falls far short when measured against the four GPW criteria for determining entitlement to lawful combatant immunity.")

Because there is no doubt under international law as to the status of al-Qaida, the Taliban, their affiliates and supporters, there is no need or requirement to review individually whether each enemy combatant detained at Guantanamo is entitled to POW status. For example, Article 5 of the Third Geneva Convention requires a tribunal in certain cases to determine whether a belligerent (or combatant) is entitled to POW status under the Convention only when there is doubt under any of the categories enumerated in Article 4.[17] The United States concluded that Article 5 tribunals were unnecessary because there is no doubt as to the status of these individuals.

After the decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court in Rasul v. Bush, 124 S.Ct. 2686 (2004), and Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 124 S.Ct. 2633 (2004), which are described below in Section G, the U.S. Government established a process on July 7, 2004, to conduct Combatant Status Review Tribunals (CSRTs) at Guantanamo Bay. (At <www.defenselink.mil/transcripts/ 2004/tr200440707-0981.html> (visited March 1, 2005) (Department of Defense Briefing on Combatant Status Review Tribunal, dated July 7, 2004)). Consistent with the Supreme Court decision in Rasul, these tribunals supplement the prior screening procedures and serve as fora for detainees to contest their designation as enemy combatants and thereby the legal basis for their detention. The tribunals were established in response to the Supreme Court decision in Rasul and draw upon guidance contained in the U.S. Supreme Court decision in Hamdi that would apply to citizen-enemy combatants in the United States.

C. Combatant status review tribunals (CSRTs) for detainees at Guantanamo Bay

Between August 2004 and January 2005, various Combatant Status Review Tribunals (CSRTs) have reviewed the status of all individuals detained at Guantanamo, in a fact-based proceeding, to determine whether the individual is still classified as an enemy combatant. As reflected in the Order establishing the CSRTs, an enemy combatant is "an individual who was part of or supporting Taliban or al Qaeda forces, or associated forces that are engaged in hostilities against the United States or its coalition partners. This includes any person who has committed a belligerent act or has directly supported hostilities in aid of enemy armed forces." CSRT Order B (at <http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Jul2004/d20040707review.pdf> (visited March 1, 2005)). Each detainee has the opportunity to contest such designation. The Deputy Secretary of Defense appointed the Secretary of the Navy, The Honorable Gordon England, to implement and oversee this process. On July 29, 2004, Secretary England issued the implementation directive for the CSRTs, giving specific procedural and substantive guidance. (At <http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Jul2004/d20040730comb.pdf> (visited March 1, 2005)). On July 12-14, 2004, the United States notified all detainees then at Guantanamo of their opportunity to contest their enemy combatant status under this process, and that a federal court has jurisdiction to entertain a petition for habeas corpus brought on their behalf. The Government has also provided them with information on how to file habeas corpus petitions in the U.S. court system. (At http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Dec2004/d20041209ARB.pdf (visited March 1, 2005)). When the Government has added new detainees, it has also informed them of these legal rights.

CSRTs offer many of the procedures contained in US Army Regulation 190-8. The Supreme Court specifically cited these Army procedures as sufficient for U.S. citizen-detainees entitled to due process under the U.S. Constitution. For example:

- Tribunals are composed of three neutral commissioned officers, plus a non-voting officer who serves as a recorder;

- Decisions are by a preponderance of the evidence by a majority of the voting members who are sworn to execute their duties impartially;

- The detainee has the right to (a) call reasonably available witnesses, (b) question witnesses called by the tribunal, (c) testify or otherwise address the tribunal, (d) not be compelled to testify, and (e) attend the open portions of the proceedings;

- An interpreter is provided to the detainee, if necessary; and

- The Tribunal creates a written report of its decision that the Staff Judge Advocate reviews for legal sufficiency. See CSRT Implementation Memorandum, July 29, 2004 (at <http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Jul2004/d20040730comb.pdf> (visited March 1, 2005)).

Unlike an Article 5 tribunal, the CSRT guarantees the detainee additional rights, such as the right to a personal representative to assist in reviewing information and preparing the detainee's case, presenting information, and questioning witnesses at the CSRT. The rules entitle the detainee to receive an unclassified summary of the evidence in advance of the hearing in the detainee's native language, and to introduce relevant documentary evidence. See CSRT Order g(1); Implementation Memorandum Encl. (1) F(8), H (5); CSRT Order g(10); Implementation Memorandum Encl. (1) F (6). In addition, the rules require the Recorder to search government files for, and provide to the Tribunal, any "evidence to suggest that the detainee should not be designated as an enemy combatant." See Implementation Memorandum Encl. (2), B(1). The detainee's Personal Representative also has access to the government files and can search for and provide relevant evidence that would support the detainee's position.

A higher authority (the CSRT Director) automatically reviews the result of every CSRT. He has the power to return the record to the tribunal for further proceedings if appropriate. See CSRT Order h; Implementation Memorandum Encl. (1) I (8). The CSRT Director is a two-star admiral - a senior military officer. CSRTs are transparent proceedings. Members of the media, the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), and non-governmental organizations may observe military commissions and the unclassified portions of the CSRT proceedings. They also have access to the unclassified materials filed in Federal court. Every detainee now held at Guantanamo Bay has had a CSRT hearing. New detainees will have the same rights.

As of March 29, 2005, the CSRT Director had taken final action in all 558 cases. Thirty-eight detainees were determined no longer to be enemy combatants; twenty-three of them have been subsequently released to their home countries, and at the time of this Report's submission, arrangements are underway for the release of the others. (At <http://www.defenselink.mil/releases/2005/nr20050419-2661.html> (visited April 25, 2005)).

D. Assessing detainees for release/transfer

1. Guantanamo Bay

The detention of each Guantanamo detainee is reviewed annually by an Administrative Review Board (ARB), established by an order on May 11, 2004 (Review Procedure Announced for Guantanamo Detainees, Department of Defense Press Release, May 18, 2004)

(at <http://www.defenselink.mil/releases/2004/nr20040518-0806.html> (visited February 28, 2005)) and supplemented by an implementing directive on September 14, 2004. See Implementation of Administrative Review Procedures for Enemy Combatants Detained at U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba (at <http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Sep2004/d20040914adminreview.pdf> (visited February 28, 2005)).

The ARB assesses whether an enemy combatant continues to pose a threat to the United States or its allies, or whether there are other factors bearing on the need for continued detention. The process permits the detainee to appear in person before an ARB panel of three military officers to explain why the detainee is no longer a threat to the United States or its allies, and to provide information to support the detainee's release.

Each enemy combatant is provided with an unclassified written summary of the primary factors favoring the detainee's continued detention and the primary factors favoring the detainee's release or transfer from Guantanamo. The enemy combatant is also provided with a military officer to provide assistance throughout the ARB process. In addition, the review board will accept written information from the government of nationality, and from the detainee's relatives through that government, as well as from counsel representing detainees in habeas corpus proceedings. Based on all of this information, as well as submissions by U.S. Government agencies, the ARB makes a written assessment by majority vote on whether there is reason to believe that the enemy combatant no longer poses a threat to the United States or its allies in the ongoing armed conflict and any other factors bearing on the need for continued detention. The Board also makes a written recommendation on whether detention should be continued. The recommendations of the board are reviewed by a judge advocate for legal sufficiency and then go to the Designated Civilian Official (currently Secretary of the Navy Gordon England), who decides whether to release, transfer or continue to detain the individual.

As of April 26, 2005, the Department of Defense (DoD) has announced its intent to conduct Administrative Review Board reviews for 254 detainees; it has informed the detainees' respective host countries and asked them to notify the detainees' relatives; and it has invited them to provide information for the hearings. (At <www.defenselink.mil/news/combatant_Tribunals.html> (visited April 28, 2005)). The first Annual Administrative Review Board began on December 14, 2004, and 91 Administrative Review Boards have been conducted as of April 26, 2005.

The United States has no interest in detaining enemy combatants any longer than necessary. On an ongoing basis, even prior to the Annual Administrative Review Boards, the U.S. Government has reviewed the continued detention of each enemy combatant. The United States releases detainees when it believes they no longer continue to pose a threat to the United States and its allies. Furthermore, the United States has transferred some detainees to the custody of their home governments when those governments 1) are prepared to take the steps necessary to ensure that the person will not pose a continuing threat to the United States or its allies; and/or 2) are prepared to investigate or prosecute the person, as appropriate. The United States may also transfer a detainee to a country other than the country of the detainee's nationality, when the country requests transfer for purposes of criminal prosecution.

As of April 26, 2005, the United States has transferred 234 persons from Guantanamo - 169 transferred for release and 66 transferred to the custody of other governments for further detention, investigation, prosecution, or control. Of the 66 detainees who were transferred to the control of other governments, 29 were transferred to Pakistan, seven to Russia, five to Morocco, nine to the United Kingdom, six to France, four to Saudi Arabia, two to Belgium, one to Kuwait, one to Spain, one to Australia, and one to Sweden.

In some situations, it has been difficult to find locations to which to transfer safely detainees from Guantanamo when they do not want to return to their country of nationality or when they have expressed reasonable fears if returned. Until the United States can find a suitable location for the safe release of a detainee, the detainee remains in U.S. control.

It is often difficult to assess whether an individual released from Guantanamo will return to combat and pose a threat to the United States or its allies. Determining whether an individual truly poses a threat is made more difficult by information that is often ambiguous or conflicting, as well as by denial and deception efforts on the part of the individual detainees. Based on information seized at al-Qaida camps in Afghanistan and elsewhere, the United States is aware that Taliban and al-Qaida fighters are trained in counter-interrogation techniques and instructed to claim, for example, that they are cooks, religious students, or teachers. It has proven challenging to ascertain the true facts and has required a great deal of time to investigate fully the background of each detainee. There is a concerted, professional effort to assess information from the field, from interrogations, and from other detainees. In spite of rigorous U.S. review procedures, some detainees who were released from Guantanamo have returned to fighting in Afghanistan against U.S. and allied forces. Based on a variety of reports, as many as twelve individuals have returned to terrorism upon return to their country of citizenship.

Some examples of detainees who have returned to the fight include:

- A former Guantanamo detainee who reportedly killed an Afghan judge leaving a mosque in Afghanistan;

- A former Guantanamo detainee (released by the United States in January 2004) who was recaptured in May 2004 when he shot at U.S. forces and was found to be carrying a letter of introduction from the Taliban; and

- Two detainees (released from Guantanamo in May 2003 and April 2004, respectively) who were killed in the summer of 2004 while engaged in combat operations in Afghanistan.

The fact that some detainees upon their release are returning to combat underscores the ongoing nature of the armed conflict with al-Qaida and the practical reality that in defending itself against al-Qaida, the United States must proceed very carefully in its determination of whether a detainee no longer poses a threat to the United States and its allies.

2. Afghanistan

Detainees under DoD control in Afghanistan are subject to a review process that first determines whether an individual is an enemy combatant. The detaining Combatant Commander, or designee, shall review the initial determination that the detainee is an enemy combatant. This review is based on all available and relevant information available on the date of the review and may be subject to further review based upon newly discovered evidence or information. The Commander will review the initial determination that the detainee is an enemy combatant within 90 days from the time that a detainee comes under DoD control. After the initial 90-day status review, the detaining combatant commander, on an annual basis, is required to reassess the status of each detainee. Detainees assessed to be enemy combatants under this process remain under DoD control until they no longer present a threat. The review process is conducted under the authority of the Commander, U.S. Central Command (USCENTCOM). If, as a result of the periodic Enemy Combatant status review (90-day or annual), a detaining combatant commander concludes that a detainee no longer meets the definition of an enemy combatant, the detainee is released.

E. Transfers or releases to third countries

After it is determined that a detainee no longer continues to pose a threat to the U.S. security interests or that a detainee no longer meets the criteria of enemy combatant and is eligible for release or transfer, the United States generally seeks to return the detainee to his or her country of nationality. The Deparment of Defense has transferred detainees to the control of their governments of nationality when those governments are prepared to take the steps necessary to ensure that the detainees will not pose a continuing threat to the United States and only after the United States receives assurances that the government concerned will treat the detainee humanely and in a manner consistent with its international obligations. A detainee may be considered for transfer to a country other than his country of nationality, such as in circumstances where that country requests transfer of the detainee for purposes of criminal prosecution. Of particular concern to the United States is whether the foreign government concerned will treat the detainee humanely, in a manner consistent with its international obligations, and will not persecute the individual because of his race, religion, nationality, membership in a social group, or political opinion. In some cases, however, transfers cannot easily be arranged.

U.S. policy is not to transfer a person to a country if it is determined that it is more likely than not that the person will be tortured or, in appropriate cases, that the person has a well-founded fear of persecution and would not be disqualified from persecution protection on criminal- or security-related grounds. If a case were to arise in which the assurances obtained from the receiving government are not sufficient when balanced against treatment concerns, the United States would not transfer a detainee to the control of that government unless the concerns were satisfactorily resolved. Circumstances have arisen in the past where the Department of Defense elected not to transfer detainees to their country of origin because of torture concerns.

With respect to the application of these policies to detainees at Guantanamo Bay, the U.S. Government in February of 2005 filed factual declarations with a Federal court for use in domestic litigation. These declarations describe in greater detail the application of the policy described above as it applies to the detainees at Guantanamo Bay, and are attached as Tab 1 to this Annex.

F. Military commissions to try detainees held at Guantanamo Bay

In 2001, the President authorized military commissions to try those detainees charged with war crimes. See Detention, Treatment, and Trial of Certain Non-Citizens in the War Against Terrorism, November 13, 2001 (at <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2001/11/print/20011113-27.html> (visited February 28, 2005)). The Geneva Conventions recognize military fora as legitimate and appropriate to try those persons who engage in belligerent acts in contravention of the law of war. The United States has used military commissions throughout its history. During the Civil War, Union Commanders conducted more than 2,000 military commissions. Following the Civil War, the United States used military commissions to try eight conspirators (all U.S. citizens and civilians) in President Lincoln's assassination. During World War II, President Roosevelt used military commissions to prosecute eight Nazi saboteurs for spying (including at least one U.S. citizen). A military commission tried Japanese General Yamashita for war crimes committed while defending the Philippine Islands. In addition to the international war crimes tribunals, the Allied Powers, such as England, France, and the United States, tried hundreds of lesser-known persons by military commissions in Germany and the Pacific theater after World War II.

To date, the President has designated fifteen individuals as eligible for prosecution by military commission. Of those, the United States has since transferred three to their country of nationality, which has released them. Four Guantanamo detainees have been charged and have had preliminary hearings before a military commission. These four cases are currently in abeyance, pending appellate court review of the recent U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia's decision of November 8, 2004, in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 344 F. Supp. 2d 152 (D.D.C. 2004).

The U.S. District Court ruled that Hamdan, the petitioner, may not be tried by military commission unless and until a competent tribunal determines he is not entitled to Prisoner of War status under the Third Geneva Convention and until a procedural rule is altered regarding closure of the commission hearing to the accused. On November 12, 2004, the U.S. Government appealed that ruling to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. The U.S. Court of Appeals ordered an expedited case schedule and held oral argument on April 7, 2005.

In light of this pending case, it will not be possible to address the Military Commissions in further detail at this time.

G. Access to U.S. courts

In 2003, petitions for writ of habeas corpus were filed in U.S. courts on behalf of some of the detainees at Guantanamo seeking review of their detention. On June 28, 2004, the United States Supreme Court, the highest judicial body in the United States, issued two decisions pertinent to many enemy combatants. One of the decisions directly pertained to enemy combatants detained at Guantanamo Bay, and the other pertained to a citizen enemy combatant held in the United States. See Rasul v. Bush, 124 S.Ct. 2686 (2004); Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 124 S.Ct. 2633 (2004); see also Rumsfeld v. Padilla, 124 S.Ct. 2711 (2004) (involving a decision on which U.S. Federal court has jurisdiction over habeas action). In Rasul v. Bush, the Supreme Court decided only the question of jurisdiction. The Court ruled that the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia had jurisdiction to consider habeas challenges to the legality of the detention of foreign nationals at Guantanamo. 124 S.Ct. at 2698. The Court held that aliens apprehended abroad and detained at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, as enemy combatants, "no less than citizens," could invoke the habeas jurisdiction of a district court. Id. at 2696. The Supreme Court left it to the lower courts to decide "[w]hether and what further proceedings may become necessary after [the United States Government parties] make their response to the merits of petitioners' claims." Id. at 2699. In Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, the Supreme Court held that the United States is entitled to detain enemy combatants, even American citizens, until the end of hostilities, in order to prevent the enemy combatants from returning to the field of battle and again taking up arms. The Court recognized the detention of such individuals is such a fundamental and accepted incident of war that it is part of the "necessary and appropriate" force that Congress authorized the President to use against nations, organizations, or persons associated with the September 11 terrorist attacks. 124 S.Ct. at 2639-42 (plurality op.); id., at 2679 (Thomas J., dissenting).

A plurality of the Court addressed the entitlements of a U.S. citizen designated as an enemy combatant and held that the Due Process Clause of the U.S. Constitution requires "notice of the factual basis for [the citizen-detainee's] classification, and a fair opportunity to rebut the Government's factual assertions before a neutral decisionmaker." Id. at 2648. A plurality of the Court observed: "There remains the possibility that the [due process] standards we have articulated could be met by an appropriately authorized and properly constituted military tribunal," and proffered as a benchmark for comparison the regulations titled, Enemy Prisoners of War, Retained Personnel, Civilian Internees and Other Detainees, Army Regulation 190-8, §1-6 (1997). Id. at 2651.

These Supreme Court rulings have resulted in further proceedings at the Federal trial and appellate court levels. As of April 27, 2005, there are 55 habeas corpus cases involving 153 Guantanamo detainees pending before ten district court judges. These include thirty-nine Yemenis, twenty-six Saudis, eleven Kuwaitis, eleven Moroccans, ten Algerians, six Bahrainis, seven Tunisians, five Jordanians, five Sudanese, four Syrians, four Mauritanians, three Chinese, three Egyptians, three Libyans, two each from Palestine and Chad; and one from each of the following: Qatar, Kazakhstan, Tajikistan, Uganda, Iraq, Australia, Canada, Somalia, Turkey, Afghanistan, Pakistan and Ethiopia. Additionally, a habeas corpus petition has been filed under the name of "John Doe" on behalf of all detainees who do not currently have habeas corpus petitions pending. Other detainees may have since filed habeas corpus petitions. Due to the recent transfer of four British, one Australian and one Kuwaiti detainee, the government has moved to dismiss their petitions. Those motions are still pending.

The various habeas corpus petitions seek the detainees' release, claiming that the detentions violate the Fifth, Sixth, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, and the War Powers and Article I Suspension clauses of the Constitution. Some of the petitions have also alleged claims under the Administrative Procedure Act, the Alien Tort Statute, Army Regulation 190-8, customary international law, and international treaties including the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the Convention Against Torture, and the Geneva Conventions of 1949.

During the course of these habeas corpus proceedings, the Federal courts have reviewed or are reviewing numerous motions and other requests including motions to dismiss the petitions, motions to enjoin tribunal proceedings, including military commission prosecutions and transfers to foreign governments and requests for discovery. For example, in August 2004, the Federal District Court in the cases of Gherebi v. Bush, No. 04-CV-1164-RBW (D.D.C.) (unpublished ruling of Jul. 27, 2004), Boumediene v. Bush, No. 04-CV-1166-RJL (D.D.C.) (unpublished ruling of Aug. 3, 2004), and El-Banna v. Bush, No. 04-CV-1144-RWR (D.D.C.) (unpublished ruling of August 6, 2004) separately denied requests by petitioners for relief enjoining ongoing CSRT proceedings. In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases, 355 F.Supp.2d 443 (D.D.C. 2005). The judges ruled that the courts could address any alleged defect in the CSRT proceedings if petitioners later sought any relief with regard to their detention. Further, pursuant to briefing orders issued by Judge Green, the senior district court judge who was, until recently, coordinating the numerous detainee cases, the government filed factual returns in a number of the cases, indicating both the classified and unclassified factual bases for the enemy combatant status of each petitioner-detainee based on the record of CSRT proceedings. The court has full access to the records of the CSRT proceedings.

In January 2005, two district court judges reached conflicting decisions regarding the constitutional rights of enemy combatants at Guantanamo. In Khalid v. Bush, Judge Richard J. Leon determined that Congress had authorized the President to capture and detain enemy combatants and that the enemy combatants at Guantanamo do not have rights under the U.S. Constitution and that there was no viable theory under federal law, international treaties or customary international law that would make their detention unlawful. 355 F.Supp.2d 311 (D.D.C. 2005). In contrast, Judge Joyce Hens Green ruled that at least certain rights under the U.S. Constitution apply at Guantanamo and that that CSRT procedures were unconstitutional, as they did not comport with the Fifth Amendment right to due process. In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases, 355 F.Supp.2d 443 (D.D.C. 2005). Judge Green ruled that if the detainee was not going to have access to classified material, then counsel with access to such material should be permitted to advocate for the detainee at the CSRT. She also found that the inquiry conducted had been inadequate in cases where detainees alleged that coercion or torture was used during interrogations.

The parties have appealed two conflicting decisions to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit on an expedited basis.

In conclusion, domestic judicial proceedings are ongoing, which may address allegations of mistreatment that have arisen with respect to Guantanamo Bay. As described elsewhere in this report, individuals who engage in torture or other physical abuse of detainees are subject to prosecutions and other sanctions under U.S. law.

III. DETAINEES - TREATMENT

A. Description of conditions of detention at Department of Defense facilities

1. Guantanamo Bay

The Department of Defense has released to the public several photographs of the detention facilities in Guantanamo Bay. (At <http://www.defenselink.mil/home/features/gtmo> (visited March 17, 2005)). These photographs reflect U.S. policy and practices regarding treatment of detainees at Guantanamo Bay, including the U.S. requirement that all detainees receive adequate housing, recreation facilities, and medical facilities.

Detainees receive:

- Three meals per day that meet cultural dietary requirements;
- Adequate shelter, including cells with beds, mattresses, and sheets;
- Adequate clothing, including shoes, uniforms, and hygiene items;
- Opportunity to worship, including prayer beads, rugs, and copies of the Koran;
- The means to send and receive mail;
- Reading materials, including allowing detainees to keep books in their cells; and
- Excellent medical care.

All enemy combatants get state-of-the art medical and dental care that is comparable to that received by U.S. Armed Forces deployed overseas. Wounded enemy combatants are treated humanely and nursed back to health, and amputees are fitted with modern prosthetics.

Detainees write to and receive mail from their families and friends. Detainees who are illiterate, but trustworthy enough for a classroom setting, are taught to read and write in their native language so they, too, can communicate with their families and friends.

Enemy combatants at Guantanamo may worship as desired and in accordance with their beliefs. They have access to the Koran and other prayer accessories. Traditional garb is available for some detainees.

Where security permits, detainees are eligible for communal living in a new Medium Security Facility, with fan-cooled dormitories, family-style dinners, and increased outdoor recreation time, where they play board games like chess and checkers, and team sports like soccer.

The United States permits the International Committee of the Red Cross to visit privately with every detainee in DoD control at Guantanamo. Communications between the U.S. Government and the ICRC are confidential.

In addition, legal counsel representing the detainees in habeas corpus cases have visited detainees at Guantanamo since late August 2004. As of late April 2005, counsel in nineteen cases had personally met with the 74 detainees they represent, and counsel in seventeen of those cases have made repeat visits to Guantanamo. To date, every request by American counsel of record in the habeas cases to visit detainees at Guantanamo has been granted, after that counsel has received the requisite security clearance and agreed to the terms of the protective order issued by the Federal court. The Government does not monitor these meetings (or the written correspondence between counsel and detainees), which occur in a confidential manner. The Government also allows foreign and domestic media to visit the facilities.

2. Afghanistan

The Department of Defense holds individuals in Afghanistan in a safe, secure, and humane environment. The primary focus of DoD detainee operations in Afghanistan is to secure detainees from harm, recognizing the reality that the U.S. Armed Forces continue to engage in combat in Afghanistan.

The Department of Defense operates theater internment facilities at Kandahar and Bagram. These facilities house enemy combatants identified in the war against al-Qaida, the Taliban and their affiliates. The Department of Defense has registered with the ICRC individuals held under its control in Afghanistan. ICRC has access to these DoD facilities and conducts private interviews with detainees. In addition, the U.S. Armed Forces operates forward operating bases that, from time to time, may house on a temporary basis individuals detained because of combat operations against al-Qaida, Taliban, and affiliated forces.

The Department of Defense provides detainees in Afghanistan with adequate food, shelter, clothing, and opportunity to worship. In addition, DoD initiatives will increase available resources for literacy and education training. The Department of Defense also gives Afghani detainees information regarding the establishment of the new Afghan government, as well as a copy of the Afghan Constitution.

The U.S. Government is also in a process of improving the detention facilities at both Bagram and Kandahar. Improved facilities should be available to detainees later in 2005.

B. Allegations of mistreatment of persons detained by the Department of Defense

1. Introduction

The United States is well aware of the concerns about the mistreatment of persons detained by the Department of Defense in Afghanistan and at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Indeed, the United States has taken and continues to take all allegations of abuse very seriously.

Specifically, in response to specific complaints of abuse in Afghanistan and at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, the Department of Defense has ordered a number of studies that focused, inter alia, on detainee operations and interrogation methods to determine if there was merit to the complaints of mistreatment.

Although these extensive investigative reports have identified problems and proffered recommendations, none of them found that any governmental policy directed, encouraged or condoned these abuses. The reports pertaining to Guantanamo Bay are summarized in Section B.2 below and those pertaining to Afghanistan are summarized in Section B.3 below.

In general, for both Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, these reports have assisted in identifying and investigating all credible allegations of abuse. When a credible allegation of improper conduct by DoD personnel surfaces, it is reviewed, and when factually warranted, investigated. As a result of investigation, administrative, disciplinary, or judicial action is taken as appropriate. Those credible allegations were and are now being resolved within the Combatant Command structure.

Concerns have also been generated by an August 1, 2002, memorandum prepared by the Office of Legal Counsel (OLC) at the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ), on the definition of torture and the possible defenses to torture under U.S. law and a DoD Working Group Report on detainee operations, dated April 4, 2003, the latter of which was the basis for the Secretary of Defense's approval of certain counter resistance techniques on April 16, 2003. The 2002 DOJ OLC memorandum was withdrawn on June 22, 2004 and replaced with a December 30, 2004, memorandum interpreting the legal standards applicable under 18 U.S.C. 2340-2340A, also known as the Federal Torture Statute. See Annex 2.

On March 10, 2005 Vice Admiral Church (the former U.S. Naval Inspector General) released an executive summary of his report, which included an examination of this issue. His Report examined the precise question of "whether DoD had promulgated interrogation policies or guidance that directed, sanctioned or encouraged the abuse of detainees." Church Report, Executive Summary, at 3, released March 10, 2005 (relying upon data available as of September 30, 2005) (at <http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Mar2005/d20050310exe.pdf> (visited March 23, 2005)). In his Report, he wrote that "this was not the case," id., finding that "it is clear that none of the approved policies - no matter which version the interrogators followed - would have permitted the types of abuse that occurred." Id., at 15. In response to intensive questioning before the U.S. Senate Armed Services Committee as to whether the 2002 DOJ memo or subsequently authorized interrogation practices had contributed to individual soldiers committing abuses, he responded that "clearly there was no policy, written or otherwise, at any level, that directed or condoned torture or abuse; there was no link between the authorized interrogation techniques and the abuses that, in fact, occurred." Transcript at 7. Although Vice Admiral Church's investigation is the most comprehensive to date on this issue, it was consistent with the findings of earlier investigations on this point. See, e.g., Army Inspector General Assessment, released July 2004 (at <http://www4.army.mil/ocpa/reports/ArmyIGDetaineeAbuse/index.html > (visited March 1, 2005)).

Vice Admiral Church's finding was also consistent with earlier statements by high-level U.S. officials, including by the previous White House Counsel Alberto Gonzales, who had stated:

> The administration has made clear before and I will reemphasize today that the President has not authorized, ordered or directed in any way any activity that would transgress the standards of the torture conventions or the torture statute, or other applicable laws.
> … [L]et me say that the U.S. will treat people in our custody in accordance with all U.S. obligations including federal statutes, the U.S. Constitution and our treaty obligations. The President has said we do not condone or commit torture. Anyone engaged in conduct that constitutes torture will be held accountable.

Press Briefing by White House Counsel Judge Alberto Gonzales, DoD General Counsel William Haynes, DoD Deputy General Counsel Daniel Dell'Orto and Army Deputy Chief of Staff for Intelligence General Keith Alexander, June 22, 2004, (at <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2004/06/20040622-14.html> (visited February 28, 2005)).

Subsequent to the release of the December 2004 DOJ memo interpreting the Federal Torture Statute, the Deputy Secretary of Defense ordered a "top-down" review within the Department to ensure that the policies, procedures, directives, regulations, and actions of the department comply fully with the requirements of the new Justice Department Memorandum.[18] The Office of Detainee Affairs in the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy coordinates this process of review.

2. Reports of abuses, summary of abuse investigations and actions to hold persons accountable - Guantanamo Bay

As described above in the introductory section, there have been multiple reports resulting from/investigations concerning the treatment of detainees at Guantanamo Bay. For example, the Naval Inspector General reviewed the intelligence and detainee operations at Guantanamo Bay to ensure compliance with DoD orders and policies. The review, conducted in May 2004, concluded that the Secretary of Defense's directions with respect to humane treatment of detainees and interrogation techniques were fully implemented. The Naval Inspector General documented eight minor infractions involving contact with detainees as stated below (two additional incidents occurred after this investigation was completed). In each of those cases, the chain of command took swift and effective action. Administrative actions ranging from admonishment to reduction in grade.[19]

In a subsequent report, the Naval Inspector General engaged in a comprehensive review of DoD detention operations and detainee interrogation operations covering not only Guantanamo, but Iraq and Afghanistan. This report expanded upon his earlier finding with respect to interrogation operations at Guantanamo, noting that while "there have been over 24,000 interrogation sessions since the beginning of interrogation operations, there are only three cases of closed, substantiated interrogation-related abuse, all consisting of minor assaults in which MI interrogators, exceeded the bounds of approved interrogation policy." Church Report, Executive Summary, at 14, released March 10, 2005 (using data as of September 30, 2004) (at <www.defenselink.mil/news/Mar2005/d20050310exe.pdf> (visited March 23, 2005)). He highlighted that "[w]e found no link between approved interrogation techniques and detainee abuse." Id., at 13.

One investigation remains ongoing and will be completed soon. On December 29, 2004, the Commander U.S. Southern Command appointed a General Officer to investigate the facts and circumstances surrounding allegations of detainee abuse contained in documents recently released under the Freedom of Information Act, including those released by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and to conduct an inquiry into any credible allegation contained in those documents.

Therefore, although there have been allegations of serious abuse of detainees at Guantanamo Bay, the United States has not found evidence substantiating such claims. Instead, it has identified 10 substantiated incidents[20] of misconduct at Guantanamo:

- A female interrogator inappropriately touched a detainee on April 17, 2003 by running her fingers through the detainee's hair, and made sexually suggestive comments and body movements, including sitting on the detainee's lap, during an interrogation. The female interrogator received a written admonishment and additional training;

- On April 22, 2003, an interrogator assaulted a detainee by directing military policemen repeatedly to bring the detainee from a standing to a prone position and back. A review of medical records indicated superficial bruising to the detainee's knees. The interrogator received a letter of reprimand;

- A female interrogator, at an unknown date, in response to being spit upon by a detainee, assaulted the detainee by wiping red dye from a red magic marker on the detainee's shirt and telling the detainee that the red stain was blood. The interrogator received a verbal reprimand for her behavior;

- In October 2002, an interrogator used duct tape to tape shut the mouth of a detainee who was being extremely disruptive during an interrogation. The tape did not harm the detainee and the interrogator received a verbal reprimand for his behavior;

- A military policeman (MP) assaulted a detainee on September 17, 2002, by attempting to spray him with a hose after the detainee had thrown an unidentified, foul-smelling liquid on the MP. The MP received non-judicial punishment that included seven days restriction and reduction in grade from Specialist (E-4) to Private First Class (E-3);

- On March 23, 2003, after a detainee threw unidentified liquid on an MP, the MP sprayed the detainee with pepper spray. The MP declined non-judicial punishment,[21] and he was subsequently tried by special court-martial where he was acquitted of all charges;

- On April 10, 2003, after a detainee had struck an MP in the face (causing the MP to lose a tooth) and bitten another MP, the MP struck the detainee with a handheld radio. This MP was given non-judicial punishment, received 45 days extra-duty, and was reduced in grade from Specialist (E-4) to Private First Class (E-3);

- On January 4, 2004, an MP platoon leader received an initial allegation that one of his guards had thrown cleaning fluid on a detainee and later made inappropriate comments to the detainee. The platoon leader, however, did not properly investigate the allegation or report it to his chain of command. The initial allegation against the guard ultimately turned out to be substantiated. The MP was given non-judicial punishment and received forfeiture of pay of $150 per month for two months and reduction in grade from Private (E-2) to Private (E-1). The platoon leader was issued a reprimand for dereliction of duty;

- On February 10, 2004, an MP inappropriately joked with a detainee, and dared the detainee to throw a cup of water on him. After the detainee did so, the MP threw a cup of water on the detainee. The MP was removed from further duty because of these inappropriate actions;

- On February 15, 2004, a barber intentionally gave two detainees unusual haircuts, including an "inverse Mohawk," in an effort to frustrate the detainees' request for similar haircuts as a sign of unity. The barber and his company commander were both counseled because of this incident.

The above list of substantiated abuses and the subsequent punishment of those responsible at Guantanamo Bay demonstrates that misconduct will not be tolerated.

3. Reports of abuses, summary of abuse investigations and actions to hold persons accountable - Afghanistan

The United States acted swiftly in response to allegations of serious abuses by DoD personnel in Afghanistan. There have been 23 investigations into allegations of abuse of detainees in Afghanistan, of which 22 were substantiated and one was unsubstantiated. Seven investigations are open and continue to be investigated. As of March 1, 2005, penalties have varied and include 2 courts-martial, 10 non-judicial punishments, and two reprimands. A number of actions are still pending.

What follows are a few examples of substantiated abuses and a summary of the status:

- The investigations into the death of two detainees (Mr. Mullah Habibullah and Mr. Dilawar) at the Bagram detention facility on December 4 and 10, 2002 identified 28 military members who may have committed offenses punishable under the UCMJ.

Investigations determined that the detainees had been beaten by several military members. Commanders are considering the full range of administrative and disciplinary measures, including trial by court-martial. As of this writing, charges have been preferred against two military members;

- The Naval Criminal Investigation Service (NCIS) opened an investigation in May 2004 involving allegations of an Afghan police officer who claimed he was abused in while under coalition control in Gardez and Bagram. This investigation remains open.

As described in the Introduction to this Section, there have been multiple important substantive reports resulting from investigations into alleged detainee abuse in DoD facilities in Afghanistan, none of which found a governmental policy directing, encouraging, or condoning abuse:

- Major General Ryder's report

  This assessment of detention operations was completed on November 6, 2003. His report covered specific operations in Iraq and Afghanistan relating to the conduct of detention operations, identifying some difficulties and making some recommendations.

- Army IG Assessment

  The Army Inspector General (IG), LTG Mikolashek, released a report in July 2004 that reviewed U.S. Army detainee operations in Afghanistan and Iraq. As a part of this review, the Army IG inspected internment, detention operations, and interrogation procedures. The inspection was not an investigation into specific incidents but rather a comprehensive review of how the Army conducts detainee operations in those two countries. The Army IG found that the Army is properly accomplishing its mission with regard to the capture, care, and custody of detainees, and in its interrogation operations. Although cases of abuse were noted and numerous recommendations were made, the Report found that there was no systemic problem in detainee handling or flawed policy, doctrine, or training, and that the overwhelming majority of leaders and subordinate personnel understand and adhere to the requirement to treat detainees humanely and consistent with the laws of land warfare. The Report considered the abuse cases to be the result of individual instances of indiscipline, and not representative of policy, doctrine, or training. This report was released in July 2004. This report is available at http://www4.army.mil/ocpa/reports/ArmyIGDetaineeAbuse/index.htm (visited March 1, 2005).

- Jacoby Review

  In May 2004, Lieutenant General Barno, Commander, Combined Forces Command-Afghanistan, initiated an inspection of detainee operations in his area of responsibility in Afghanistan. The inspection was conducted by Brigadier General Jacoby during the period May 19 through June 26, 2004. The primary purpose of this inspection was to ascertain the standard of treatment provided to persons detained by U.S. forces throughout the detention process from capture to release or detention. The Jacoby report did not disclose new allegations of abuse or misconduct. The consistent and overarching observation that flowed from the inspection was that forces assigned to the command understood the concept of humane treatment and were providing humane treatment to detainees consistent with the principles of the Geneva Conventions.

- Church Report

On May 25, 2004, the Secretary of Defense directed the Naval Inspector General at that time, Vice Admiral Albert T. Church, III, to conduct a comprehensive review of DoD Detention Operations and Detainee Interrogation Techniques in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, Iraq, and Afghanistan. The Executive Summary of the Report was released on March 10, 2005, and relied upon data available as of September 30, 2004. Vice Admiral Church found that "the vast majority of detainees held" under DoD control "have been treated humanely, and that the overwhelming majority of U.S. personnel have served honorably." Executive Summary at 21. He found that "without exception, that the DoD officials and senior military commanders responsible for the formulation of interrogation policy evidenced the intent to treat detainees humanely which is fundamentally inconsistent with the notion that such officials or commanders ever accepted that detainee abuse would be permissible." Id, at 3. Although noting a number of "missed opportunities in the policy development process," for example, that "no specific guidance on interrogation techniques was provided to the commanders responsible for Afghanistan and Iraq…," he concluded that "authorized interrogation techniques have not been a causal factor in detainee abuse." Id., at 13, 21. He could not identify a single overarching reason for abuse but addressed the stressful combat situation, particularly at the point of capture, commenting that "a breakdown of good order and discipline in some units could account for some incidents of abuse." Id., at 16. Although he candidly pointed out: "[d]issemination of interrogation policy in Iraq and Afghanistan was generally poor and interrogators fell back on their training and experience, often relying on a broad interpretation of Army Field Manual F.M. 34-52," he continued, "[w]hile these problems of policy dissemination and compliance were certainly cause for concern, we found that they did not lead to the employment of illegal or abusive interrogation techniques." Id., at 10. He found that interrogators knew that abusive behavior was prohibited. Id., at 10, 15. The Executive Summary of this Report is available online (at www.defenselink.mil/news/Mar2005/d20050310exe.pdf (visited March 23, 2005)).

- Naval Inspector General Report

On January 13, 2005, the Deputy Secretary of Defense directed the Naval Inspector General, Vice Admiral Route, to review documents related to detainees recently released under the Freedom of Information Act, including those released by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and to conduct an inquiry into any credible allegations contained in those documents with respect to Afghanistan and Iraq. The Naval Inspector General will take any additional actions with respect to these documents, as he deems appropriate. The report is expected to be finalized soon.

IV. TRAINING OF U.S. ARMED FORCES

Personnel assigned to detention operations go through an extensive professional and sensitivity training process to ensure they understand the procedures for protecting the rights and dignity of detainees.

- Personnel mobilizing to detention operations receive training prior to deployment on detention facility operations, self-defense, safety, and rules on the use of force. Before beginning work, personnel again receive training on the law of armed conflict, the rules of engagement, the Standard Operating Procedures, military justice, and specific policies applying to detention operations in their area of responsibility. This is true of all service members deploying to serve in detention operations. All U.S. service members receive general training on the law of armed conflict, including the Geneva Conventions, as well as further law of armed conflict training commensurate with their duties;

- During their operational tours, U.S. service members continue to receive briefings and are briefed again before every detainee movement on the rules, procedures, and policies in operating detention facilities;

- Mobile training teams are visiting and training at every field detention site to conduct training as required by commanders on the proper handling of detainees;

- All interrogators and counterintelligence personnel are required to undergo 10 days of in-theater certification training. This certification process ensures all applicable standards are understood and enforced;

- Cultural awareness training is conducted for all military personnel during pre-deployment train-up and periodically while in the theater of operations;

- The Combat Training Centers operated by the U.S. Armed Forces in the United States and Germany include the synchronization and integration of detainee operations into every military unit's training rotation prior to deployment. The U.S. Army Military Police School sends a Mobile Training Team to conduct "train the trainer" education for their observer controllers on detainee operations. This training covers detainee operations, personal safety, forced cell movements, restraint procedures, communications with detainees, and case studies;

- It is a violation of the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) for military personnel to abuse detainees and to fail to report instances of abuse. DoD personnel are trained on this requirement and briefed regularly on their responsibilities and the appropriate treatment of detainees, including the duty to report mistreatment.

PART TWO

INDIVIDUALS UNDER THE CONTROL OF U.S. ARMED FORCES IN IRAQ CAPTURED DURING MILITARY OPERATIONS

I. BACKGROUND ON U.S. MILITARY OPERATIONS IN IRAQ

The United States has approximately 150,000 U.S. military personnel currently deployed in Iraq as a part of the United Nations Security Council-authorized Multi-National Force in Iraq (MNF-I). This force includes 28 other nations and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (which is providing training support) that are contributing approximately 25,000 military personnel to conduct stability operations in Iraq. Recognizing the importance of Iraq's successful transition to a democratically elected government and aware that the situation in Iraq continues to pose a threat to international peace and security, the Security Council authorized MNF-I to "take all necessary measures to contribute to the maintenance of security and stability in Iraq …" U.N. S.C. Res. 1546 (June 8, 2004). (At http://daccessdds.un.org/doc/UNDOC/GEN/N04/381/16/PDF/N0438116.pdf?OpenElement (visited March 5, 2005)). MNF-I plays a key role in supporting first the Iraqi Interim Government and now the Iraqi Transitional Government (ITG) in its effort to stabilize the current security situation to allow democracy and freedom to take root.

In January 2005, Iraq held its first democratic elections since the collapse of the Saddam Hussein regime. Even though Iraq has elected a National Assembly, there are still many hostile forces in Iraq that seek to thwart the country's transition to democracy and the rule of law by destabilizing the country through hostile armed attacks against civilian targets and MNF-I forces in Iraq. Saddam loyalists, former Baathists, international terrorists, and Islamic jihadists - knowing that they cannot win at the ballot box - have sustained a terrorist campaign designed to spread fear and instability.

MNF-I and Iraqi forces remain actively engaged in combating these hostile forces across Iraq. An essential tool in the effort to contain and end the violence is the ability of MNF-I to capture and detain hostile forces. UN Security Council Resolution 1546 authorizes MNF-I to take all necessary measures to contribute to the maintenance of security and stability in Iraq in accordance with the letters to the President of the Security Council from Dr. Ayad Allawi and Secretary of State Colin Powell. The letter from Secretary Powell noted the MNF-I's readiness to undertake those tasks necessary to counter the security threats posed by forces seeking to influence Iraq's future through violence, including the internment of individuals "where this is necessary for imperative reasons of security...." (At http://daccessdds.un.org/doc/UNDOC/GEN/N04/381/16/PDF/N0438116.pdf?OpenElement (visited March 5, 2005)). In addition, because hostilities are ongoing, MNF-I may continue to detain enemy prisoners of war ("EPWs"). MNF-I may also continue to detain civilian internees who were detained prior to June 28, 2004, as long as their detention remains necessary for imperative reasons of security. Finally, in accordance with UN Security Council Resolution 1546 and the authorities contained in Coalition Provisional Authority Memorandum No. 3 (Revised) (at http://cpa-iraq.org/regulations/20040627_CPAMEMO_3_Criminal_Procedures__Rev_.pdf (visited March 1, 2005)), which continues in effect under the Transitional Administrative Law (TAL), MNF-I may apprehend individuals who are suspected of having committed criminal acts and who are not considered security internees. MNF-I may retain such criminal detainees in its facilities at the request of appropriate Iraqi authorities.

II. DETAINEES - CAPTURING, HOLDING, AND/OR RELEASING

A. Brief overview of the detainee population held by MNF-I

As of April 1, 2005, MNF-I was detaining approximately 10,000 persons in Iraq. The vast majority of the detainee population is composed of individuals who are held for imperative reasons of security, consistent with UN Security Council Resolution 1546. In addition to security internees, the MNF-I holds a small number of enemy prisoners of war (EPWs) and, on behalf of the ITG, a number of persons suspected of violating Iraqi criminal laws. The MNF-I has established several detention facilities in various locations throughout Iraq that are operated by the U.S. Army under the Commander, MNF-I. The U.S. Army operates three theater internment facilities: Abu Ghraib (Baghdad Central Correction Facility), Camp Cropper, and Camp Bucca.

B. Status review of detainees

Detainees under DoD control in Iraq undergo the review process described herein in order to confirm their status and ensure that they are being lawfully detained. Upon capture by a detaining unit, a detainee is moved as expeditiously as possible to a theater internment facility. A military magistrate reviews an individual's detention to assess whether to continue to detain or to release him or her. If detention is continued, the Combined Review and Release Board assumes the responsibility for subsequently reviewing whether continued detention is appropriate.

With regard to individuals detained on suspicion of having committed criminal acts, those individuals must be handed over to Iraqi authorities as soon as reasonably practicable, but may be held by MNF-I at the request of appropriate Iraqi authorities based on security or detention facility capacity considerations. If MNF-I retains custody at the request of appropriate Iraqi authorities, CPA Memorandum No. 3 (Revised) establishes a series of procedural protections for the detainee, including the right to remain silent, to consult with an attorney within 72 hours, to be promptly informed in writing of charges, to be brought before a judicial officer within 90 days, and to be visited by the ICRC. (At http://cpa-Iraq.org/regulations/20040627_CPAMEMO_3_Criminal_Procedures__Rev_.pdf (visited March 1, 2005)).

C. Decisions on continued detention or release of detainees

The Combined Review and Release Board (CRRB) was created to provide detainees a method by which to have their detention status reviewed. The CRRB first met on August 21, 2004. It consists of nine members: three MNF-I officers, and two members each from the Iraqi Ministry of Justice, Ministry of Interior, and Ministry of Human Rights.

The CRRB meets and reviews detention cases several times per week and reviews approximately 100 detainee files at each meeting. Consistent with the Geneva Conventions, the case of each detainee who remains in MNF-I custody is reviewed at least once every six months. The CRRB reviews the status of each detainee and recommends one of three options: release, conditional release, or continued detention. A detainee may file an appeal of internment to the CRRB for its consideration.

III. DETAINEES - TREATMENT

A. Description of conditions of detention in U.S. Department of Defense facilities

The primary goal of U.S. detention operations in Iraq has been to operate safe, secure, and humane facilities consistent with the Geneva Conventions. U.S. and other MNF-I forces continue to make physical improvements to various facilities throughout Iraq. Since the incidents of abuse at Abu Ghraib, the United States has made substantial improvements in all areas of detention operations, including facilities and living conditions. Families may visit detainees at visitation centers set up at each detention facility. Detainees are provided with prayer materials and allowed the open and free expression of religion in detention. Detainees also have access to medical facilities, consistent with the Geneva Conventions.

As set forth in CPA Memorandum No. 3 (Revised), and consistent with the provisions of the Geneva Conventions, the ICRC is provided with notice of detainees under the control of the U.S. contingent of MNF-I as soon as reasonably possible and is provided access to such detainees unless reasons of imperative military necessity require otherwise.

B. Allegations of mistreatment of persons detained by the Department of Defense

1. Legal framework

As noted above, UN Security Council Resolution 1546 provides authority for MNF-I security operations in Iraq, including detention operations. The United States contingent to MNF-I conducts its detention operations consistent with the Geneva Conventions, including pursuant to CPA Memorandum No. 3 (Revised), for operations after June 28, 2004. The Geneva Conventions prohibit the torture or inhumane treatment of protected persons. U.S. Armed Forces in Iraq are instructed to act consistently with these provisions with regard to all detainees and to treat all detainees humanely. Detainees under the control of U.S. Armed Forces receive shelter, food, clothing, water, and medical care, and are able to practice their religion.

U.S. military interrogators are instructed to conduct interrogations consistent with the Geneva Conventions. Further, military regulations strictly regulate permissible interrogation techniques. DoD policy prohibits the use of force, mental and physical torture, or any form of inhumane treatment during an interrogation.

Army Regulation (AR) 190-8 provides policy, procedures, and responsibilities for the administration and treatment of enemy prisoners of war (EPW), retained personnel (RP), civilian internees (CI), and other detainees in the custody of U.S. Armed Forces. (At <http://www.usapa.army.mil/pdffiles/r190_8.pdf>(visited March 1, 2005)). A.R. 190-8, paragraph 1-5 provides:

General Protection Policy

a. U.S. policy, relative to the treatment of EPW, CI and RP in the custody of the U.S. Armed Forces, is as follows:

(1) All persons captured, detained, interned, or otherwise held in U.S. Armed Forces custody during the course of conflict will be given humanitarian care and treatment from the moment they fall into the hands of U.S. forces until final release or repatriation.

(2) All persons taken into custody by U.S. forces will be provided with the protections of the 1949 Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War (GPW) until some other legal status is determined by competent authority.

(3) The punishment of EPW, CI, and RP known to have, or suspected of having committed serious offenses will be administered [in accordance with] due process of law and under legally constituted authority per the GPW, [the 1949 Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War], the Uniform Code of Military Justice and the Manual for Courts Martial.

(4) The inhumane treatment of EPW, CI, and RP is prohibited and is not justified under the stress of combat or with deep provocation. Inhumane treatment is a serious and punishable violation under international law and the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ).

DoD Directive 5100.77 further requires that all possible, suspected, or alleged violations of the law of war committed by United States persons be promptly reported, thoroughly investigated, and, where appropriate, remedied by corrective action. December 9, 1998, (at <http://www.dtic.mil/whs/directives/corres/pdf2/d510077p.pdf > (visited February 28, 2005)). For instance, U.S. forces are subject to the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ), which provides that those who commit acts of abuse, whether or not during an armed conflict, are criminally liable for their actions. Article 93 of the UCMJ provides: "Any person subject to this chapter who is guilty of cruelty toward, or oppression or maltreatment of, any person subject to his orders shall be punished as a court-martial may direct." A member of the U.S. forces suspected of mistreating or abusing persons in U.S. detention is subject to prosecution under this and other applicable UCMJ articles.[22]

In the context of detainee abuse cases, however, not every potentially applicable offense under the UCMJ has a parallel federal offense in the U.S. Code. For example, Failure to Obey a Lawful Order or Regulation (Article 92, UCMJ) and Dereliction of Duty (Article 92, UCMJ) have no comparable federal offenses in this context. Additionally, the Federal Torture Statute requires a much higher level of proof than does Article 93 of the UCMJ, which punishes cruelty and maltreatment of prisoners.

Interrogation techniques are developed and approved to ensure compliance with legal and policy requirements. Throughout the conflict in Iraq, military, policy, and legal officials have met and continue to meet regularly to review interrogation policy and procedures to ensure their compatibility with applicable domestic and international legal standards. The United States will continue to review and update its interrogation techniques in order to remain in full compliance with applicable law.

2. Reports of abuses and summary of abuse investigations

Allegations of detainee abuse at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq became known with incidents documented in photographs and reported in the media throughout the world. These photographs, which depict acts of abuse and mistreatment of detainees by certain members of the U.S. Armed Forces in Iraq, were abhorrent to the people of the United States and others around the world. These incidents, which to date could implicate 54 military personnel, involved blatant violations of the UCMJ and the law of war. The United States deeply regrets these abuses. Indeed, on May 6, 2004, the President of the United States said that he "was sorry for the humiliation suffered by the Iraqi prisoners and the humiliation suffered by their families" and that "the wrongdoers will be brought to justice…." Remarks by President Bush and His Majesty King Abdullah II of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan (at <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2004/05/20040506-9.html> (visited March 1, 2005)).

In response to these allegations of abuse, the U.S. Government has acted swiftly to investigate and take action to address the abuses. The United States is investigating allegations of abuse thoroughly and making structural, personnel, and policy changes necessary to reduce the risk of further such incidents. All credible allegations of inappropriate conduct by U.S. personnel are thoroughly investigated. A rapid response to allegations of abuse, accompanied by accountability, sends an unequivocal signal to all U.S. military personnel and the international community that mistreatment of detainees will not be tolerated under any circumstances. To the extent allegations of misconduct have been levied against private contractors, the U.S. Department of Justice has conducted or initiated investigations. For example, following the reports at Abu Ghraib, the Department of Justice received referrals from Military Investigators regarding contract employees and their potential involvement in the abuses. DOJ subsequently opened an investigation.

At the direction of the President, the Secretary of Defense, and the military chain of command, nine different senior-level investigative bodies convened to review military policy from top-to-bottom in order to understand the facts in these cases and identify any systemic factors that may have been relevant. The assignment of these entities was to identify and investigate the circumstances of all alleged instances of abuse, review command structure and policy, and recommend personnel and policy changes to improve accountability and reduce the possibility of future abuse.

The United States has ordered a number of studies and reports subsequent to allegations of mistreatment in Iraq, particularly at Abu Ghraib. Again, as described in Part One of this Report, it is impossible to characterize and summarize fully these reports, but it can be stated that although these investigations identified problems and made recommendations, none found a governmental policy directing, encouraging, or condoning the abuses that occurred. What follows is a brief summary of each of the investigative reports:

- Miller Report

  Major General Miller's report on detention and interrogation operations in Iraq was completed on September 9, 2003. General Miller's report assessed the conditions and operations of detention facilities in Iraq.

- Ryder Report

  Major General Ryder's assessment of detention operations in Iraq was completed on November 6, 2003, as described in Part 1, Section III.B.3. General Ryder's report covered specific operations in Iraq and Afghanistan relating to the conduct of detention operations.

- Taguba Report

  Major General Taguba completed his investigation into detainee operations and the 800th Military Police Brigade on March 12, 2004. This report focused primarily on the allegations of detainee abuse at the Abu Ghraib detention facility arising from disclosures made by U.S. service members.

- The Army Inspector General Report

  The Army Inspector General conducted a review of alleged detainee abuse committed by U.S. Army personnel in Iraq and Afghanistan, which was released in July 2004, as described in Part 1, Section III.B.3. (At <http://www4.army.mil/ocpa/ reports/ArmyIGDetaineeAbuse/ DAIG%20Detainee%20Operations%20Inspection%20Report.pdf> (visited March 1, 2005)).

- Report by Major General Fay, Lieutenant General Jones, and General Kern

  This was completed on August 13, 2004. This report covered Military Intelligence (MI) and DoD contractor interrogation policies in Iraq. This report revealed that 27 military personnel or civilians appeared to have abused Iraqi prisoners due to criminal activity or confusing interrogation rules. Twenty-three military intelligence personnel and four civilian contractors were alleged to be involved in abuse. Eight others, including six military officers and two civilians, were alleged to have learned of the abuse and to have failed to report the abuse to authorities. This report found 44 cases of abuse. In an interview after the report's release, General Kern told reporters, "We found that the pictures you have seen, as revolting as they are, were not the result of any doctrine, training or policy failures, but violations of the law and misconduct." (At http://www.defenselink.mil/transcripts/2004/tr20040825-1224.html (visited April 5, 2005)). The report found that the abuses were carried out by a small group of "morally corrupt" soldiers and civilians and caused by a lack of discipline by leaders and soldiers of the brigade and a "failure or lack of leadership by multiple echelons" within a unit within the U.S. military forces in Iraq. See Report at 2. This report was publicly released and can be found online (at <http://news.findlaw.com/hdocs/docs/dod/fay82504rpt.pdf> (visited February 28, 2005)).

- Schlessinger Report

  This Report was completed in August 2004. The Secretary of Defense named a panel of four distinguished former public officials, including two former Secretaries of Defense, to evaluate the areas under review in the ongoing investigations and to determine if there was a need for additional areas of investigation. The Report found that "[n]o approved procedures called for or allowed the kinds of abuse that in fact occurred. There is no evidence of a policy of abuse promulgated by senior officials or military authorities." See Report at 5. It stated that "the most egregious instances of detainee abuse were caused by the aberrant behavior of a limited number of soldiers and the predilections of the non-commissioned officers on the night shift of Tier 1 at Abu Ghraib," although noting that "commanding officers and their staffs at various levels failed in their duties and that such failure contributed directly or indirectly to detainee abuse." See Report at p. 43. This report was publicly released and can be found online (at <http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Aug2004/ d20040824finalreport.pdf> (visited February 28, 2005)).

- Formica Report

  Brigadier General Formica initiated a report on May 15, 2004 that focuses on allegations of abuse by Special Operations Forces in Iraq. The investigation is complete. The report's contents are classified because of the highly sensitive operations that were examined and that remain ongoing.

- Church Report

  Vice Admiral Church's comprehensive review of DoD Detention Operations and Interrogation Techniques was completed on March 10, 2005 and is described in Part One, Section III.B.3. of this Annex. The Executive Summary of the Report is available at <http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Mar2005/d20050310exe.pdf> (visited March 23, 2005).

- Naval Inspector General Report

  The Naval Inspector General (Vice Admiral Route) is conducting a review of documents related to detainees recently released under the Freedom of Information Act and is expected to release his findings soon as described in Part 1, Section III.B.3.

From the nine reports that have been completed, it is clear that serious abuses occurred, but it is also clear that the vast majority of the 150,000 military personnel who that have been stationed in Iraq have conducted themselves honorably. The U.S. Armed Forces is committed to ensuring that those who committed abuses are accountable and that such abuses do not occur again.

It is important to remember that the U.S. Armed Forces began the process of assessing detainee operations, investigating allegations of abuse, and implementing changes at Abu Ghraib, well before the media and the international community began to focus on detainee abuse at that facility. Both before and after the public disclosure of these abuses, the United States pursued swift and thorough investigations of problems.

In conducting the major reviews, the United States reached out broadly, interviewed more than 1,700 people, and compiled more than 13,000 pages of information to address detainee abuse. Much of this information is publicly available. In an effort to be transparent and keep the public and our government informed, the Department of Defense delivered more than 60 briefings to the U.S. Congress.

The Department of Defense has improved its detention operations in Iraq and elsewhere, improvements have been made based upon the lessons learned, and in part because of the broad investigations and focused inquiries into specific allegations. These comprehensive reports, reforms, investigations and prosecutions make clear the commitment of the Department of Defense to do everything possible to ensure that detainee abuse such as occurred at Abu Ghraib never happens again.

Finally, the highest levels of the Department of Defense are reviewing and acting on all of the reports and investigations. The Department has established an inter-departmental committee, called the Senior Leadership Oversight Committee, that comprises senior members of the Joint Staff, the Provost Marshal General's Office, the Office of Detainee Affairs, and the Military Departments engaged in detention operations.

This group is specifically responsible for ensuring that the recommendations of the panels and investigations are followed through to their conclusion, and for monitoring changes made by combatant commands and the relevant offices in the Department of Defense. To date, the committee has met three times and has reviewed more than 600 recommendations. The Department has already implemented a significant number of recommendations and is examining the remainder of them. The Oversight Council will continue to meet on a periodic basis until the recommendations of the investigations and panels have been addressed fully.

3. Summary of actions to hold persons accountable

The Department of Defense takes all allegations of abuse seriously and investigates them. Those people who are found to have committed unlawful acts are held accountable and disciplined as the circumstances warrant. Investigations are thorough and have high priority.

Some criminal investigations have been completed and others continue with respect to abuse of detainees in Iraq. Although it would be inappropriate to comment on the specifics of on-going investigations, as of March 1, 2005, 190 incidents of abuse have been substantiated.

Some are minor, while others are not: penalties have ranged from administrative to criminal sanctions, including 30 courts-martial, 46 non-judicial punishments, 15 reprimands, and 15 administrative actions, separations, or other administrative relief. A number of actions are pending.

Some examples of service members convicted at a court-martial[23] for acts related to detainee maltreatment include:

(1) A Staff Sergeant, charged with numerous offenses related to maltreatment of detainees at the Abu Ghraib Detention Facility, pled guilty on October 21, 2004, at a General Court-Martial to conspiracy, maltreatment of detainees, simple battery, and indecent acts. The Military Judge sentenced him to 10 years confinement, total forfeitures of pay and allowances, reduction from Staff Sergeant (a non-commissioned officer rank) to the lowest enlisted grade (enlisted grade of Private), and discharge from the U.S. Army with a dishonorable discharge. Because of a plea agreement, the Staff Sergeant will ultimately be confined for eight years, if he cooperates with future prosecutions per the plea arrangement.

(2) A Sergeant, charged with numerous offenses related to maltreatment of detainees at the Abu-Ghraib Detention Facility, pled guilty on February 4, 2005, to battery, dereliction of duty, and false official statement. A court-martial panel sentenced him to confinement for 6 months, reduction to the lowest enlisted grade, and discharge from the U.S. Army with a bad conduct discharge.

(3) A Specialist charged with conspiracy to maltreat subordinates, dereliction of duty, and maltreatment of detainees at the Abu Ghraib Detention Facility, pled guilty to all charges at a Special Court-Martial on May 19, 2004. The Military Judge sentenced him to confinement for a period of 12 months, reduction in rank to the lowest enlisted grade, and a discharge from the U.S. Army with a bad conduct discharge.

(4) A Specialist, charged with numerous offenses related to maltreatment of detainees at the Abu Ghraib Detention Facility, was convicted on January 7, 2005, by a 10-member panel of five counts, including assault, maltreatment, and conspiracy. He was sentenced to 10 years confinement, total forfeitures of all pay and allowances, reduction to the lowest enlisted grade, and a dishonorable discharge from the U.S. Army.

(5) A Specialist, charged with participating in and directing the abuse of two Iraqi detainees by handcuffing the detainees together naked at the Abu Ghraib Detention Facility, was tried at a Special Court-Martial on September 1l, 2004, and convicted of conspiracy to maltreat detainees and the maltreatment of the detainees. The Specialist was sentenced to confinement for eight months, a reduction to the lowest enlisted grade, and a bad conduct discharge from the U.S. Army.

Over the course of 2005, substantially more information will become public on these matters as accountability processes come to completion. Accordingly, the United States will be prepared to present further information on the status of its investigations and prosecutions during its presentation of this Report to the Committee Against Torture.

C. Remedies for victims of abuse

The United States is committed to adequately compensating the victims of abuse and mistreatment by U.S. military personnel in Iraq. The U.S. Army is responsible for handling all claims in Iraq. Several claims statutes allow the United States to compensate victims of misconduct by U.S. military personnel. The primary mechanism for paying claims for allegations of abuse and mistreatment by U.S. personnel in Iraq is through the Foreign Claims Act (FCA), 10 U.S.C. § 2734. Under the FCA, Foreign Claims Commissions are tasked with investigating, adjudicating, and settling meritorious claims arising out of an individual's detention. There are currently 78 Foreign Claims Commission personnel in Iraq. Claims may be submitted to the claims personnel, who regularly visit detention facilities, or they may be presented to the Iraqi Assistance Center. For persons with U.S. residency, claims may be brought pursuant to the Military Claims Act, 10 U.S.C. § 2733. All allegations of detainee abuse are investigated by the U.S. Army Claims Service (USARCS), and the Department of the Army Office of the General Counsel is the approval authority.

In addition, the Secretary of Defense has directed the Secretary of the Army to review all claims for compensation based on allegations of abuse in Iraq and to act on them in his discretion. In instances where meritorious claims are not payable under the FCA or the MCA, the Secretary of the Army is responsible for identifying alternative authorities to provide compensation and either to take such action or forward the claim to the Deputy Secretary of Defense with a recommendation for action.

IV. TRAINING OF U.S. ARMED FORCES

As discussed in the section on training in Part 1, Section IV, of this Annex, U.S. Armed Forces receive significant training before being deployed and during their deployment. The United States incorporates by reference that section and reiterates that all employees and Armed Forces deployed in detention missions receive extensive training and education on the laws and customs of armed conflict, including humane treatment procedures and the obligations of the United States in conducting detention operations. With respect to Iraq, U.S. Armed Forces serving as interrogators and detention personnel are also trained to conduct themselves in accordance with the principles (including the prohibition on torture) set forth in the Geneva Conventions and to treat detainees humanely regardless of status.

Since allegations of abuse became known, corrections specialists are now stationed at detention facilities to provide additional skills and experience to the detention mission. In addition, the Department of Defense is developing procedures and policies to ensure that contractors used by the Department receive training and understand the U.S. Government's commitments and policies before being deployed in detention operations.

V. LESSONS LEARNED AND POLICY REFORMS

It is clear that certain individual service members committed serious abuses during U.S. detention operations in Iraq. Apart from proceedings to hold accountable the perpetrators of abuse, the U.S. Armed Forces have been studying the larger question of how to ensure that these types of abuses will not occur in the future. The nine detainee reports released to date have made more than 300 recommendations for short and long-term changes to improve detainee handling, accountability, investigation, supervision, and coordination. Further investigations remain in progress. The Office of the Secretary of Defense, the Military Departments, the Combatant Commands, and the Joint Staff have each taken concrete steps to implement many of these changes and will continue to do so.

The Department of Defense has responded to the abuses committed by taking steps designed to improve senior-level supervision and coordination of detainee matters. The Secretary of Defense has:

- Established a Detainee Affairs office overseen by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Detainee Affairs;
- Established a Joint Detainee Coordination Committee on Detainee Affairs;
- Issued a policy for "Handling of Reports from the International Committee of the Red Cross";
- Issued a policy on "Procedures for Investigations into the Death of Detainees in the Custody of the Armed Forces of the U.S."; and
- Initiated a department-wide review of detainee-related policy directives.

Other steps that the Department of Defense has taken include:

- Designation of a Major General as Deputy Commanding General for Detainee Operations, MNF-I. He is the Department's primary point of contact with the Iraqi Transitional Government for detainee operations. He is responsible for ensuring that all persons captured, detained, interned, or otherwise held in under MNF-I control are treated humanely and consistent with the Geneva Conventions and all applicable law from the moment they fall into the hands of U.S. forces until their final release from MNF-I control or their repatriation. He ensures that it is made clear that inhumane treatment is prohibited and is a punishable violation under the Uniform Code of Military Justice. All service members have an obligation to report allegations of detainee abuse to the responsible command or law enforcement agency;
- The posting of the Geneva Conventions and Camp rules in a language the detainee can understand;
- Ensuring widespread publication of the findings of reports and investigations by publishing unclassified information on the Department of Defense website http://www.defenselink.mil. The Department has established an entire sub-site on detainee operations.

[8] The data on grants of asylum by DHS (former INS) were compiled by U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) of the U.S. Department of Homeland Security and reflect decisions on applications, including those filed by principal applicants on behalf of themselves and family members. Accordingly, these statistics do not reflect the number of actual individuals who are granted asylum by DHS. The data on grants of asylum and withholding of removal by immigration judges were compiled by EOIR and reflect the actual numbers of individuals who were granted asylum or withholding of removal, as EOIR evaluates each individual claim separately. The data compiled by EOIR represent decisions taken by Immigration Courts; accordingly, they do not include decisions on cases appealed to the Board of Immigration Appeals. As a result, the data do not necessarily represent the final disposition on these cases.

[9] The carve out from the expanded definition of the SMTJ provided by 18 U.S.C.§7(9) for those as defined by MEJA, was the result of a legislative compromise to avoid the applicability of the complex MEJA provisions relating to initial appearances and removals to the United States. The SMTJ and MEJA statutes each provide a separate basis for asserting U.S. jurisdiction, and the legislative intent was to keep these jurisdictional bases separate and distinct, not to co-mingle them.

[13] This was the first time that we knew that al-Qaida attacked U.S. military forces directly. There are other instances of violence, however, such as the June 1996 attack on Khobar Towers killing 19 U.S. service members, which bin Ladin called a "praiseworthy act of terrorism."

[14] As the Supreme Court recently made clear in Hamdi, the United States may detain enemy combatants, including U.S. citizens who are enemy combatants, for the duration of hostilities. The Court held that Congress has authorized such detentions. Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 124 S.Ct. 2633, 2639-42 (2003). Notably, hostilities in Afghanistan have not yet ended.

[15] See, e.g., Secretary Rumsfeld's statement that the detainees "are not POWs" and instead are "unlawful combatants." Gerry J. (At <http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Jan2002/n01272002_200201271.html> (visited April 11, 2002)).

[16] The U.S. Supreme Court, citing numerous authoritative international sources, has held that unlawful combatants "are subject to capture and detention, [as well as] trial and punishment by military tribunals for acts which render their belligerency unlawful." See Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1, 31 (1942) (citing GREAT BRITAIN, WAR OFFICE, MANUAL OF MILITARY, ch. xiv, §§ 445-451; REGOLAMENTO DI SERVIZIO IN GUERRA, § 133, 3 LEGGI E DECRETI DEL REGNO D'ITALIA (1896) 3184; 7 MOORE, DIGEST OF INTERNATIONAL LAW, § 1109; 2 HYDE, INTERNATIONAL LAW, §§ 654, 652; 2 HALLECK, INTERNATIONAL LAW (4th Ed. 1908) § 4; 2 OPPENHEIM, INTERNATIONAL LAW, § 254; HALL, INTERNATIONAL LAW, §§ 127, 135; BATY & MORGAN, WAR, ITS CONDUCT AND LEGAL RESULTS (1915) 172; BLUNTSCHI, DROIT INTERNATIONAL, §§ 570 bis).

[17] Article 5 states:

> "Should any doubt arise as to whether persons, having committed a belligerent act and having fallen into the hands of the enemy, belong to any of the categories enumerated in Article 4, such persons shall enjoy the protection of the present Convention until such time as their status has been determined by a competent tribunal." No. 3364, 75 U.N.T.S. 135, Signed at Geneva on Aug. 12, 1949; entered into force on Oct. 21, 1950 (entered into force for the United States, Feb. 2, 1956).

[19] See 10 U.S.C. § 815. The intent of nonjudicial punishment (colloquially referred to as an "Article 15" or "Captain's Mast") is to provide the commander with enough latitude to resolve a disciplinary problem appropriately in order to maintain "good order and discipline" within the unit. Nonjudicial punishment is designed for minor offenses. It allows a commander to correct, educate, and reform offenders while simultaneously preserving the service member's record of service from unnecessary stigma and furthering military efficiency. A service member is provided appropriate due process rights when considered for nonjudicial punishment. The service member has the right to consult with counsel, the right to remain silent, turn down the nonjudicial punishment and, in turn, possibly face trial by court-martial (unless attached to or embarked upon a vessel), request an open hearing, a spokesperson to speak on the service member's behalf at the hearing, examine all available evidence, present evidence and call witnesses, and, if nonjudicial punishment is imposed, the right to appeal.

[20] There has also been an investigation in response to a request by the Australian Government following claims of mistreatment of two Australian detainees at Guantanamo. Although not initially substantiated, the Naval Criminal Investigative Service is conducting an independent investigation into these allegations of abuse.

[22] A member, or former member, of the U.S. Armed Forces, who is either a national of the United States, or later present in the United States, who, while outside the United States, commits acts that meet the definition of torture under the relevant statute (18 U.S.C. §2340) is subject to federal prosecution under 18 U.S.C. §2340A, if not previously prosecuted for the same offense under the UCMJ.

A member of the U.S. Armed Forces who, while outside the United States, commits a crime that would constitute a felony if committed within the Special Maritime Territory Jurisdiction (SMTJ), and does so with one or more other defendants, at least one of whom is not subject to the UCMJ, is subject to federal prosecution. Similarly, a former member of the U.S. Armed Forces, who has ceased to be subject to the UCMJ, but who was subject to the UCMJ at the time that he was outside the territory of the United States and committed a crime that would be a felony if committed within the SMTJ, is subject to federal criminal prosecution.

[23] U.S. Armed Forces are subject to the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ), which provides that those who commit acts of abuse, whether or not during an armed conflict, may be held criminally liable for their actions. Article 93 of the UCMJ provides: "Any person subject to this chapter who is guilty of cruelty toward, or oppression or maltreatment of, any person subject to his orders shall be punished as a court-martial may direct." A member of the U.S. Armed Forces who is suspected of mistreating or abusing persons in U.S. detention is subject to prosecution under this and other applicable UCMJ articles.

Other charges that may apply will depend on the circumstances of the abuse. For example, U.S. Armed Forces may be charged with assault, Article 128, UCMJ, or if the abuse results in the death of a detainee, Article 118, Murder, or Article 119, Manslaughter, or Article 134, Negligent Homicide. For allegations of abuse involving theft of money or other possessions from a detainee, U.S. Armed Forces may be charged with Article 121, Larceny. For allegations of sexual assault, U.S. Armed Forces may be charged with Article 120, Rape, Article 125, Sodomy, or Article 134, Indecent Assault.

Yes, I think it would be good for a text box, so long as it does not unduly delay getting the report to Allyson.

Lou de Baca just proposed a good idea for the report but I am afraid that time may have run out and so want to run it by you. He suggested that since we highlight a task force (Houston) and an NGO (CAST) it may be a good idea to highlight a survivor (affiliated with the Coalition of Immokolee Worker) that participates in CRT human trafficking training workshops. Lou is crafting a few lines in case you think it is worth inserting in a "text box."

Lou de Baca just proposed a good idea for the report but I am afraid that time may have run out and so want to run it by you. He suggested that since we highlight a task force (Houston) and an NGO (CAST) it may be a good idea to highlight a survivor (affiliated with the Coalition of Immokolee Worker) that participates in CRT human trafficking training workshops. Lou is crafting a few lines in case you think it is worth inserting in a "text box."

Rena Comisac hopefully will have transferred the report to you sometime today. Would appreciate your input on its substance and, somewhat pressingly but less importantly, whether we have the green light to use a POTUS photo. Document will have to be sent to the printer's next week and for some reason photos need to be set in place even before the text is finalized! Many thanks. NMG

I now have a CD from Omar Vargas that I assume contains the report you're referencing. As for the photo, I'm told that you will need to get sign off from the WH Photo Office, but that shouldn't be a problem.
Please have someone involved in the production call the Photo Office (456-6709) and put in the request. The office can also email over a high resolution version (or whatever you need) of a certain photo.

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House To Launch "Political Campaign" To Defend NSA Wiretapping. USA Today (1/23, Jackson, 2.31M) reports, "The White House launches a political campaign this week, not for a candidate but for a controversial program: warrantless surveillance of some U.S. citizens by the National Security Agency." President Bush "plans to defend the program in a counterterrorism speech today at Kansas State University, aides said." The speech "will kick off a flurry of administration activity leading to Senate hearings scheduled for Feb. 6." White House spokesman Scott McClellan said, "We are stepping up our efforts to educate the American people about this vital tool in the war on terrorism." Bush and aides "plan to repeat arguments they have made before: This is a limited program that kicks in only when one of the parties is beyond US borders and has some kind of link to the al-Qaeda terrorist organization." Just before Bush's speech today in Manhattan, KS, "Gen. Michael Hayden plans to discuss the surveillance program at the National Press Club. Hayden, the principal deputy director of national intelligence, once headed the National Security Agency, which conducts the surveillance." Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "is scheduled to address the issue in a speech Tuesday, McClellan said. On Wednesday, the president plans to visit the NSA headquarters at Fort Meade in Maryland."

Under the headline "Delicate Dance For Bush In Depicting Spy Program As Asset," the New York Times (1/23, Nagourney, 1.19M) reports, "With a campaign of high-profile national security events set for the next three days, following Karl Rove's blistering speech to Republicans on Friday," the White House "has effectively declared that it views its controversial secret surveillance program not as a political liability but as an asset, a way to attack Democrats and re-establish…Bush's standing after a difficult year." The Times adds, "Whether the White House can succeed depends very much, members of both parties say, on its success in framing a complicated debate when the country is torn between its historic aversion to governmental intrusion and its recent fear of terrorist attacks at home." Polls "suggest that Americans are divided," but "as the White House and Democrats are well aware, the issue can draw very different reactions depending on how it is presented. These next few days could prove critical, as both Mr. Bush and Congressional Democrats move aggressively to define what is at stake."

Yesterday, lawmakers appeared on the political talk shows to comment on the controversy. Reuters (1/23, Kenen) says "Democrats and some Republicans have said the Bush administration's classified warrantless eavesdropping program is illegal," while the AP (1/23, Yen) also covers the lawmakers' comments, saying "several" of them "said Sunday they will press…Bush to justify his decision to allow domestic eavesdropping, rebuffing GOP suggestions their criticism of broad executive authority puts the nation at risk." The AP adds, "During the Sunday talk shows, lawmakers were responding to efforts by White House aide Karl Rove to make national security the top partisan issue in the November midterm elections." Rove "made the comments about the time that new audiotape warnings by Osama bin Laden were released, threatening an upcoming attack on the US."

Lawmakers "from both parties" called "for Congress to consider whether new restrictions were needed on government surveillance in suspected terrorism cases involving people in the United States," says the Los Angeles Times (1/23, Richter, 958K). Congress, adds the Times, "is deeply divided on whether the Bush administration acted illegally in carrying out warrantless eavesdropping on communications in hopes of detecting terrorist plots," but "several influential lawmakers said Congress should play a larger role in determining how the surveillance should be run." McClellan "issued a written response to lawmakers' comments on the talk shows. 'Senate Democrats continue to engage in misleading and outlandish charges about this vital tool that helps us do exactly what the 9/11 commission said we needed to do -- connect the dots,' McClellan said.

Asked on ABC's This Week (1/22, Stephanopoulos) to say whether he agreed with former Vice President Al Gore that the use of the NSA for domestic surveillance "may be an impeachable offense" which deserves to be investigated by a special counsel, Sen. John Kerry replied, "I agree that we ought to have a special counsel investigate. I agree that we ought to have an independent commission because this Congress has proven itself unwilling to do what's necessary to perform its responsibilities." The Washington Times (1/23, Hudson, 90K) reports Kerry also "called the National Security Agency's program to eavesdrop on terror suspects illegal, but he said he will continue to support its funding." Kerry "was asked by host George Stephanopoulos, 'If you think this is a clear violation of the law, why not move to cut off funding for the program?' 'That's premature,' Mr. Kerry responded.'

Rep. Jane Harman, also on ABC's This Week (1/22, Stephanopoulos), responded, saying, "I have been part of this so-called Gang of Eight since 2003, and, yes, I have been briefed. … I have raised objections to the Gang of Eight procedure in formal hearings of our committee and all over the place. I also asked a lot of questions in the meetings, the most recent of which was last Friday for two hours." Harman went on to say, "On the process: I think the administration is violating the National Security Act of 1947 by failing to brief the full intelligence committees. … On the program, I believe we should be fully briefed. We should decide…whether the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act is being violated in any way by this program."

Sen. Charles Schumer was asked on CNN's Late Edition (1/22, Blitzer) to respond to footage of Vice President Cheney saying, "These actions are within the president's authority and responsibility under the constitution and laws, and these actions are vital to our security" in reference to the NSA domestic surveillance program. Schumer said, "We do have to be strong in the war on terror, and…Democrats aren't going to take a back seat to anybody on that. But…we can be both strong and have the rule of law. And a large number of people, not just Democrats, Republicans like John McCain, Sam Brownback, Arlen Specter have said they have real doubts about whether what the president did conformed to the law."

Sen. John McCain, asked on Fox News Sunday (1/22, Wallace), if he agrees that President Bush "has the legal authority to engage in these warrant-less wiretaps," replied, "I don't think so, but why not come to Congress? We can sort this all out. … I think they will get that authority, whatever is reasonable and needed, and increased abilities to monitor communications are clearly in order."

Commenting on the NSA domestic surveillance program Chairman of the House Intelligence Committee Peter Hoekstra, on ABC's This Week (1/22, Stephanopoulos), said, "When the program began…congressional leaders were brought in -- the leadership of the House and the Senate, the leadership of the House and Senate intelligence committees…I've been briefed four times on this. … I've been given every opportunity to ask questions about the program, to ask questions about the legality of the program, to understand the scope of the program and how it works and, most importantly, the impact it has. … And we're having a discussion about whether we need to expand the number of members on the committee that are briefed into the program."

Pentagon's Domestic Spying Program May Have Violated Regulations. Newsweek (1/30, Isikoff) reports on the Pentagon's Counterintelligence Field Activity, noting that its role is "'force protection' -- tracking threats and terrorist plots against military installations and personnel inside the United States." According to Newsweek, there are now "questions about whether CIFA exceeded its authority and conducted unauthorized spying on innocent people and organizations. A Pentagon memo obtained by NEWSWEEK shows that the deputy Defense secretary now acknowledges that some TALON reports may have contained information on U.S. citizens and groups that never should have been retained. The number of reports with names of U.S. persons could be in the thousands, says a senior Pentagon official who asked not be named because of the sensitivity of the subject." Newsweek adds, "It isn't clear how many groups and individuals were snagged by CIFA's dragnet. … CIFA researchers apparently cast a wide net and had a number of surveillance methods…at their disposal." Pentagon officials "have broadly defended CIFA as a legitimate response to the domestic terror threat. But at the same time, they acknowledge that an internal Pentagon review has found that CIFA's database contained some information that may have violated regulations."

Technology Changes Face Of Eavesdropping. The AP (1/23, Fordahl) reports, "In the past, intercepting communications meant just that -- copying a telegram mid-route, steaming open an envelope or attaching alligator clips to the copper wires that connected every telephone in the world. … But the old ways of communicating are heading into the sunset like the Pony Express and being replaced by phone calls, instant messages, e-mail and more that are converted into digital data before they gallop across the Internet and other advanced networks." The AP continues, "This constant interchange of massive amounts of data, converging into speeding bitstreams on common pipes, is both a blessing and a curse for eavesdroppers. … It's easier than ever to access wholesale feeds of data. But such work is also more controversial than traditional wiretapping, as seen in objections to post-9/11 warrantless domestic surveillance and to regulatory moves to require networks to be tap-friendly." The AP adds, "Critics question whether safeguards put in place a quarter century ago following FBI wiretapping misconduct are strong enough to prevent abuse in the 21st century. Others fear the information superhighway is turning out to be a fast path to mass surveillance. … 'The thing that really should worry people is that once the capability is there, people will abuse it,' said Jennifer Granick, executive director of Stanford University's Center for Internet and Society. 'The opportunity for abuse is so much greater, because so much more of our private information is transmitted over the network.' … Always a hot topic, the debate over wiretapping is further fueled today not only by the knowledge of what's possible but also by a dearth of details of what's actually happening. … What makes the White House surveillance program…a cause of such concern is that it skirts existing laws and employs techniques resembling a wide-mouthed vacuum before the fine-toothed combs can be wielded."

More Commentary. The Washington Post (1/23, A14, 744K) editorializes, "Especially without knowing the parameters of the surveillance, we hesitate to second-guess the president's argument that FISA's limits are unduly constraining." The surveillance "may be critical for national security, and a law written in a different technological age may well need to be refurbished. But the proper way to handle that -- which the administration rejected -- would have been to seek changes in the law, not to do a stealthy end run around the legislative process. In such an amorphous, long-running conflict as the war against terrorism, it's critical to ensure that limits are in place to prevent the executive branch from overreaching."

Columnist bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (1/23, 1.19M), "Have you ever talked sexy to your wife or your girlfriend -- or your husband or your boyfriend -- on the telephone? Would you keep talking if you thought that one of Dick Cheney's operatives was listening in? Talk about a chilling effect. … Freedom of speech in the United States covers matters trivial and profound. The corrosive damage that is being done to the First Amendment, that cornerstone of free speech, has been largely overlooked in the controversy over…Bush's decision to permit the government to eavesdrop without warrants on phone calls and e-mail messages inside the United States."

Deported Muslims Back In US For Lawsuit Against Officials, Guards. The New York Times (1/23, Bernstein, 1.19M) reports, "Hundreds of noncitizens were swept up on visa violations in the weeks after 9/11, held for months in a much-criticized federal detention center in Brooklyn as 'persons of interest' to terror investigators, and then deported. This week, one of them is back in New York and another is due today - the first to return to the United States." They are "no longer the accused but the accusers, among six former detainees who are coming back to give depositions in their federal lawsuits against top government officials and detention guards, at a time when the constitutionality of part of the government's counterterrorism offensive is under new scrutiny." The Times adds, "As in the cases of all the Muslim immigrants rounded up in the New York area after the terror attacks, the six were never accused of a crime related to 9/11; officials eventually cleared all of them of links to terrorism. A report by the inspector general of the Justice Department found systemic problems with immigrant detentions and widespread abuse at the federal detention center where the six had been held; several guards have since been disciplined."

US Law Firms Offering Free Legal Advice To Guantanamo Detainees. U.S. News and World Report (1/30, Bedard) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that "some 57 American law firms are offering free legal advice to more than 150 'enemy combatants' held at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. A list provided to Whispers shows several prominent shops, many of which brag about their efforts on their websites. The pro bono service, organized by the Center for Constitutional Rights, is under the gun in conservative legal circles and some military offices that suggest it's bad form to help alleged terrorists while also working for clients involved in the war on terrorism like Boeing and General Dynamics."

Bin Laden Tape Seen As Effort To Exploit US War-Weariness. Newsweek (1/30, Hirsh, Hosenball, Yousafzai) reports on the audiotape released last week by Osama bin Laden, calling it "a cynical attempt to exploit American war-weariness, especially in Iraq." By offering a "a long-term truce on fair conditions," bin Laden "seemed to be trying to close the gap. All America had to do was withdraw from Arab lands." Newsweek also notes that some US officials "said they would not be terribly surprised if bin Laden were suing for peace. Other terrorism analysts suggested that, at a time when bin Laden's rival and sometime partner in Iraq, Abu Mussab al-Zarqawi, has offended many Muslims with his ruthless tactics, the Qaeda chieftain's main message was 'I'm still the main man.' Bin Laden may have been trying to appear reasonable and merciful to his own followers by playing the peacemaker."

Time (1/30, Ghosh) adds, "The U.S. believes the 10-minute taped message…was probably recorded sometime since November, partly because of a reference to British newspaper reports from that time about a purported proposal by President Bush to bomb al-Jazeera. The tape suggested that bin Laden is alive, if not quite well. A longtime bin Laden watcher, French terrorism expert Roland Jacquard, speculates that the decision not to release a videotape may reflect a desire to conceal the deterioration of his physical condition." Time also notes that bin Laden's resurfacing "has come at a time when the leadership of al-Qaeda appears to be under as much strain as at any time since the fall of the Taliban in 2001. Antiterrorism experts say the Saudi-born terrorist is no longer in active contact with field commanders, and his ability to plan and direct specific operations is hampered by his isolation."

US Believes Predator Attack In Pakistan Killed Senior Al Qaeda Members. Newsweek (1/30, Hirsh, Hosenball, Yousafzai) reports that the CIA and the Defense Department 'have stepped up missile strikes inside Pakistani tribal regions." Recently, a CIA-guided Predator drone "fired missiles at houses in the village of Damadola," killing at least 18 people. US officials "remained confident that the dead included some senior Qaeda members, and Pakistani authorities maintained that four to five Qaeda operatives were killed in the missile attack. … Civilians are another matter. The Predator killed several women and children, provoking demonstrations in the tribal region, many of them organized by the radical Pakistani Islamic alliance known as Muttehida Majlis Amal."

Newsweek (1/30, Hirsh, Hosenball, Yousafzai) adds, "Authority to fire Hellfire missiles from Predators has been delegated by the White House to the CIA, according to current and former counterterrorism officials who did not want to be named because the matter is classified. If officials conducting surveillance believe there is a strong chance of civilians' being killed in an attack, operatives are expected to consult higher-ranking agency officials before firing. In the case of the Damadola attack, according to a knowledgeable source who spoke on condition of anonymity because the subject was sensitive, CIA officials made the decision to launch the attack themselves. But they notified higher-ups in the administration, including White House officials, who had enough time to veto the strike if they wanted."

Time (1/30, Ghosh) reports, "A Peshawar-based Pakistani intelligence official speaking on condition of anonymity says Washington has an understanding with Islamabad that allows the U.S. to strike within Pakistan's border regions -- providing the Americans have actionable intelligence and especially if the Pakistanis won't or can't take firm action. Pakistan's caveat is that it would formally protest such strikes to deflect domestic criticism. Some ranking Pakistani officials deny such an agreement exists."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Reports Critical Of CIA Withheld From Agency's Web Site. U.S. News and World Report (1/30, Kaplan) reports, "The CIA's Center for the Study of Intelligence is one of the agency's most open branches. … But since 2003, at least three unclassified CSI reports -- all critical of the agency -- have been withheld from the CIA's website, U.S. News has learned. During that same time, the agency has placed online three other CSI reports, all of those relatively positive or neutral. Among the documents withheld: a tough 69-page report, 'Curing Analytic Pathologies.' The study, published quietly in December, argues that reform efforts have centralized authority but failed to change the intelligence community's core problem -- 'dysfunctional behaviors and practices within the individual agencies.' A second report, 'Analytic Culture in the U.S. Intelligence Community,' was published last May and found the nation's intelligence analysts isolated and lacking overseas experience and training in research techniques. A third report, 'Intelligence for a New Era in American Foreign Policy,' from 2004, is the record of an unclassified conference of intelligence veterans, several of whom made comments sharply critical of the intelligence community." While the three reports are available by mail through the CIA's public-affairs office," the CIA "declined to say why the reports are not posted online nor would it provide a full list of the center's unclassified publications."

TSA May Check Passenger Financial Records. USA Today (1/23, Frank, 2.31M) reports the Registered Traveler program "may require passengers to agree to a check of their personal and financial records, the Transportation Security Administration said. The TSA said it will require 'in-depth security background checks' that may involve 'using commercial data' for people applying to the…program that starts in June. The checks will help verify people's identities to prove they have no ties to terrorism." However, "Business Travel Coalition Chairman Kevin Mitchell said the databases 'are notoriously inaccurate' and could mistakenly label someone a terrorist. 'It raises a huge liability issue,' said Mitchell, who supports Registered Traveler." Meanwhile, "Congress barred the TSA from using commercial data on airline passengers after a government probe criticized the agency last year for improperly storing 100 million records on travelers when it said no data storage would occur. The TSA says the ban does not apply to Registered Traveler because the program is voluntary and the background checks would be done by companies at an airport."

Private Airports Resist Proposal To Restrict Airspace Around DC Permanently. The Washington Times/AP (1/22, Manning) reports that "as the TSA and other federal agencies weigh whether to" permanently restrict zones of airspace around Washington, DC, a group of "private airport operators in the Washington region are pushing for changes in rules that they say unfairly punish harmless private pilots in an overzealous effort to protect Washington." The "three, 60-mile wide overlapping rings" of restricted airspace were "initially temporary, but the FAA is weighing whether to make it a permanent regulation and is taking public comment through Feb. 6. Most private pilots, who could face fines or suspension of their licenses for violating the air space, don't want the zones to stay. The FAA has received more than 20,000 comments on the proposal."

Chertoff's Coattails Extend To Highest Levels Of Administration. The Legal Times (1/23, McLure) reports, "After a rocky year, things are looking brighter for some protégés of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff." The Times continues, "On Jan. 4, President George W. Bush granted a recess appointment to Julie Myers, making the 36-year-old former Chertoff chief of staff the head of Homeland Security's 15,000-employee Immigration and Customs Enforcement. … Just a day earlier, Alice Fisher, Chertoff's former deputy at the Justice Department who now heads the DOJ's Criminal Division, had been on national television touting the guilty plea federal prosecutors had extracted from Jack Abramoff. … That guilty plea had been won by a team of career prosecutors supervised by Noel Hillman, the head of the DOJ's public integrity section who was first hired by Chertoff as a federal prosecutor during Chertoff's tenure as U.S. attorney in New Jersey." The Times adds, "On the surface it would seem that Myers, Fisher, and Hillman, among others, have basked in the reflected glory of Chertoff, who once enjoyed, by Washington standards, a stainless reputation as a straight-shooting, mob-busting, former prosecutor turned general in the war on terror. … But Hurricane Katrina dented Chertoff's armor, leading critics to call into question his leadership at the DHS. And criticism of the response to Katrina as well as terror policies promulgated under Chertoff during his time at Justice has also tarred his understudies — some of whom were forced to claim their positions through the back door of presidential recess appointments. … Their successes — and their travails — provide a window into how one lawyer's high-flying career in public service can both open doors for and complicate the lives of his loyal aides and assistants."

Residents Of Renewed Oklahoma City Generally Unfazed By Fortier Release. Under the headline "Oklahoma City Moves Past Its Infamous Bombing," The Christian Science Monitor (1/23, Axtman, 61K) reports that "as time goes on, wounds heal, memories fade, and hearts soften. At some point in the past decade, Oklahoma City began to look forward instead of back" at the 1995 bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah federal building. "That may be the reason why Michael Fortier's release from prison Friday after serving more than a decade for his role in the bombing sent relatively few ripples through the community. While it's painful to learn of his freedom, some say, their lives no longer revolve around the details of that April day. Their city, in many ways, has been freed from its own prison -- through prayer and urban renewal. … Officials say the bombing…galvanized residents and created a sense of pride about the city. That, in turn, fueled the urban progress."

Residents Returning To New Orleans Overwhelm Emergency Rooms. The New York Times (1/23, Barringer, 1.19M) reports New Orleans' emergency rooms "are facing their own emergency. As thousands of residents have begun returning in the weeks since New Year's, there are far more sick people than there are doctors, nurses, beds and equipment to take care of them." The Times notes, "only seven of what had been 15 adult acute-care facilities in the city and three surrounding parishes are open, and only one-third of the acute-care beds. Hundreds or perhaps thousands of doctors and nurses never returned to New Orleans after the flood; long-term and psychiatric hospitals, not to mention hospices and rehabilitation centers, are now almost nonexistent in and around the city." Meanwhile, "The thought of next month's Mardi Gras festivities has local doctors so worried they have formed a committee just to plan for care during the first large-scale, signature event in the distorted post-hurricane world."

Expert Likely To Investigate Whether Patients Were Euthanized In New Orleans. USA Today (1/23, Johnson, 2.31M) reports, "Louisiana authorities investigating whether patients were euthanized at New Orleans-area hospitals after Hurricane Katrina probably will appoint a new medical consultant because the Pennsylvania coroner assisting the inquiry was indicted on federal charges Friday. Kris Wartelle, spokeswoman for Louisiana Attorney General Charles Foti, said the indictment of coroner Cyril Wecht will not slow the state inquiry into more than 200 deaths at hospitals and nursing homes after Katrina hit Aug. 29." Meanwhile, "Wecht's work in Louisiana was not addressed in the indictment, which among other things accuses him of trading unclaimed bodies at the Allegheny County morgue to a local university's research program in exchange for laboratory space to expand his consulting business."

"Louisiana Speaks" Forums Held For Hurricane Refugees. The Washington Times (1/23, 90K) reports, "Hurricane refugees from Louisiana told federal and state officials at forums across the South yesterday that what they want most when their state is rebuilt is affordable housing, better schools and stronger levees. Some refugees at the 'Louisiana Speaks' forums also worried that officials have no real plans to restore certain areas, such as New Orleans' impoverished Lower 9th Ward." The forums are sponsored by the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Louisiana Recovery Authority. "Input…will be incorporated in a long-term regional plan for rebuilding South Louisiana after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita."

WAR NEWS:

Bush's Decision On Iraq War Called Return To US "Dominant Tradition." In its cover package, U.S. News and World Report (1/30, Barone) examines "the picture we have of the way America, and American presidents, go to war. It comports with what we think happened in World War I and, especially, in World War II. In this view of U.S. history, American presidents lead the nation only into wars that are forced upon them. There's only one problem. This picture is almost entirely contrary to the facts. Critics of George W. Bush like to say that Iraq was a war of choice -- a conflict that could have been avoided. But almost all American wars have been, to a greater or lesser degree, wars of choice. It is said that Bush went to war in Iraq without sufficient forces, without a game plan for the occupation, and without an exit strategy. Even if all those charges are true, then he has plenty of company in American history." Bush's decision to go to war in Iraq "a return to the dominant tradition of our history. The United States has never been an isolationist nation; Americans and American military forces have been roaming the globe since the Revolutionary War. Until the 20th century, the oceans seemed to protect the American homeland from attack, but not always."

Wartime Records Of Bush 43, 41 Compared. In a separate story in its cover package, U.S. News and World Report (1/30, Walsh) compares the wartime records of President Bush and his father, former President George H.W. Bush, noting that "there are more differences than similarities in their role as commander in chief. The 41st president was a coalition builder and a diplomat. The 43rd president was willing to go it alone and ignore international opprobrium. The first Bush had a sense of limits about American power. His son believes the military is his best tool for working his will abroad. The two men made the case for war in different fashion as well. It is true the father's job was easier than his son's. Saddam Hussein had invaded Kuwait and was an unmistakable threat. Nonetheless, George Herbert Walker Bush tried to build consensus at home and abroad before starting the Gulf War. George W. Bush made his case in a more controversial way, arguing for a pre-emptive strike to depose Saddam." US News adds, "It is striking that the son rarely cites his father as his role model as commander in chief. George W. Bush says the world has changed dramatically since his father's tenure, largely because of 9/11 and the threat posed by terrorists. The challenges he faces, he says, are unique." US News also notes, "The senior Bush felt equipped…to challenge both the military and his advisers. George W. Bush seems more accepting of the advice of his in-house 'experts.'"

Bush Has Gotten "Broad Pass" On Expansion Of Executive Power. A separate story in U.S. News and World Report's (1/30, Tolson) cover package considers "just how imperial" the American president can be. Disclosures about Bush's "support for a National Security Agency-run domestic-spying program have pushed those questions to the fore once again. … Bush, so far, has gotten a broad pass on his amplification of the commander in chief's prerogatives, which many Americans view as justified in the name of the war on terrorism. But there are growing signs of resistance."

Bill Clinton Says President Should Not Micromanage Military Operations. In another story in its cover package, U.S. News and World Report (1/30, Walsh) interviews former President Bill Clinton about his views "on what it takes to lead during times of conflict and at times of peace." On "directly supervising the military and the issue of 'micromanagement' during a crisis," Clinton said, "Generally, it is best not to micromanage military operations, though in some cases it is unavoidable. For example, after the accidental bombing of the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade because of outdated maps, I had daily meetings to go over the proposed targets for the next day. On a few occasions, I disagreed with the military's choices, but wherever possible I tried to set policy and let them decide how best to carry it out." On "how much he relied on his senior military advisers," Clinton said, "I relied heavily on my military advisers for tactical advice. On the question of whether to use force, I sought their advice but made the final decisions myself, sometimes disagreeing with them, as in Kosovo and Haiti."

Sunni Political Block Commits To Talks With Shiite, Kurdish Groups. Reuters (1/23) reports, "Iraq's biggest Sunni political bloc committed itself on Sunday to talks with Shi'ites and Kurds to form a government of national unity, but said its key demands, including changes to the constitution, must be met." The United States "wants the Kurds and majority Shi'ites, who dominated last month's elections, to form a government that includes minority Sunnis. It hopes an inclusive coalition will undermine the raging Sunni Arab insurgency." The Iraqi Accordance Front, "which comprises three mainly Islamist Sunni Arab groups," said "it would appeal against the results of an election it believes was rigged but would still take part in talks on a new coalition government."

The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Boudreaux, 958K) that "a leader of Iraq's largest Sunni Arab political bloc said Sunday that he would shun any government that included officials responsible for police brutality against his minority sect, a stand aimed at removing the powerful Shiite interior minister." Tariq Hashimi of the Iraqi Accordance Front "spelled out its conditions for entering a 'national unity' administration after most Iraqi leaders called for such an outcome in order to quell the Sunni Muslim-led insurgency." Hashimi "said his Sunni bloc's first condition for entering the government was a guarantee of personal security for Sunnis, who he said had suffered abuse by the transitional regime's Interior Ministry police." He "set other terms: He demanded an end to official corruption, a 'charter of honor' that renounces sectarian and ethnic strife, an agreement to set a timetable for withdrawal of US forces, and a promise 'not to hamper' constitutional changes demanded by Sunnis to prevent the Shiite and Kurdish regions from dominating Iraq's oil wealth."

USA Today (1/23, Jervis, 2.31M) adds that "Iraqi election officials announced Friday that the Shiite and Kurdish coalitions won a combined 181 of the 275 seats in parliament, three shy of the two-thirds majority needed to name a new government for the next four years." The two major Sunni blocs, the Iraqi Accordance Front and the Iraqi Front for National Dialogue, "won a combined 55 seats." The Christian Science Monitor (1/23, Levinson, 61K) reports "it was no surprise that religious Shiites dominated the polls." But "the hard numbers have given new steam to Iraq's politicians, who are wheeling and dealing to find enough common ground on which to build the country's first freely elected four-year government." In a process that "could stretch into April, Iraq's factions will decide on a governing program, agree on whether the new Constitution can be changed, and haggle over the crucial positions of president, prime minister, and cabinet ministers."

Obama Calls US Presence "An Irritant" For Iraq. Commenting in his recent visit to Iraq on NBC's Meet the Press (1/22, Russert) Sen. Barack Obama said, "My position has been that it would not be responsible for us to unilaterally and precipitously draw troops down, regardless of the politics, because I think that all of us have a stake in seeing Iraq succeed." Obama added, "I have to emphasize that there is a cost for our presence there. We are an irritant. And we help spur the insurgency, even as we are defending a fledgling Iraqi government against that insurgency." Obama contended that the Sunnis "may feel that in fact the United States is the guy with the club standing behind the Shias and putting them in a position in which they have no power. … I think that what we want to do is we want to reach out to Sunni leadership that clearly has connections to the insurgency."

At Least 23 Iraqis Killed By Insurgents Over Weekend. The AP (1/23, Yacoub) reports, "Insurgents fired rocket-propelled grenades at a policeman's home northeast of Baghdad on Sunday, killing his four children and his brother and raising to at least 23 the number of Iraqis killed in attacks this weekend." Also Sunday, "police found the bullet-riddled bodies of nearly two dozen men abducted last week north of Baghdad after being rejected entry into a police academy, officials said."

Attacks Against Coalition Troops Increased 23% Last Year. USA Today (1/23, Jervis, 2.31M) reports, "The number of attacks against coalition troops, Iraqi security forces and civilians increased 29% last year, and insurgents are increasingly targeting Iraqis, the U.S. military says." Insurgents "launched 34,131 attacks last year, up from 26,496 the year before, according to U.S. military figures released Sunday."

Iraqi Professionals, US Contractors Leaving Iraq. The Washington Post (1/23, A1, Struck, 744K) reports "Iraq's top professionals -- doctors, lawyers, professors -- and businessmen have been targeted by shadowy political groups for kidnapping and ransom, as well as murder, some of them say. So many have fled the country that Iraq is in danger of losing the core of skilled people it needs most just as it is trying to build a newly independent society. … Professionals and businessmen with the means to escape are going to Jordan, Syria, Egypt or, if they have visas, to Western countries. Those left behind say they feel abandoned."

Meanwhile, the Washington Times (1/23, Behn, 90K) says "US private contractors, until now the biggest private-sector employers in Iraq, are preparing to leave as US money runs out and Iraqi ministries take charge of the reconstruction effort." The Times adds, "Most US-funded projects are scheduled to be completed by the end of this year, and it is unlikely that any significant new US funds will be forthcoming. Iraqi government ministries, which will be taking over responsibility for the reconstruction effort, tend to issue much smaller contracts that do not interest large US companies."

US Soldier Says Top Brass Directed Abu Ghraib Abuses. The Washington Post (1/23, A3, White, 744K) reports that Megan Ambuhl, "one of the original seven military police soldiers singled out by the Pentagon for their roles in abusive techniques" at Abu Ghraib, "is speaking out because she believes the truth has been obscured by high-ranking officials intent on covering up a policy of abuse. Though her defense differs little from the arguments made previously by the defendants' attorneys, Ambuhl's first-person description of the macabre world of Abu Ghraib provides a vivid perspective on how things went out of control at the prison outside of Baghdad." Ambuhl "has since married one of her fellow MPs -- Charles A. Graner Jr., the man the military has labeled the ringleader of the abusers -- and is on a mission to secure his release from prison." Ambuhl "says the military's top brass have dodged responsibility for what was going on at the prison by scapegoating her and other low-ranking soldiers. … Ambuhl says she and other MPs used aggressive techniques against detainees because that is what military intelligence soldiers and civilian interrogators told her to do."

US Hopes To Exploit Differences Among Iraqi Insurgent Factions. Time (1/30, McGirk) reports on the January 5 suicide in Ramadi, saying the blast was a "deadly miscalculation" by the group al Qaeda in Iraq. While the attack "killed two U.S. service members and more than 70 Iraqi police recruits," most of the victims "were local Sunnis, and they were joining the police force under the protection of tribal chieftains who, with the U.S. military's approval, are trying to impose order over their violent swath of Iraq." Time adds, "After the Jan. 5 blast, according to insurgents, tribal chiefs in Ramadi notified al-Qaeda that they were withdrawing protection in the city for the group's fighters. The jihadis responded by gunning down several prominent Sunni clerics and tribal leaders. Now al-Qaeda fighters who once swaggered through Ramadi are marked men." US officials in Iraq have tried to exploit the differences among the insurgent factions for months. There are "signs that at least in some parts of Iraq, the tension is boiling over. Iraqi security sources with contacts in the insurgency told TIME that fighting has erupted in several cities that have long been bastions of the resistance, including Fallujah, Samarra, Latifiya and Mahmoudiya. … Some Pentagon decision makers believe that the feuding within the insurgency may help U.S. and Iraqi troops quell the terrorist attacks that have made parts of the country ungovernable."

Iraqi Oil Production Declined For Third Straight Month In December. Newsweek (1/30, Johnson, Hastings) provides a negative view of Iraq's oil production, noting that across Iraq, there is "a major attack on oil facilities about once every three days. December was the third month in a row that Iraqi oil production went down, and it marked the lowest level of exports since the invasion. At a time when global supplies are stretched to their limits, the Iraqi oil bust helps keep world prices near record highs. But most of all, it's a disaster for efforts to get the country back on its feet." Iraqi oil "still isn't flowing at prewar levels." Newsweek adds that there is "certainly no question that the Bush administration, heavily peopled with veterans of the oil industry, focused on the importance of petroleum to Iraq's economy. Even as the rest of Baghdad was opened up to looters in April 2003, the Ministry of Oil was secured by U.S. troops. But no force was put in place to protect the pumps and pipes."

Army Interrogator Convicted Of Negligent Homicide Of Iraqi Detainee. The Washington Post (1/23, A2, White, 744K) reports, "Iraqi general into a sleeping bag during questioning in northern Iraq in 2003 was convicted of negligent homicide and negligent dereliction of duty late Saturday after a military jury in Colorado decided the general's death was not murder." Chief Warrant Officer Lewis E. Welshofer Jr. "was on trial for allegedly killing Iraqi Maj. Gen. Abed Hamed Mowhoush, a high-ranking Saddam Hussein loyalist who was believed to have been fueling the Iraqi insurgency in the Qaim area near the Syrian border." Mowhoush "died while bound in the Army sleeping bag, which was part of an aggressive interrogation tactic aimed at getting the general to talk." The Los Angeles Times (1/22, Riccardi, 958K) and New York Times (1/23, Schmitt, 1.19M) also report the story.

Halliburton Accused Of Exposing US Troops, Civilians To Polluted Water In Iraq. The Washington Post/AP (1/23, A2, Margasak) reports, "Troops and civilians at a US military base in Iraq were exposed to contaminated water last year, and employees for the responsible contractor, Halliburton Co., could not get their company to inform camp residents, according to interviews and internal company documents." Halliburton, "the company formerly headed by Vice President Cheney, disputes the allegations about water problems at Camp Junction City, in Ramadi, even though they were made by its own employees and documented in company e-mails." Sen. Byron Dorgan "is to chair an inquiry session into alleged neglect of water pollution at a U.S. base camp in Iraq."

Confusion Surrounds Question Of Who Will Preside Over Saddam Trial. The New York Times (1/23, Worth, 1.19M) reports, "Two days before the trial of Saddam Hussein is set to resume after a month's recess, confusion surrounds the tribunal that is trying him, with the identity of the judge who will preside in court still uncertain." The judge "who has become the trial's most public face, Rizgar Muhammad Amin, submitted a letter of resignation this month, saying he was fed up with criticism by high-ranking Iraqi officials who wanted him to be tougher with Mr. Hussein. A colleague on the five-judge panel, Said al-Hammash, is prepared to replace Judge Amin if he does not return Tuesday." But "in recent days President Jalal Talabani and other Iraqi leaders, apparently eager to dispel the widespread impression that Judge Amin was forced off the case through political pressure, have urged him to stay on." The tribunal "has not accepted Judge Amin's resignation. An American official who is close to the tribunal said Sunday that he did not know which judge would be presiding." Amin's "potential successor is facing troubles of his own. Last week, a senior Iraqi official petitioned the court to bar Judge Hammash from presiding at the trial, saying the judge was a former member of Mr. Hussein's Baath Party."

At FBI's Request, CBS Withheld Some Details About Iraqi Bomb Makers. The Washington Post (1/23, C1, Kurtz, 744K) reports in its "Media Notes" column, "In reporting last week that the FBI was making progress in identifying the origins of homemade bombs used against Americans in Iraq, CBS News agreed to withhold some details at the bureau's request. Rome Hartman, executive producer of the 'CBS Evening News,' says CBS News President Sean McManus and correspondent Jim Stewart spoke with FBI officials who 'made the case that putting in certain details might in their view jeopardize American lives. They felt very strongly about it.' During a 'very spirited' internal debate, Hartman says, the FBI's case 'felt to me, and to Sean and Jim in the end, to be a pretty persuasive argument. You ought to err on the side of discretion and caution.' Stewart's report mentioned that CBS was withholding part of the story."

No Word On Fate Of Kidnapped American Journalist. NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 5, 1:30, Williams) reported, "In Iraq today, still no update about kidnapped American journalist Jill Carroll. It's been two days since the deadline set by her captors, who threatened to kill her unless the US freed all Iraqi women prisoners."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/23, 61K) reports a delegation from the Council on American-Islamic Relations "arrived in Baghdad Saturday, adding its voice to what is described as an unprecedented outpouring of Muslim support for the release of American reporter Jill Carroll. 'The kidnapping of Jill Carroll does not benefit the kidnappers,' said Nihad Awad, executive director of the Washington-based group that represents US mosques and Islamic associations." At press time Sunday, David Cook, the Monitor's Washington bureau chief, "said that there has been no new information about Ms. Carroll."

The New York Times (1/23, Tavernise, 1.19M) runs a story headlined "Abduction Of US Reporter Underscores Risks In Iraq," a theme also covered in Peter Johnson's column in USA Today (1/23, 2.31M), titled "In Iraq, Specter Of Kidnapping Keeps Journalists On Edge."

In 1998, Pelosi Said Saddam Was Developing WMD. In its "History Lessons" column, the Washington Times (1/23, 90K) excerpts comments by Rep. Nancy Pelosi on December 16, 1998. Pelosi said, "As a member of the House Intelligence Committee, I am keenly aware that the proliferation of chemical and biological weapons is an issue of grave importance to all nations. Saddam Hussein has been engaged in the development of weapons of mass destruction technology which is a threat to countries in the region and he has made a mockery of the weapons inspection process. The responsibility of the United States in this conflict is to eliminate weapons of mass destruction, to minimize the danger to our troops and to diminish the suffering of the Iraqi people."

Pentagon Says Meeting Of Military Commanders Was "Uninhibited Exchange Of Ideas." The Washington Times (1/23, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "Pentagon officials say this month's closed-door conference of the military's top field commanders was gratifying, describing it as an uninhibited exchange of ideas rather than a fixed-agenda meeting monopolized by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. Officials said Mr. Rumsfeld, four-star generals and admirals, and top civilians brainstormed over two main topics: how to fight the war on Islamic terrorists and how to reconfigure the military for future threats." The conference "was composed of the most powerful military men in the world. Besides Mr. Rumsfeld, there were the nine combatant commanders from Europe, the Middle East, Asia and other commands; the four service chiefs; the Joint Chiefs chairman and vice chairman; defense undersecretaries and assistant secretaries; and the services' civilian secretaries."

Reagan Administration Official Criticizes "Disunity Of Command" In Iraq. Bing West, an assistant secretary of defense in the Reagan Administration, writes in the New York Times (1/23, 1.19M), "The lesson the Pentagon should learn from Iraq is to avoid another L. Paul Bremer. This is less a reflection on Mr. Bremer, who accurately described himself as 'the American viceroy' in Iraq and 'the president's man,' than on the position he and the American military commanders in Iraq were placed in by the White House's failure to put one person in charge." West adds that the "disunity of command reached its tragic apex in the spring of 2004, during what Mr. Bremer calls 'the most critical crisis of the occupation.' When four American contractors were killed and their bodies mutilated in Falluja on March 31, Mr. Bremer joined with Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and Gen. John Abizaid, the commander of American forces, in ordering the fractious city seized. Five days later, however, Mr. Bremer changed his mind after Sunni members of the Iraqi Governing Council threatened to quit in protest. He prevailed on General Abizaid to order the Marine battalions that were advancing through Falluja to halt. Mr. Bremer acknowledged that this 'temporary cessation of offensive action' would be 'rough on the military.' Secretary Rumsfeld, for his part, disagreed with the halt and urged General Abizaid to finish the attack. But as the military prepared to end things quickly, Mr. Bremer changed his mind about the 'temporary' cessation. He told President Bush that the assault would 'collapse the entire political process'; the president sided with his viceroy and told General Abizaid 'to let the political situation there develop.' Develop it did. The insurgents' morale soared and their defenses toughened." West concludes, "The singular lesson in war is to put either the civilian viceroy or (better) the general in charge, but not both."

Krugman Says Bush Has Given Up Trying To Win In Iraq. Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (1/23, 1.19M), "In the State of the Union address, President Bush will surely assert, to choreographed applause, that he has a strategy for victory in Iraq. I don't believe him. In fact, I believe that three years into the conflict his administration refuses to admit defeat but has given up even trying to win." Krugman adds, "Power shortages are a crucial issue for ordinary Iraqis, and for the credibility of their government. … Lack of electricity isn't just an inconvenience. It prevents businesses from operating, destroys jobs and generates a sense of demoralization and rage that feeds the insurgency. So why is power scarcer than ever, almost three years after Saddam's fall? Sabotage by insurgents is one factor. But as an analysis of Iraq's electricity shortage in The Los Angeles Times last month showed, the blackouts are also the result of some incredible missteps by U.S. officials. … In short, U.S. officials thoroughly botched their handling of Iraq's electricity sector. They did much the same in the oil sector. But the Bush administration is determined to achieve victory in Iraq, so it must have a plan to rectify its errors, right? Um, no. Although there has been no formal declaration, all indications are that the Bush administration…doesn't plan to ask for any more money for Iraqi reconstruction." The Bush Administration "doesn't have a plan; it's entirely focused on short-term political gain. Mr. Bush is just getting by from sound bite to sound bite, while Iraq and America sink ever deeper into the quagmire."

Pakistani Prime Minister Condemns US Airstrike. The AP (1/23, A2) reports, "Pakistan's prime minister yesterday condemned an American airstrike on a remote Pakistani village, saying such attacks should be cleared with Islamabad first." Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz "said no understanding exists between US and Pakistani officials that allows American military forces to attack alleged terrorists in Pakistan without first consulting the government." Said Aziz, "The understanding is that we will work. … We will work in collaboration with each other."

Incidents On Afghan-Pakistan Border Highlight "Precarious" Anti-Terror Alliance. The Washington Post (1/23, A1, Witte, Khan, 744K) reports from Kabul, "Events along the ever-volatile Afghanistan-Pakistan border this month have exposed deep fault lines in the anti-terrorism alliance among the United States, Afghanistan and Pakistan, and officials on all sides say their joint efforts against militants in the region are now highly precarious." The "heightened tension comes as militant extremists and the United States have both become more aggressive in their tactics, with the Pakistani government caught in between." The Post adds recent incidents "have revealed just how tenuous relations among the countries have become." The Post adds, "Afghan government officials are feeling especially vulnerable now because the United States announced late last year that it would reduce its troop strength from 19,000 to 16,500. NATO soldiers are supposed to fill the gap by taking over some operations in the south, but the Netherlands, seen as pivotal to that transition, has wavered over whether it will send troops." Meanwhile, "the Taliban, al Qaeda and other groups that are trying to destabilize the nascent Afghan government appear to be taking advantage of the uncertainty."

Kerry Says Administration Misled Public On Tora Bora. On ABC's This Week (1/22, Stephanopoulos) Sen. John Kerry was shown a clip of Vice President Cheney saying, "The fact of the matter is, we have not been attacked in more than four years. That is not an accident, it's not just dumb luck." Asked if he agreed with the Vice President's assessment Kerry replied, "No. … The simple fact is that we had Osama bin Laden cornered, trapped, ready to be captured or killed in the mountains of Tora Bora. And this administration -- it is a fact -- has misled Americans about the knowledge they had of whether or not he was there, number one, and, number two, did not do everything that they could have in order to capture him. I know this. Others know this." Kerry went on to say, "So, yes, we have not been attacked here. Many people surmise that one of the reasons we haven't been attacked here is because they are being so successful at doing what they need to do to attack us in Iraq and elsewhere."

McCain Calls Lack Of Attack Since 9/11 "Indicator Of Some Success." Asked if he considered the failure to apprehend Osama bin Laden "a failure in the president's war on terror," Sen. John McCain, on Fox News Sunday (1/22, Wallace), said, "No. I don't think it's good that we haven't gotten him. … But look, the fact that there has not been an attack on the United States in four years is an indicator of some success. … So let's give the President and this Administration some credit for that."

Scheffer Affirms NATO Commitment To Afghanistan. NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer writes in the Financial Times (1/23), "As NATO prepares to expand the operations of its International Security Assistance Force in Afghanistan to the country's more volatile south, where violence is intensifying, debate is under way about the role the alliance will play. … The debate surrounding this mission comes as no surprise. After all, NATO's operation in Afghanistan has been, from the start, a fundamentally new step for the alliance. It is also the most ambitious mission in NATO's history, in terms of the strategic distance from our home countries, in terms of the complexity of the challenges we face in Afghanistan and in terms of the multiple roles the alliance must take on." Scheffer adds, "No one should doubt NATO's resolve to carry out this mission. All 26 allies realise that fighting terrorism, and helping the Afghan people and their government, is a collective effort – not a matter of picking and choosing where one might wish to chip in. We have already been delivering for quite some time, with 10,000 troops in the country. In coming months, we will expand southwards, as an alliance united in our determination to help the Afghan people build the stability and peace they deserve."

NATO Official Says Alliance Must Adapt To Fight Terrorism. NATO Assistant Secretary General Marshall Billingslea writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/23, 2.11M), "As times have changed, so has the North Atlantic Alliance. That is particularly evident in the way NATO has moved to protect our citizens from terrorism. … The most dramatic illustration of NATO's new priorities is our support for the democratically elected government of Afghanistan. More than 9,000 troops and military advisers are currently deployed throughout multiple Afghan provinces in the form of Provincial Reconstruction Teams (PRTs). These troops from 25 NATO members and 11 partner nations are there to provide both security and support to local authorities and people, and are doing such things as digging wells, building schools and refurbishing mosques. In a similar vein, NATO is facilitating, together with several international organizations, the rehabilitation of Kabul International Airport, and has made significant investments in airports in Herat and Mazar-e-Sharif." Billingslea adds, "When NATO's 26 armaments chiefs meet in Brussels this spring, they will sit down to review NATO's counterterrorism technology efforts. My hope is that they will come armed with ideas on how to press ahead in the fight against terrorism. Our first challenge will be to review all the operations to see where additional support to NATO troops is urgently needed. Certainly we need to expand, intensify and better fund the ongoing technological program of work. But perhaps more importantly, we need to create a NATO-Technical Support Working Group on a trans-Atlantic scale."

Professor Says Bin Laden Tape Confirms He Is Isolated, Weak. Jonathan Stevenson, a professor of national security affairs at the US Naval War College, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/23, 2.11M) that last week's missive from Osama bin Laden "confirmed several things that we knew or at least suspected: that he is isolated, besieged and physically weak. … In the recent tape, he asks the U.S. itself to stand down in Iraq and Afghanistan in exchange for a 'long truce.' As with the Madrid tape, bin Laden has made an offer that he knows will be refused." Stevenson adds, "Most likely bin Laden's hope is that his wider audience -- especially potential recruits -- will read U.S. beleaguerment as proof of al Qaeda's might. In suggesting that he himself maintains a significant degree of command over far-flung assets, he wants the world to believe that he and al Qaeda possess concentrated power that has not substantially diminished since 9/11. … The overarching significance of bin Laden's counterfactual assertion of authority, however, is how little it matters." Even if bin Laden "wanted to work toward coexistence, he wouldn't be able to deliver his end of the bargain precisely because he no longer enjoys close operational control over most of those he inspires. His word could be countermanded by Zarqawi, by a Moroccan in Spain, or by a British Pakistani. Quite simply, bin Laden's ideology and résumé have become bigger than the man himself."

USA Today Says Bin Laden Sought To Enhance Leadership Stature With New Tape. An editorial in USA Today (1/23, 2.31M) says the bin Laden tape "raised an interesting, and increasingly perplexing, question: What power, exactly, does the terrorist leader, who is likely living much as a cornered animal, have? To non-Muslim ears, bin Laden's message was clumsy and easy to dismiss. … But to Muslim ears…the same words sound very different. Bin Laden spoke in terms steeped in Islamic tradition. The truce that he offered, for example, recalls great past leaders, including the prophet Mohammed, who offered one in his battle with the Quraysh tribe that he eventually defeated. Bin Laden's aim was to give himself the stature of a leader -- specifically the leader who can realize the Muslim dream of establishing a caliphate, or worldwide Muslim superstate." USA adds, "Bin Laden's message offered nothing useful for Americans. Its value lies only in reminding us that Muslims are reacting to our messages in much the same way."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Judge To Review Former Gemstar-TV Guide Official's Plea Deal. The National Law Journal (1/23, Bronstad) reports, "The former chief executive of Gemstar-TV Guide International Inc. may face jail time if a federal judge in Los Angeles rejects his plea agreement this week." The Journal continues, "Henry Yuen, who was ousted in 2002 after Gemstar lost almost $3 billion in market capitalization due to accounting restatements, pleaded guilty in October to destroying computer files during a separate investigation by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. As part of the deal, he agreed to pay a $250,000 fine and to donate $1 million to charity while serving two years' probation and six months of home detention." The Journal adds, "Prosecutors and Yuen's lawyers have said the sentence fits his crime of obstruction of justice, reiterating that he has not been charged with securities fraud. … But lawyers for Gemstar and the SEC have expressed concern about the plea agreement, with Gemstar lawyers calling it a 'travesty of justice.' … The company also said it spent $100 million in legal fees and lawsuit settlements because of Yuen." The Journal notes, "U.S. District Judge John Walter is expected to reject the agreement when he issues a final ruling on Yuen's sentence today. In December, Walter issued a tentative ruling criticizing the sentence, saying that it 'sends the wrong message to corporate America,' and is 'wholly inappropriate,' according to court transcripts."

Lay, Skilling Lawyers Press For Trial To Be Moved. The USA Today (1/23, Farrell) reports, "With jury selection in the trial of former Enron chiefs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling scheduled to begin in Houston next Monday, their lawyers are insisting that the trial be moved out of state" because the attorneys "don't think Lay and Skilling can find an open-minded jury in Houston, whose residents bore the financial brunt of the highflying energy company's implosion four years ago." USA Today says that "Of 280 potential jurors who were surveyed last year, 80% said they had a negative bias toward Lay, Skilling or both." According to the article, "U.S. District Judge Sim Lake rejected the defense's motion several weeks ago. After a third defendant, former Enron accounting chief Rick Causey, agreed to plead guilty in late December, the defense team renewed its request." The defense team, "noted the 80% negative response among potential jurors was before Causey changed his plea. The 'media maelstrom' afterward about how Causey's plea could hurt Skilling and Lay only reinforced a presumption of guilt, defense lawyers argued." According to the article, "some jury experts agree with another defense motion asking that lawyers be able to question potential jurors without other juror candidates and spectators present." Judge Lake "is expected to rule this week on the defense motion to allow voir dire to be individualized," the article said.

Livedoor CEO Denies Allegations In His Blog. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Morse) reports, "Takafumi Horie, the CEO of Internet-portal company Livedoor Co.," denied that he misled investors "on his Web log after a television program yesterday morning in Japan examined the widening allegations surrounding his company." The Journal quotes, Horie, "'The extent of the fabrications [in the program] is such that it is difficult to deny them one by one … 'I don't know who or how these stories were researched.'" The Journal noted that Tokyo prosecutors raided Livedor's offices Jan. 16 "as part of a probe of possible securities-law violations." The Journal further reports, "Yesterday's comments by Mr. Horie come amid growing speculation he will be questioned by prosecutors, who called the company's chief financial officer, Ryoji Miyauchi, and several other Livedoor executives to their offices Friday." According to the article, "Since prosecutors raided Livedoor, the company's share price has dropped by more than 50% to 336 yen ($2.92), taking many other Japanese stocks with it."

US Chamber Asks Congress To Soften Auditing Rule. The Washington Post (1/23, A7, Day, 744K) reports, "The U.S. Chamber of Commerce is asking the federal government to soften a rule adopted after financial scandals that accounting firms failed to expose at Enron Corp., WorldCom Inc., Freddie Mac and other major U.S. companies." The Chamber "wants the Securities and Exchange Commission to allow accounting firms to perform audits for any company within a year of having provided consulting or other services for that company. The current rule bars a company from hiring as its auditor any accounting firm that has performed other services for it within five years." The Chamber "makes its request in a policy paper it will release publicly today and circulated to some people last week. It is the group's latest effort to weaken some provisions of Sarbanes-Oxley, which it says has added burdensome and costly business regulations."

Google Stakes Reputation On Dispute With DOJ. USA Today (1/23, Hopkins) reports, "Google, facing its biggest public relations battle yet, has more at stake than competitors as it fights a federal government demand for data on how millions of users search the Internet." USA continues, "As the No. 1 online search company, Google has the highest profile, and a brand built on a "don't be evil" motto that it must defend as it expands further into search-related ventures. … 'That is their motto and their ambition, and they need to be true to that,' says Denise Garcia, an analyst who follows Google at W.R. Hambrecht." USA adds, "Google's stance will likely burnish its image as a search engine industry leader that can be trusted to guard its users' data, Garcia says. … But in the short run, investors are worried. Friday, stock in the company plummeted 8.5%, or $36.98 a share, to $399.46, a day after published reports of its refusal to bow to a Justice Department subpoena. It was Google's biggest daily percentage decline since it went public in August 2004. … Garcia said the subpoena fight was the biggest factor in the stock's decline. It also was driven by a weak revenue forecast earlier in the week by competitor Yahoo. That spooked investors anti-cipating Google's fourth-quarter results, due out Jan. 31."

Trial Of Former Atlanta Mayor Begins Today. The New York Times (1/23, Dao) reports, "He was, once, the go-go mayor of the South's most go-go city. Suave and acid-tongued, Bill Campbell was the protégé of a new black politics, steeped in the argot of civil rights yet able to smooth-talk corporate executives. Democrats from President Clinton on down courted him. … But those days are long gone. On Monday, Mr. Campbell, who left office in 2002, is to enter a federal court house here to defend himself against charges that he turned City Hall into a criminal enterprise during his eight years in office." The Times continues, "Mr. Campbell's trial will be the culmination of an investigation that dates back to at least 1999 and that has already led to convictions against 10 people on an array of charges that include bribery, tax fraud and perjury. Three of the people convicted worked in Mr. Campbell's administration. … The seven-count indictment alleges a wide-ranging conspiracy directed by Mr. Campbell and his associates to shake down companies trying to do business with the city. The indictment charges Mr. Campbell, 52, took payoffs totaling more than $150,000; accepted more than $100,000 in illegal campaign contributions; filed false personal income tax returns; and received gifts from contractors, including a $12,000 trip to Paris and nearly $10,000 worth of heating and air-conditioning equipment for his home. … But Mr. Campbell's lawyers assert that the case is built on shoddy evidence and unreliable witnesses who traded lenient punishment for their testimony."

Former DOJ Lawyer Says There Was No Cover Up In Cisneros Case. Former Justice Department attorney Robert Litt writes in the Washington Post (1/23, A15, 744K), "An independent counsel has issued a report claiming that officials of the Clinton administration blocked his investigation into allegations of tax violations by former housing secretary Henry Cisneros. Although these sensational charges have been trumpeted by partisans as evidence of Democratic corruption, they are completely false. … The independent counsel, David Barrett, was appointed to investigate charges that Cisneros had lied about payments he made to his mistress. … In 1997 Barrett came to the Justice Department, where I was serving in the Criminal Division, and asked permission to expand his case to investigate whether Cisneros had evaded income taxes over four years. … Nonpartisan career lawyers in the department's Criminal Division and in the Tax Division studied the independent counsel's application in great detail over several weeks. They met with his office, reviewed documents and interviewed witnesses. Each of them concluded that, with the exception of a single year's tax return, there were no reasonable grounds to investigate Cisneros for tax violations. These career lawyers found that the independent counsel's submission was full of legal and factual errors. … The conclusions of the career lawyers were reviewed in detail by other officials including myself, up to the attorney general. Every single lawyer in the Justice Department who reviewed this matter concurred in the analysis. … Sadly, this independent counsel seemed unable to recognize that different lawyers could reach different conclusions in good faith. Instead, he decided that everyone who disagreed with him could only be corrupt. He did not let the complete absence of evidence to support that fantasy deter him from smearing nonpolitical government lawyers, who have devoted their careers to serving the public, without hearing their side of the story. That's the real scandal."

Chicago City Clerk Not Resigning Despite Corruption Charges. The Chicago Tribune (1/21) reports, "Rebutting suggestions by the media and City Hall insiders that he would resign amid corruption charges, City Clerk James Laski said Friday he 'will continue to serve and represent the citizens of Chicago.' A federal investigation into his dealings 'are not connected to the operations of this office,' Laski said in a written statement. 'Employees of this office will continue to effectively serve the needs of the citizens of Chicago.' Meanwhile, U.S. Magistrate Judge Sidney Schenkier freed Laski from the requirement to wear an electronic monitoring device that had been ordered a week ago after the clerk was charged with bribery and obstruction of justice." The AP (1/21) adds Laski said in the statement "that reports that he has been absent from work recently have been exaggerated and unfair. … Laski says other than a few absences due to illness and two weeks of vacation he has taken to spend time with his family December for the past eleven years, he has been at work."

FBI Investigating Possible Contract Fraud By Veteran Connecticut City Official. The Connecticut Post (1/22, Cummings) reports a veteran Bridgeport employee "is under investigation for allegedly accepting kickbacks -- sometimes in the form of cash-filled envelopes passed openly at City Hall -- in exchange for awarding contracts. The FBI is probing the activities of Chris Kovachi, a 20-year city employee and specialist in the city's Housing Department, three separate sources confirmed. … Kovachi denied any wrongdoing when asked about the allegations," but "a former city employee, who asked not to be identified, told FBI agents about witnessing" contractor Wayne Jones "giving Kovachi an envelope filled with cash. City records show Jones was paid more than $717,000 over the last five years for various jobs." The Post adds, "Two sources within city government also confirmed the FBI is investigating Kovachi. … The sources stressed that the FBI is not investigating the entire housing office, and said the city is cooperating with the probe."

FBI Investigating Philadelphia Schools Contract. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/22, Dilanian) reports, "Philadelphia schools chief Paul Vallas came to town three years ago promising to clean up the district's 'dysfunctional' workers' compensation system, which costs taxpayers tens of millions a year. But his pledge soon foundered on the shoals of the city's political culture. For reasons that Vallas has declined to publicly explain, the district hired a workers' compensation consultant with no government experience but with two important patrons: Democratic City Councilman Rick Mariano and Republican State House Speaker John Perzel. After Mariano personally introduced Danlin Management to Vallas, the newly formed company won a no-bid contract in 2003 to advise the district on ways to cut costs by reducing worker injuries and curbing fraud. The district's top financial officer at the time had concerns about Danlin but felt pressured by Vallas to hire the Center City firm, according to newly released records of the FBI's investigation into the matter."

FBI, IRS Investigating Possible Improper Political Activity By Fumo-Linked Nonprofit. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/22, Cattabiani, Shiffman, McCoy) reports, "A South Philadelphia nonprofit with ties to State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo secretly financed a lawsuit to oust a powerful political opponent from the state Senate, sources said. The FBI is asking why the nonprofit -- created to clean streets and revitalize businesses in Fumo's district -- financed an unsuccessful 2001 lawsuit against the head of the state Senate, Republican Robert C. Jubelirer of Altoona, according to people familiar with the investigation." The Inquirer notes, "The nonprofit, Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, didn't pay for the lawsuit against Jubelirer directly, according to people familiar with the transaction. Instead, the nonprofit sent about $17,000 to Howard Cain, a longtime close political adviser to Fumo. Cain's political consulting firm then cut a $17,000 check for the suit, the sources said." The Inquirer adds, "For two years, the FBI, IRS agents and prosecutors have been aggressively scrutinizing a series of nonprofits connected to Fumo, looking at how Fumo raised money for them and how they spent it."

Houston Emerging As Major Center Of MS-13 Activity. The Austin American-Statesman (1/22, Ward) reports MS-13 is "a burgeoning criminal enterprise that has spread into 33 states and the District of Columbia, leaving a bloody trail of vicious crimes in its wake amid persistent reports that al Qaeda might be trying to use its smuggling network to sneak terrorists into the United States. … Its epicenter of recent growth has been neighborhoods of Central American immigrants in Houston, where federal investigators say the gang's membership and crimes have mushroomed. It is now facing a multiagency crackdown aimed at curbing its influence and violence. Los Angeles 'is still the place where you go to make your bones with MS-13, but Houston has emerged as a very large problem area,' FBI Special Supervisory Agent Stephen Kodak said in Washington. … 'It's like the old-time Mafia: They prey on their own, offering protection and then extorting money from other illegals who aren't likely to report the crimes,' Kodak said. 'It's definitely a growing problem.'" The American-Statesman notes, "'Law enforcement in 28 states have reported MS-13 members are engaged in retail drug trafficking, primarily trafficking in powdered cocaine, crack cocaine and marijuana, and, to a lesser extent, in methamphetamine and heroin,' Chris Swecker, assistant director of the FBI's criminal investigations division, testified before a U.S. House subcommittee in April 2005. 'The drug proceeds are then laundered through seemingly legitimate businesses.'"

Al Qaeda-MS-13 Alliance Seen As Unlikely. In a separate story, The Austin American-Statesman (1/22, Ward) reports, "Could al Qaeda terrorist operatives be teaming up with the MS-13 gang? No, federal investigators say. There is little, if any, evidence of such a link, and it is highly unlikely that the radical Muslim organization would align itself with a predominately Catholic gang, they say."

Five Indicted On Katrina-Related Fraud Charges. The Baton Rouge Advocate (1/21, Roberts) reports, "A Georgia man allegedly on his way to getting $125,000 in unemployment benefits for 49 imaginary people and four Baton Rouge residents who may have lied to get thousands in disaster relief are facing federal prison time." Drewey Pierre Whitaker, Ivory Profit, De'Ondra Profit, Monique C. Preston and Billy R. James were indicted by the federal grand jury. "The indictments — made public Friday — bring to 26 the total number of people who have been charged in Baton Rouge federal court with fraud in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. Nationwide, more than 180 people have been arrested, said Baton Rouge U.S. Attorney David Dugas, who oversees the national Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force. Whittaker faces five counts of wire fraud, each of which carries up to 30 years in prison, and 11 counts of illegal use of Social Security numbers, each of which carries up to five years in prison."

Former NOPD Officer Charged With Katrina-Related Theft. The Baton Rouge Advocate (1/21, Gyan) reports, "A federal grand jury accused a former New Orleans police officer Friday of driving across state lines with a new pickup truck looted from a Cadillac dealership during Hurricane Katrina. Willie Earl Bickham Jr. is charged with interstate transportation of a stolen motor vehicle: a black 2005 Chevrolet Silverado. Houston police arrested Bickham in November driving the stolen truck. Police said he admitted taking the vehicle." The Advocate adds, "U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said Friday that federal prosecutors and the FBI are keeping their ears 'close to the track' for incidents such as Bickham's that might arise and require federal attention." The AP (1/21) also reports on the charges.

Siemens Executives Indicted Over Alleged Sham Minority Partnership. The AP (1/21, Robinson) reports, "A Pennsylvania-based subsidiary of German electronics company Siemens AG and two of its executives have been indicted on charges of forming a sham partnership with a minority-owned company to land a $49 million county contract, prosecutors announced Friday. The minority-owned company and its owner were also charged. Both were previously indicted in the investigation. … A spokesman for Siemens Corp., the parent company for its U.S. operations, says it broke no laws and will fight the charges." The AP notes, 'Robert D. Grant, special agent in charge of the Chicago office of the FBI, said the government is 'determined to ensure that public contracts, especially those in the lucrative health care industry, are obtained based on merit and are not tainted by corruption.'"

The Chicago Tribune (1/20, Ciokajlo, Becker) reported on its Web site, "The charges were announced today in a superceding indictment that also added new charges against minority contractor Faust Villazan and his former company, Faustech Industries." Villazan "and Faustech originally were indicted in September for allegedly passing a $20,000 bribe to a Cook County employee to influence the award of the radiology contract during the construction of the new Stroger Hospital. … In the superceding indictment handed up late Thursday afternoon, prosecutors alleged the joint venture was a sham and did not comply with county contracting rules because Villazan received a flat fee of $500,000 and did not share in the profit or loss of the deal." The Tribune adds that Grant "said Villazan entered into the Siemens deal 'for the sole purpose of personal greed,' saying, in effect, 'I'm a minority business enterprise, and I'm for sale.'" However, in the version of the story which ran in Saturday's Chicago Tribune, the paper did not include Grant's statement.

The Chicago Sun-Times (1/21, Pallasch, Newbart) reports, "GE -- which lost to Siemens in the bidding -- sued the county and Siemens in federal court, alleging fraud in the bidding process. Siemens officials…lied in court and said there had been no fraud, officials said." US Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald "and Grant credited GE's civil lawsuit filed four years ago with starting the process of exposing the alleged fraud. 'If not for the light shed on this scheme by a competitor, this fraud might not have been uncovered,' Grant said.

New Orleans Man Sentenced To Prison For Credit Card Fraud. The AP (1/21) reports, "A New Orleans man has been sentenced to four years in prison and ordered to pay $35,000 in restitution after a jury found him guilty of stealing the credit card numbers of people and using them to buy merchandise that he would resell. The US Attorney's Office says Jerome McNeil and an accomplice recruited some cashiers at Kenner's Esplanade Mall and a restaurant to use a credit card skimmer to record customers credit card numbers. … US Attorney Jim Letten said the pair was so brazen that they even began to distribute business cards on the street."

Cities Report Shortage Of Police Recruits. The Christian Science Monitor (1/23, Axtman, 61K) says a "major shortage of police recruits" has "reached crisis proportions in some cities." The problem "has several sources: low pay, a big hole left by retiring baby boomers, and an image problem that steers the few young people who are interested in law-enforcement careers toward crime-scene investigation and forensics, rather than everyday street patrols." The Monitor adds, "To remedy the manpower shortage, some law-enforcement agencies are getting creative. They are giving new recruits help with down payments on homes and, for experienced officers in other locales, they are offering signing bonuses for switching to a new city. They're even encouraging their own officers to find new recruits in exchange for extra vacation time."

CIVIL LAW:

Federal Government May Take Hard Line On Contractors' Conflicts. The Washington Post (1/23, D4, Babcock, 744K) reports defense contractor Alion Science and Technology Corp. "faced the imminent loss of one of its largest contracts, a $275 million deal helping manage the Pentagon's military communications network. The government had just announced that Advanced Engineering & Sciences of Reston, a division of contracting giant ITT Industries Inc., would take over the work." But Alion is now "back in contention for the job. In a case that could signal a more aggressive federal approach toward potential conflicts of interest in contracting, Alion convinced government reviewers that a division of ITT should not be allowed to manage a program that potentially would be evaluating products made by the defense conglomerate -- or at least not without much more analysis then the Pentagon initially performed." This month, the Government Accountability Office "agreed, indicating that it was going to begin looking more closely at 'organizational conflicts of interest' -- the potential for a company to end up in a situation in which it is essentially evaluating itself or its competitors -- and would make sure contracting agencies begin paying more attention as well."

WSJournal Sees Evidence Of Fraud In Diagnosis Of Asbestos Ailments. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, 2.11M) editorializes, "Of all the unsavory details rolling out of investigations into the silicosis and asbestos scams, some of the ugliest concern doctors who abandoned their ethics to cash in. Even more disturbing is the growing evidence that what has allowed them to get away with this is a federal certification program. That's why a coalition of industry and other groups has began pushing the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health (Niosh) to start policing its 'B-reader' program, which certifies doctors to read X-rays. The federal agency proposed new ethics rules in November, after a federal judge slammed several government-certified doctors who had ginned up sham diagnoses in a silicosis suit. But Niosh needs to go much further to clean up this corrupt corner of American medicine."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Former Officials Say Bush Administration Has Politicized DOJ Voting Section. The Washington Post (1/23, Eggen, 744K) reports in a front page story that the Justice Department's voting section, "a small and usually obscure unit that enforces the Voting Rights Act and other federal election laws, has been thrust into the center of a growing debate over recent departures and controversial decisions in the Civil Rights Division as a whole." Many current and former lawyers "in the section charge that senior officials have exerted undue political influence in many of the sensitive voting-rights cases the unit handles. Most of the department's major voting-related actions over the past five years have been beneficial to the GOP, they say, including two in Georgia, one in Mississippi and a Texas redistricting plan orchestrated by Rep. Tom DeLay (R) in 2003." The section "also has lost about a third of its three dozen lawyers over the past nine months. Those who remain have been barred from offering recommendations in major voting-rights cases and have little input in the section's decisions on hiring and policy." Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales "and his aides dispute such criticism and defend the department's actions in voting cases."

Demonstrators Mark 33rd Anniversary Of Roe V. Wade. Thousands of anti-abortion demonstrators gathered outside Minnesota's Capitol Sunday to mark the 33rd anniversary of the Roe v. Wade ruling. The AP (1/23, Lohn) reports that the Minnesota event was one of several nationwide yesterday. In San Francisco, "thousands of abortion opponents shouldering signs with slogans such as 'Peace Begins in the Womb' marched Saturday, while abortion rights supporters along the march route waved clothes hangers and shouted 'Bigots go home.' … In Idaho, nearly 400 abortion protesters marched at the Statehouse Saturday." The AP adds, "The largest abortion demonstration was expected Monday in Washington, D.C., where anti-abortion activists planned to converge on the mall to hear speakers supporting their cause and march on the Congress and Supreme Court."

Pro-Life Groups Optimistic About Movement's Future. The Washington Times (1/23, Price, 90K) reports, "As tens of thousands of abortion foes prepare for today's 33rd annual March for Life, they are buoyed by developments they see as promising for their cause, both at the state and federal levels. … Pro-life advocates are excited about broad abortion bans proposed by lawmakers in two states, Ohio and Indiana. It's their hope that these bills become law and that the statutes are eventually considered and upheld by a more conservative U.S. Supreme Court in a challenge to the Jan. 22, 1973, ruling in Roe v. Wade that abortion was a constitutional right." The Times notes that pro-life advocates "make it clear they are optimistic the Supreme Court will be more favorable to abortion restrictions, with the addition of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and this week's expected confirmation of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr."

Roe Seen As Likely To Be Overturned If GOP President Is Elected In 2008. The Wall Street Journal's James Taranto (1/23) writes, "The Supreme Court is not racing the clock to resolve the abortion question. Most likely, sometime in the next decade the court will either overturn or reaffirm Roe. If President Bush gets to replace another pro-Roe justice or two, or a Republican is elected president in 2008, Roe will probably be history. Otherwise, it will be with us for another generation. In either case, politics will determine the outcome of what should have been a political matter all along."

Terms Of Abortion Debate Said To Have Caught Up With Public Attitudes. Time (1/30, Tumulty) reports, "Listening just to the alarms of abortion-rights groups on the one hand and the cheers of opponents on the other, you could come away with the impression that the fate of" Samuel Alito's nomination to the Supreme Court "will determine whether abortion remains available in this country. That is not what is at stake. Alito's confirmation would not produce the votes sufficient to overturn the Supreme Court's landmark Roe v. Wade decision guaranteeing abortion rights throughout the country. … Today the tussle is over not whether abortion will exist but how. In that respect, the terms of the debate have caught up with the public's attitude toward the issue: polls consistently show that most people in the U.S. want abortion to be legal; they just don't want it to be easy." Time adds, "Pollsters say that Americans' views on abortion have shifted relatively little since Roe v. Wade, that they have always been complicated and that sometimes they are even contradictory. In a survey by the Pew Research Center last July, for instance,

65% of those polled said they oppose the idea of overturning Roe v. Wade, but nearly an identical percentage said they would like to see more legal restrictions. Among the most popular: mandatory waiting periods, parental- and spousal-notification requirements and a ban on all late-term abortions."

White House To Push Pentagon On Prayers Specifically Referencing Jesus Christ. An evangelical Christian chaplain's group says the White House will pressure the Pentagon to be more explicit in saying military chaplains can pray in the name of Jesus Christ. The Washington Times (1/23, Duin, 90K) reports, "The administration struck a deal on Thursday with Rep. Walter B. Jones, North Carolina Republican, said the Rev. Billy Baugham of the Greenville, S.C.-based International Conference of Evangelical Chaplain Endorsers. … Claude Allen, White House domestic policy adviser, promised the congressman that President Bush will take up the issue personally with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, said Mr. Baugham, who was involved in the discussion. … Mr. Jones' office, which confirmed that the conversation had taken place, says chaplains should be able to pray to whomever 'their faith tradition' demands, including named gods, saints or prophets."

ANTITRUST:

Albertson's Closes Deal for Sale To Consortium. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Adamy, Berman) reports, "A consortium of retailers and financial buyers could announce a deal to acquire Albertson's Inc. for roughly $9.6 billion as early as today, say people familiar with the matter, offering an end to a tumultuous sale process. The Albertson's board was expected to meet last night to approve the deal, people familiar with the process said. As happened in December, it is possible the deal could collapse at the final moment. The deal could give grocery-store chain Supervalu Inc., which would acquire most of Albertson's stores, a challenge in freshening up hundreds of supermarkets. Meanwhile, drugstore operator CVS Corp., which would acquire Albertson's free-standing pharmacies, would pull closer to rival Walgreen Co., the nation's largest drugstore chain by revenue." According to the Journal, final terms were not known, but "they are expected to roughly mirror the ones that the board turned down in December," except that "Albertson's buyers would assume any antitrust risk involving Chicago-area stores, a sticking point that helped unwind a previous deal, said the people familiar with the matter." According to the Journal, "The buyout consortium is planning to pay about $26 per Albertson's share, said the people familiar with the matter. Based on the terms for the December deal, that would entail offering 0.182 of a share of Supervalu stock plus $20.25 in cash, or $26.05 in total, based on Friday's closing price. … Albertson's shares closed up 24 cents at $24.11, rising 1%, in 4 p.m. composite trading Friday on the New York Stock Exchange. Supervalu on Friday fell 34 cents, or 1%, to $31.85 on the NYSE."

The New York Times (1/23, Sorkin) reports, "While people involved in the negotiations were hopeful that this deal would be completed, they also cautioned that it remained possible that the talks could drag on or collapse altogether again if an unforeseen issue arises the way it did in December." Since that deal fell through, the Times reports, "the board of Albertsons has been under increased scrutiny from analysts and investors who have questioned why the December deal was abandoned at the last minute. Albertsons shares fell more than 10 percent after the company announced it had terminated talks." In the wake of the December breakdown, analysts were critical, and some shareholders called "for the resignation of Albertsons' chief executive, Larry R. Johnston, a former General Electric executive who was brought in to revive the business. The company's independent directors issued a statement pledging their support for him." IN this deal, "the buying group plans to break Albertsons into three parts by splitting the supermarket business in two and merging the drugstore business with CVS. Supervalu supermarkets is expected to acquire Albertsons' most attractive stores, like its Jewel stores in the Chicago area. Cerberus Capital and Kimco Realty plan to buy its underperforming businesses and either sell them and their real estate or try to institute a turnaround plan, depending on the store." The Times also notes, "The possible sale of Albertsons, based in Boise, Idaho, comes as traditional grocers are being squeezed by larger discount competitors like Costco and Wal-Mart Stores," and, "on the other end of the spectrum, … upscale rivals like Whole Foods and Trader Joe's."

battle for control of Westinghouse, the US power plant arm of British Nuclear Fuels, with a bid of almost $5bn, more than double original expectations." Toshiba's competition included "General Electric of the US and Mitsubishi Heavy Industries of Japan." According to the article, "The group's bid of close to $5bn was not only the highest offer but BNFL decided it would also be the best for Westinghouse's future growth prospects and its workers, said a person close to BNFL." The board of directors "would make a final decision at a board meeting on Thursday," the paper reported. The Financial Times also notes political opposition to "a non-US group gaining control of Pittsburgh-based Westinghouse. Last month Ralph Hall, Republican chairman of the House of Representatives' energy subcommittee, wrote to the US Treasury arguing that Westinghouse's "sensitive technology" should not be controlled by a foreign company." Also, the article notes, "A person close to the deal said Toshiba was favoured because BNFL believed it was most likely to allow senior Westinghouse management to run the business on its own." But "GE was seen as having a more aggressive corporate culture than Toshiba, which could have harmed Westinghouse's chance of winning a Chinese nuclear reactor contract, it said. "

Nuclear Energy In Favor With Governments. The New York Times (1/23, Mouawad, Sorkin) reports some of the same facts, but also notes developments in the nuclear-power industry. The Times says, "Nuclear energy is gaining support with governments around the world amid high oil and natural gas prices, tight petroleum supplies and growing demand for electricity. Technology by Westinghouse is found in half the world's operating commercial nuclear power plants, according to the company's Web site." While nuclear opponents cite Three Mile Island, Chernobyl, and the problems of disposing of waste fuel, "nuclear energy never lost the favor of governments who view it as a reliable source of energy," the article says. The Times also says, "Energy companies are seeking licenses around the country to build new power plants, notably in Alabama and Mississippi. The Bush administration, which is also encouraging the development of nuclear energy as a way to reduce dependence on foreign energy sources, is seeking to streamline the application process and permits needed to build new plants."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Second Fatal West Virginia Accident Spurs Calls For Mine Safety Improvements. NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 4, 1:30, Williams) reported, "There are more questions about the mine fire that killed two miners" in West Virginia "and the demands for new safety regulations." NBC (Costello) added the fire "broke out Thursday afternoon on a conveyor belt two miles inside the Alma mine. They were using that same way to draw in fresh air. The government had banned that. But companies said digging fresh-air tunnels was expensive. So the Bush Administration allowed it." The Bush Administration "says it will look at getting better equipment and whether those oxygen tanks every miner wears should last longer than one hour. Congress will hear conditions coal miners work. The mine involved in the fire is owned by one of the country's biggest coal producers, the Massey Company."

US Ranks 28th In World On Key Environmental Standards. A nation-by-nation study of environmental performance shows that just six nations have achieved 85 percent or better success in meeting critical environmental goals including clean drinking water, low ozone levels, sustainable fisheries and low greenhouse gas emissions. The New York Times (1/23, Barringer, 1.19M) reports, "The study, jointly produced by Yale and Columbia Universities, ranked the United States 28th over all, behind most of Western Europe, Japan, Taiwan, Malaysia, Costa Rica and Chile, but ahead of Russia and South Korea. … The pilot study, called the 2006 Environmental Performance Index, has been reviewed by specialists both in the United States and internationally."

Senators Disagree On Fishing Quotas. The Washington Times (1/22, Price, 90K) reports, "A Senate spat over relaxed fishing quotas could snag the renewal of the 1976 Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act. Reauthorization of Senate Bill 2012, which governs offshore ocean fisheries, is expected by late spring, but differences remain over whether it should permit relaxed enforcement of annual catch limits for each fishery or impose strict limits. … The version of the bill approved by the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee on Dec. 15 had an amendment to soften annual fishing quotas, as a result of pressure by New England fishermen and the members of Congress who represent them. … Congressional observers say it is ironic that the difference of opinion regarding catch limits has made Massachusetts Democrats such as Sens. Edward M. Kennedy and John Kerry and Rep. Barney Frank, normally viewed as environmental champions, to favor looser controls on fishing. Meanwhile, Sen. Ted Stevens, Alaska Republican and Commerce Committee chairman, who favors oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, is seen as a lawmaker dedicated to conservation of declining fish stocks and protection of their habitats with the bill."

Allen Foods Offers To Burn Chicken Manure, Producing Power And Reducing Waste. The Washington Post (1/23, B1, Morse) reports that Allen Family Foods "last week presented plans to the Dorchester County Council to burn chicken manure in Linkwood on Maryland's Eastern Shore. The resulting steam would help run an Allen Family Foods factory that processes leftover chicken parts" and help reduce the waste generated by chicken farms in Maryland. According to the article, "In Maryland, some leading conservationists back the project. If more manure is burned, they say, less will end up on farms and potentially in runoff." The Post says, "Chicken executives have been talking up manure burning for more than two decades. But it is technologically challenging, and no one has made it work commercially in the United States, according to industry executives and engineers." Additionally, Allen Family Foods has no assurance of regulatory approval; according to the article, the "Maryland Department of the Environment plans to question Allen Family Foods about odors and emissions. Allen said it won't start construction until it gets an operating permit from the department." The idea, the Post says, "goes back to at least 1983, when the Delmarva Power company experimented with the fuel at a power plant in Delaware, Delmarva Power spokesman Matt Likovich said. The utility later studied retrofitting another plant, in Maryland, estimating it would cost $50 million. Neither project got off the ground."

Royalty Payments For Use Of Public Land Have Not Kept Pace With Market Prices. The New York Times (1/23, Andrews, 1.19M) reports, "At a time when energy prices and industry profits are soaring, the federal government collected little more money last year than it did five years ago from the companies that extracted more than $60 billion in oil and gas from publicly owned lands and coastal waters. If royalty payments in fiscal 2005 for natural gas had risen in step with market prices, the government would have received about $700 million more than it actually did, a three-month investigation by The New York Times has found. But an often byzantine set of federal regulations, largely shaped and fiercely defended by the energy industry itself, allowed companies producing natural gas to provide the Interior Department with much lower sale prices - the crucial determinant for calculating government royalties - than they reported to their shareholders. As a result, the nation's taxpayers, collectively, the biggest owner of American oil and gas reserves, have missed much of the recent energy bonanza.'

WPost Urges Administration To Fund Ocean Research. The Washington Post (1/23, 744K) editorializes, "The Bush administration remains in denial about climate change and sometimes treats environmental protection as an inconvenience. Yet there was reason to hope, when the U.S. Commission on Ocean Policy issued its report more than a year ago, that President Bush would seize the issue of the dire threat to this country's coastal waters. … So far, it is an opportunity Mr. Bush has largely passed up. To be sure, there have been some constructive changes. Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) is pushing legislation to improve fisheries management." According to the Times, "a big test will come when the administration has to propose funding for oceans research in its coming budget."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

States Report Flood Of Potent Mexican Crystal Meth. The New York Times (1/23, Zernike, 1.19M) reports, "In the seven months since Iowa passed a law restricting the sale of cold medicines used to make methamphetamine, seizures of homemade methamphetamine laboratories have dropped to just 20 a month from 120. … But…officials in other states with similar restrictions" are "now worried about a new problem: the drop in home-cooked methamphetamine has been met by a new flood of crystal methamphetamine coming largely from Mexico. Sometimes called ice, crystal methamphetamine is far purer, and therefore even more highly addictive, than powdered home-cooked methamphetamine, a change that health officials say has led to greater risk of overdose." According to the Times, "although child welfare officials say they are removing fewer children from homes where parents are cooking the drug, the number of children being removed from homes where parents are using it has more than made up the difference."

DEA Investigation Uncovers Suspected Cocaine Trafficking Ring. The Madison (IN) Courier (1/23) reports, "More light is being shed on the Drug Enforcement Administration drug raid last week in the Courier area. Aaron Payne, a special deputy for the DEA, testified at a detention hearing Friday in Indianapolis. Payne was one of the lead investigators for the government during the yearlong investigation that lead to the arrests of 14 Courier-area residents on federal charges. Results of the investigation uncovered a Mexico-to-Chicago cocaine trafficking ring that then came through Madison. The indictment indicates that both John Scruggs and Randy Thomas were the ringleaders of the organization. They acquired cocaine from their sources in Chicago and then distributed it to 12 mid-level dealers in the Courier area, according to the federal indictment. During the investigation, Payne obtained court-ordered wiretaps on four telephone lines. The wiretaps began in November to accompany aerial surveillance already under way in the investigation."

Virginia "Pain Doctor" Loses License. The Roanoke (VA) Times (1/21) reports, "Roanoke pain doctor Cecil Knox was stripped of his right to practice medicine and sentenced to five years of probation Friday, marking the end of what has been called both a legitimate prosecution and an unnecessary persecution. The conclusion came as a relief to many in the packed federal courtroom, but outside, both camps still expressed regrets -- that loved ones who died were not around to see the day, and that chronic pain patients no longer have a physician they can trust. … Knox was first indicted in February 2002, along with his practice, his former office manager, Beverly Boone, and two employees. His charges included prescribing controlled substances such as the painkiller OxyContin outside the scope of legitimate medical practice, and the government said Knox's irresponsible behavior led to injury or death to patients. At one point, he faced more than 300 charges. … As part of the plea agreement, Knox voluntarily surrendered his medical license to the state of Virginia and his registration number for prescribing medicine to the Drug Enforcement Administration."

Lawsuit Settled In Texas In DEA-Involved Shooting. The San Antonio (TX) Express (1/23) reports that on Jan. 3, relatives of Ashley Villarreal gathered at San Fernando Cemetery and "observed what would have been her 17th birthday. The ceremony was half a celebration and half a call for justice over the controversial shooting by federal agents that put her in her grave when she was 14. But four days before the civil case was to head to trial, U.S. District Judge Fred Biery ruled Thursday that the government would be allowed to put on evidence that could have hurt the plaintiffs' case. Hours later, the wrongful-death suit was settled for $200,000 — far less than the $35 million listed in the plaintiffs' original demand letters to the government. Under the settlement, released Friday, the government denied any liability in the shooting that occurred during a stakeout for Ashley's father. The government argued that the agents fired at a Mitsubishi Eclipse driven by Ashley the night of Feb. 9, 2003, because they feared the car was going to hit one of them. 'This tragedy weighs heavily on all of those involved: the family, the special agents involved and the entire community,' said Joe Arabit, head of the Drug Enforcement Administration in San Antonio. 'The DEA is hopeful that the community can now move forward beyond this incident.'"

Canada Clears Way For Medical Marijuana Advocate To Be Deported To US. The Los Angeles Times (1/21, Bailey) reports, "A judge in Canada on Friday rejected an eleventh-hour appeal by a California medical marijuana refugee trying to avoid deportation to the United States, five years after fleeing to avoid a short jail stint he called a death sentence. Steve Kubby, a former Laguna Beach resident who was a 1998 Libertarian candidate for governor and one of the authors of California's watershed medical marijuana law, suffers from a rare form of adrenal cancer that can cause blood-pressure spikes that his doctors say are controlled by smoking cannabis. Canadian Federal Justice Yvon Pinard ruled that Immigration Canada may now proceed with its order to return Kubby to the U.S. — along with his wife, Michele, and two young children."

US Drug Agents Said To Be Hitting Drug Cartels In The Pocketbook. The Dallas Morning News (1/20, Mclemore) reports, "In the last three years, customs agents have seized more than $20 million in currency at the eight ports of entry from Brownsville to Del Rio – roughly one-fifth of the value of the bulk cash seizures the agency made nationally. While U.S. drug agents have long concentrated their efforts on stopping drugs at the border, they're increasingly going after the money, hitting the drug cartels in the pocketbook and providing invaluable intelligence of the trafficking networks. And with stricter controls on bank accounts and wire transfers, trafficking organizations are running piles of cash into Mexico, in cars, trucks, boats, and airplanes and even strapped to the bodies of couriers, federal officials said." The Morning News adds, DEA Administrator Karen Tandy, during a Senate hearing on narcotics control last March, called tracking the money the key to controlling the $65 billion a year trade in illegal drugs. 'To make a significant impact on the drug trade in America and around the world, there is no strategy more effective than following the money back to the sources of drug supply and taking away the dirty proceeds of that trade,' she said. 'But our efforts to date clearly have not successfully done the job.' Total seizures – which include all assets and can be in the form of cash, houses, guns and vehicles – amounted to well short of $1 billion, Ms. Tandy said. 'Drug traffickers pay more than that each year in fees to launder their ill-gotten gains,' she said. Officials said there is no established formula to determine what percentage of cash gets across the border successfully."

US, Venezuela Expected To Sign Anti-Drugs Agreement. The BBC (1/21) reports, "Venezuela and the US appear ready to sign a new agreement to fight international drug trafficking. … For the past five months all official relations between Venezuelan and US anti-narcotics agents have been frozen. But after tough negotiations between Venezuelan and US diplomats a new contract is now on the table. This accord will re-establish a basic working relationship in the fight against drugs. Luis Correa, the chief of Venezuela's anti-narcotics police unit, says the new agreement with Washington will be signed…once all the paperwork has been finalized."

IMMIGRATION:

Scholar Released From China Faces Deportation From US. The AP (1/23, Barakat) reports, "Nearly five years ago, the U.S. government exerted high-profile diplomatic pressure on China to secure the return of scholar Gao Zhan, a researcher at American University whom Beijing believed was a spy for Taiwan. … Now the Department of Homeland Security is pushing with equal vigor to have her deported back to China, despite objections from the Department of Justice and a federal judge. A hearing is scheduled Monday in immigration court to determine whether Gao poses a risk to national security, as DHS contends." The AP continues, "Gao's case became international news in February 2001 when the American University researcher and her family were arrested by the Chinese on suspicion of espionage. Her husband, Xue Donghua, and the couple's 5-year-old son were released after a month in custody. … But the Communist government charged Gao with espionage." The AP adds, "The State Department protested and worked hard to secure her release. Sen. George Allen, R-Va., was one of many elected officials who took up her cause and introduced legislation, which ultimately failed, to grant her U.S. citizenship in absentia. … The Chinese government put Gao on trial in July 2001, convicted her and sentenced her to prison. But they decided to deport her to the United States rather than imprison her, and Gao received a hero's welcome when she returned to the U.S. a month later. … Then in 2003 came shocking news: Gao had pleaded guilty to illegally exporting more than $1 million in military-grade computer microprocessors to a Chinese government agency. Court documents indicate that the scheme had preceded her 2001 arrest and that Gao knew the microprocessors could be used by the Chinese military. … She struck a plea bargain that resulted in a seven-month jail sentence, plus eight months in a halfway house. Her jail time was severely reduced because prosecutors believed Gao had cooperated with their investigation and provided useful information to the United States. … As part of the plea bargain, the Justice Department recommended to the Department of Homeland Security against deporting Gao after she served her sentence. … Normally such recommendations carry great weight, but in this case, DHS and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement are ignoring the recommendation and pushing for deportation."

Illegal Immigration Is Contentious Issue Nationwide. The Christian Science Monitor (1/23, Knickerbocker, 61K) reports, "Immigration has become an increasingly contentious political and social issue around the country. Organizations patterned after the controversial

'Minuteman Project' along the US-Mexico border have sprung up in New England, the Midwest, the South, and the Pacific Northwest. This has led to demonstrations and shouting matches with those opposed to what they call 'vigilantes.' State and local officials are working to limit government services to illegal immigrants and their children (such as college tuition and worker's compensation), requiring proof of citizenship to get a driver's license and cracking down on day labor sites where men - many in the country illegally - gather to seek work." The Monitor adds, "In Washington this year, Congress and the Bush administration are expected to continue wrangling over immigration reform. But most of the action, observers say, is likely to be at the state level: legislation and ballot initiatives."

Two California Police Departments Will Train To Enforce Immigration Laws. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Winton, Yi, 958K) reports that the Costa Mesa Police Department and Orange County Sheriff's Department in California "are developing plans for their officers to be trained alongside federal immigration agents so they can understand and help enforce immigration laws. They are among the first in the nation to seek the training, and their effort has generated both interest from other agencies and protests from immigrants' rights groups." The Orange County Sheriff's Department "wants to send 200 deputies for special training by Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and hopes federal approval comes soon. Likewise, Costa Mesa seeks training for up to 40 officers initially, mostly detectives, gang investigators and jail personnel. The training will be to familiarize officers with immigration law, give them an understanding of the federal immigration bureaucracy and let them observe how federal agents do their jobs."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Alito Expected To Be Confirmed By Narrow Margin. Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito appears to be headed for Senate confirmation by one of the narrowest margins in history. The Washington Times (1/23, Hurt, 90K) reports that while Alito has not lost the support of any Republicans, he has "won endorsement from only one Democrat. Republicans say they expect the vote to be close to the 55-45 partisan break in the chamber. … Republican leadership aides also say they are worried they may lose one of the Northeast Republicans who represent liberal states. Sens. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Olympia J. Snowe and Susan Collins, both of Maine, have declined to say how they will vote. Those same centrists, however, have said that a Democrat filibuster of the nominee would be out of order. Still, Democrat leaders insist, that option remains a possibility. … Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee has made clear that if Democrats filibuster Judge Alito, he will move to change the rules in the Senate to ban such filibusters of judicial nominations."

The Legal Times (1/23, Goldman) reports, "There are any number of ways to fault the performance of Senate Democrats in their campaign to keep Samuel Alito Jr. -- seemingly as rock-ribbed a conservative as you'll find -- off the high court." The Times continues, "During Alito's weeklong confirmation hearings, Senate Judiciary Committee Democrats were, by turns, hostile, pedantic, bombastic and confused. Follow-up questions? No time for that. … There were larger strategic miscalculations as well: notably that the majority of pro-abortion rights Americans would rise up in outraged opposition to a nominee who had so clearly expressed disdain for abortion rights at several points during his legal career. Or that Americans would find credible the shrill discourse of Alito's opponents, which by now had been assimilated as so much background noise. … And there was last year's 'Gang of 14 filibuster deal, one that Democrats initially claimed as a victory but that helped seal their defeat. … The causes are myriad, but the result seems clear: Alito's opponents threw everything they had at him and nothing worked. He is now virtually guaranteed to be confirmed."

Kerry Will Vote Against Confirmation. Sen. John Kerry said yesterday he will vote against Alito's confirmation, saying the nominee would take the High Court "backwards." The AP (1/23) reports that Kerry, speaking on ABC's This Week with George Stephanopoulos, said, "I think he will shut the door of court access to the average person in America," adding, "I will vote against him because I think he will take the court backwards."

Allen Challenges Democrats To Attempt Filibuster. Sen. George Allen said on CNN's Late Edition (1/22, Blitzer), "Judge Alito has an outstanding record. … I think he's going to be an outstanding Supreme Court justice, respecting the will of the people in our representative democracy. And if the Democrats want to filibuster, let them. We'll pull the constitutional trigger. And as far as I'm concerned, it's not too much to ask a senator to get off his or her cushy seat and show some backbone and spine and vote yes or vote no, but vote."

Alito Said To Be "Fitting Replacement" For O'Connor. In an op-ed for USA Today (1/23, 2.31M) the University of Notre Dame's Richard Garnett writes, "notwithstanding her recent 'liberal' votes in several hot-button cases, [Justice Sandra Day] O'Connor was for two decades a consistent and crucial partner with Chief Justice William Rehnquist in moving the court's constitutional doctrines in a more conservative direction: She believed, among other things, that ours is a national government of limited powers, that the states are sovereign laboratories of democracy, that religious faith and expression are protected by our Constitution and welcomed in the public square, and that our criminal laws best serve human dignity by preventing and punishing crime." Garnett adds, "Alito is an eminently worthy successor to O'Connor. What's more, he is all the more fitting a replacement, given their shared commitment to what has been quite rightly called our 'first freedom': The freedom of religion protected by the First Amendment."

Kennedy Seen As Supreme Court Swing Vote. Newsweek (1/30, Thomas, Taylor) reports that with the retirement of Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, Justice Anthony Kennedy "is seen by liberals and status-quo devotees as the remaining swing vote, a check on the court's rightward tilt as more justices are appointed by Republican presidents." Kennedy has 'evolved,' say the liberals -- much like other GOP-appointed justices before him, such as the late Harry Blackmun. Conservative lawyers scoff (though rarely on the record, lest they have to argue before Kennedy) that the justice is squishy and vainglorious, too worried about what the headlines will say about him. Other hard-liners regard him as a traitor."

NYTimes Argues Against Confirming Alito. An editorial in the New York Times (1/23, 1.19M) says Alito "is exactly the kind of legal thinker President Bush wants on the Supreme Court. He has a radically broad view of the president's power, and a radically narrow view of Congress's power. He has long argued that the Constitution does not protect abortion rights. He wants to reduce the rights and liberties of ordinary Americans, and has a history of tilting the scales of justice against the little guy. As senators prepare to vote on the nomination, they should ask themselves only one question: will replacing Sandra Day O'Connor with Judge Alito be a step forward for the nation, or a step backward?" Alito "may be a fine man, but he is not the kind of justice the country needs right now. Senators from both parties should oppose his nomination." The Times concludes, "If the far right takes over the Supreme Court, American law and life could change dramatically. If that happens, many senators who voted for Judge Alito will no doubt come to regret that they did not insist that Justice O'Connor's seat be filled with someone who shared her cautious, centrist approach to the law."

Bush To Unveil Market-Oriented Healthcare Proposals. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Gosselin, 958K) reports President Bush is "preparing to unveil a series of proposals that are intended to make the nation's healthcare system more efficient, but are likely to revive a bitter debate — begun last year over Social Security — about how much of life's biggest risks Americans should bear on their own." Many of the proposals, "such as limits on medical malpractice lawsuits, are ones the president has failed to get through Congress," but "he plans to unveil the initiatives as part of his vision for reshaping U.S. healthcare policy, aides and advisors said." Possible initiatives include "offering additional tax breaks for the use of Health Savings Accounts, and making most out-of-pocket medical spending by individuals tax-deductible." Bush's supporters "say that the changes would help tame rocketing medical costs by encouraging people to buy their own healthcare insurance and become smarter shoppers, rather than relying on employers or government programs such as Medicare and Medicaid to cover their health costs." Critics "argue that Bush's expected proposals would undermine the employer-provided health insurance system that now covers most working Americans." Despite the "political drubbing that the administration sustained on Social Security and over the flawed rollout of its Medicare prescription drug benefit, Bush appears eager to return to the fray."

U.S. News and World Report (1/30, Walsh) reports that White House officials say that in his State of the Union Address, President Bush "will focus in particular on controlling healthcare costs, which polls show is a top priority for voters. Bush is expected, for example, to recommend raising the amount individuals can deposit in health savings accounts, offering additional tax breaks for those who buy private insurance on their own, and allowing more portability for health insurance when people change jobs."

Newsweek (1/30, Wolffe, Bailey) adds, "After a series of 'listening' sessions with Hill allies last month, White House aides told members they wanted to do something 'achievable' after last year's failure to overhaul Social Security and the tax code. In his State of the Union speech, Bush will return to his old idea of tax-free health savings accounts, hoping that will appeal to younger voters who can carry their savings from one job to another. And he'll tout the new Medicare prescription-drug benefits, urging seniors to stay the course despite early bureaucratic snafus that have left some without coverage."

Bush Expected To Portray Himself As "Thrifty." Time (1/30, Cooper, Allen) adds, "After five years of tax cuts and massive spending that brought back deficits and ensured that they will continue for years if not decades, Bush plans to use his State of the Union address on Jan. 31 to portray himself as, well, thrifty. He will talk about the need to rein in programs like Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security, and he'll tout the modest budget cuts that Congress passed at his request last year. His staff wants to make 'restraining spending' a defining Bush characteristic, along with spreading democracy around the world and prosecuting the war on terrorism." However, Time adds that Bush "has a huge credibility problem," but he hopes to "earn his credentials as a fiscal disciplinarian when he talks about the long-term challenges posed by the exploding cost of entitlement programs, which together take up half the budget and are immune to White House or congressional tinkering. He wants to use his remaining years in office to persuade Congress to make transformational, money-saving changes in those programs, especially Medicare."

Bush Likely To Propose New Nuclear Energy Program. U.S. News and World Report (1/30, Bedard) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column, "Energy experts are predicting that President Bush is likely to offer up a new nuclear program in his State of the Union address. … The experts think Bush will push a plan to reprocess spent nuclear fuel for use in advanced reactors."

Aides See 2006 As Start Of Bush's "Third Term." U.S. News and World Report (1/30, Walsh) reports that President Bush is about to embark on "what he hopes will be a fresh start for his presidency. Bush tells friends that despite the many setbacks of the past year, the country still wants him to provide strong leadership, and that's what he aims to do. But that also means being more realistic, Bush has concluded, so he is ready to trim his sails a bit. … Some Bush strategists see 2006 as the start of Bush's 'third term.' They regard his first four years as a period of solid achievement that culminated in his re-election victory. They see 2005 as a 'term' of its own, 12 months marked by disappointment. They hope '06 will start an upswing." US News adds, "On a personal level, Bush is described by aides as upbeat and eager to get started on the 2006 agenda." US News also that the "real kickoff of 2006 will be the State of the Union address January 31. … Bush will continue to argue that progress is being made against the insurgents in Iraq and that the domestic economy is strong. But Republican insiders say he will also emphasize a series of smaller proposals that they predict will find ready acceptance among voters."

2005 Called Worst Year Of Bush Presidency. Newsweek (1/30, Wolffe, Bailey) says that 2005 was "the worst year of [Bush's] presidency." Bush "knows he needs something smart to offer the anxious GOP majority on Capitol Hill as its members head home to face the voters this fall. So he's shelved the ambitious domestic agenda he launched a year ago, and gone back to the mantra that's worked so well in the last two election cycles: it's the war, stupid." The Bush team "will remind the public of the controversy over Bush's decision to eavesdrop on Americans without a warrant as he keeps an ear out for terrorist activity. But Bush's aides believe they can rebrand the domestic snooping program as 'enemy surveillance' vital to protecting the country. The well-worn plan is premised on the notion that three elections after 9/11, the Democrats still don't have an answer to that line of attack."

Bush Team Said To Be Worried About Photos Of Bush With Abramoff. Time (1/30, Zagorin, Allen) reports that the White House has sought to portray the scandal surrounding lobbyist Jack Abramoff "as a Capitol Hill affair with little relevance to them." But, President Bush's "memory may soon be unhappily refreshed. TIME has seen five photographs of Abramoff and the President that suggest a level of contact between them that Bush's aides have downplayed. While TIME's source refused to provide the pictures for publication, they are likely to see the light of day eventually because celebrity tabloids are on the prowl for them. And that has been a fear of the Bush team's for the past several months: that a picture of the President with the admitted felon could become the iconic image of direct presidential involvement in a burgeoning corruption scandal like the shots of President Bill Clinton at White House coffees for campaign contributors in the mid-1990s."

The White House "has tried to play down any contact with" Abramoff, who "pleaded guilty to fraud charges this month and agreed to help prosecutors in a congressional corruption investigation." TIME "did not publish the photographs, saying its source refused to provide them for publication. Most look like those taken at presidential receptions, it said." The White House has said Bush "does not know Abramoff and does not recall meeting him, and that the lobbyist attended two Hannukah receptions and a few staff-level meetings at the White House."

The AP (1/23) reports, "Both Washingtonian and Time magazines have reported the existence of about a half-dozen photos showing the two together." The White House "has acknowledged that Abramoff attended some events at the Executive Mansion, and spokeswoman Dana Perino said Sunday it's not surprising that the two would have met." Perino said, "The president has taken tens upon thousands of pictures at such events."

Bloomberg (1/23, Willis) reports one photograph "shows Bush, Abramoff and Raul Garza Sr., who was then chairman of the Kickapoo Indian tribe, an Abramoff client who is under indictment for allegedly embezzling more than $300,000 from his tribe, Time reported. Another photo bears Bush's signature and shows the president shaking hands with Abramoff. Three others are of Bush, Abramoff and one of the lobbyist's three sons." According to Time, Garza's "meeting with Bush took place in 2001 in the Eisenhower Executive Office Building, next to the White House. Garza said the session was arranged with the help of Abramoff and Grover Norquist, a Republican activist, the magazine reported." Garza's tribe "owned a casino in Bush's home state of Texas, and there is no indication the administration acted to benefit the Kickapoo tribe at Abramoff's behest, Time said."

Democrats Deny They Benefited From Abramoff Contributions. Sen. John Kerry, on ABC's This Week (1/22, Stephanopoulos), responded to allegations that his 2004 campaign said, "got about $100,000 from…Abramoff-affiliated lobbying groups." Kerry stated, "I've never met Jack Abramoff. I've never had a dime come to me from Jack Abramoff. And I'm not going to stand for them suggesting that. … This is a Republican scandal."

Asked if corruption tied to Jack Abramoff is a "bipartisan scandal," Sen. Barack Obama, appearing on NBC's Meet the Press (1/22, Russert), said, "The specific problem of inviting lobbyists in who have bundled huge sums of money to write legislation, having them -- oil and gas companies come in to write energy legislation, having drug companies come in and write the Medicare prescription drug bill, which we now see is not working for our seniors. Those are very particular problems of this administration and this Congress. And I think Jack Abramoff and the K Street Project -- that whole thing is a very particular Republican sin."

Sen. Dick Durbin, on Fox News Sunday (1/22, Wallace), said, "I've never met Jack Abramoff, his wife or had any meeting with him. He and his wife donated $204,000 to politicians over a five-year period of time. Every single penny went to a Republican congressman or senator. … It is dead wrong for the Republican National Committee to be arguing now that the K Street Project that Tom DeLay and many others created on Capitol Hill had something to do with Democrats."

Texas Tribe Says It Was Victimized By Abramoff. In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (1/23), Ronnie Thomas, chairman of the Alabama-Coushatta Tribe of Texas, says, "In a Jan. 5 editorial-page commentary – 'The Least Transparent Industry in America' -- Fergus Bordewich identified the Alabama-Coushatta Tribe of Texas as a client of Jack Abramoff. Our tribe was never a client of Mr. Abramoff; we've had absolutely no relationship with him, other than being a victim of his unethical actions. On behalf of one of his clients, Mr. Abramoff worked to prevent our tribe from securing the rights to seek economic opportunities afforded federally recognized tribes under the Indian Gaming Regulatory Act (IGRA). Moreover, he directed another of his tribal clients to request that our tribe make a $50,000 donation to the Capital Athletic Foundation. Members of that tribe have admitted that they misrepresented what the donation was for, telling us that it was to support a congressional fact-finding mission and never mentioning Mr. Abramoff. We now know that Mr. Abramoff used our donation to pay for his trip to Scotland with Rep. Bob Ney."

Levitt Compares Congressional Lobbying Scandal To Corporate Corruption. In a Washington Post op-ed (1/23, A15), Arthur Levitt Jr., former chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, said, "I've come to think that our federal government is plagued by some of the same problems that have been hurting corporate America, primarily a lack of transparency, accountability and independence. As with many of the disgraced corporations of the past few years -- Adelphia, Tyco and WorldCom, for example -- so it is with Congress: Conflicts of interest abound, oversight has been myopic and those given the public's trust have used it to enrich themselves." Lawmakers "need not look far for an example of how to reform themselves. Just as Congress passed the Sarbanes-Oxley Act in 2002 to clean up American industry, it should pass similar legislation to clean up American government." Congressional lobbyists "should be required to disclose weekly, online, which members of Congress they contributed to and met with, which staff members they lobbied, and what issues were discussed. Lobbyists also should have to affix their signature to these disclosures and, like CEOs who sign false financial statements, face serious criminal penalties if the disclosures are not accurate." Levitt also identifies reforms that would restore congressional accountability and independence.

Kristol Says Election Of Shadegg Would Show House GOP Is Committed To Reform. Bill Kristol, editor of The Weekly Standard, appearing on Fox News Sunday (1/22, Wallace), said, "I think one test will be the House Republican leadership fight for majority leader to see how seriously Republicans want to send a signal of reform. … I think John Shadegg, who is the conservative reformist candidate, both because he was not a member of the leadership previously and was sort of a rebel against the leadership, and he voted against some of the big government programs that President Bush signed, particularly the Medicare prescription drug benefit. So if you think the problem is that even Republicans have expanded the size of government, Shadegg would send a signal that the Republicans are coming back to not creating new entitlements."

McCain Says Lobbying Reform Proposals Not Addressing Earmarks. Asked if he thinks "Jack Abramoff and his influence-peddling" is "a Republican scandal" Sen. John McCain, on Fox News Sunday (1/22, Wallace), replied, "No, I think it's a bipartisan scandal, because the lobbying is out of control. But the reason why the lobbying is out of control is because of the process, the system that prevails here on Capitol Hill between Republican and Democrat, and that's a thing called earmarking or pork barrel projects." McCain added, "It's time we sat down together, because both Democrat and Republican proposals are very similar."

The AP (1/23) reports Sen. John McCain said "efforts by both Democrats and Republicans to reduce the influence of lobbyists are not addressing the core of the problem." In an appearance on "Fox News Sunday," Sen. McCain "renewed his criticism of 'earmarks,' late additions to bills that often provide millions of dollars for lawmakers' pet projects." Said McCain, "If we don't fix the earmarking, then I can assure you the corruption will go on." The AP adds McCain said "lobbying reform promoted last week by both parties doesn't deal with earmarking because many politicians perceive it to be 'their bread and butter and preserves their incumbency.'"

USA Today (1/23, 2.31M) reports Sen. McCain said "lobbying 'is out of control,' and efforts to curb it don't address the core problem of 'earmarking.'" McCain "described an earmark as a 'pork barrel project' funded 'in the middle of the night' by a single provision 'that nobody's ever seen or heard of' inserted in a bill about to be passed." McCain said it "was a bipartisan problem, but Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said it is a Republican scandal because the GOP controls Congress and the White House."

Novak Questions Whether Parties Will Unite To End "Scourge Of Earmarks." Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (1/23) writes that the GOP and Democratic versions of lobbyist reform that were revealed last week "each fell short of what is called for by the reformer most widely respected by the public, Sen. John McCain. … A reform of a system that has grown ever more rotten must have two salient characteristics in McCain's view. It must be bipartisan, and it must eviscerate, if not eliminate, earmarks." Novak says that McCain faces an extremely difficult task in convincing "Democrats to cooperate with Republicans when they now see an opportunity to crush the GOP," while weaning "his own party from its addiction to government pork." Novak notes, "Annual earmarks, non-existent two decades ago, now near 15,000. McCain sees this as the source of lobbyist corruption, the vehicle used to bribe Duke Cunningham and the focus for half the capital's lobbyists. Both parties are united in silly changes like keeping former congressmen off the House floor and further curtailing how much a lobbyist can spend on a lawmaker's lunch. Will they unite to get rid of the scourge of earmarks?"

Rove Raising His Profile In Advance Of 2006 Elections. Newsweek (1/30) reports in its "Periscope" column, "After months of staying out of the limelight amid scrutiny in the CIA leak investigation, [Deputy White House Chief of Staff Karl] Rove is back and circulating, as Bush and the GOP prepare for battle on the eve of the 2006 midterm elections. He's traveling on domestic swings with Bush and taking high-profile trips of his own." Newsweek notes that Rove 'is still under scrutiny' in the investigation into the leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's name.

Ripon Society Said To Offer Lobbyists Access To Lawmakers. The Washington Post (1/23, A4, Edsall, 744K) reports that since 1964, the Ripon Society "has tried to create a more inclusive GOP through 'moderate, progressive policy formation,' according to its official mission statement." But in "recent years, however, a leading public watchdog group suggests, the Ripon Society has added an unofficial mission: travel agency to lobbyists." Under president Richard S. Kessler, "himself a prominent Washington lobbyist, people who represent corporate interests before Congress have 'spent millions taking lawmakers to European capitals and U.S. resorts' under the auspices of the Ripon Society and the affiliated Ripon Educational Fund, the group Public Citizen charged in a new report." Frank Clemente, director of Public Citizen's Congress Watch, said the "lure for the lobbyists who fund them is that they also take the trips, and gain 'unbridled access' to influential lawmakers." The activities "the report detailed are not illegal, but ethics specialists say they do highlight the difficulty of proscribing certain common Washington practices, if lobbyists and lawmakers are determined to continue them." Kessler is also "president of Kessler & Associates. Among its clients, according to the most recent disclosure forms, are Pfizer Inc. and three other major drug companies; Altria Group Inc., the corporate parent of cigarette maker Philip Morris USA; and railroad giant Burlington Northern Santa Fe Corp." Public Citizen says "members of Congress have gone on trips costing the Ripon Society and Ripon Education Fund $742,000 since 2000. In addition, Kessler's clients have provided another $273,000 for congressional travel."

Bush Speaking Glowingly Of Mao Biography. The New York Times (1/23, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports in its "White House Letter" column, "When President Bush met with Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany in the Oval Office this month, the talk turned to Ms. Merkel's childhood under Communism, then wandered to the subject of Mr. Bush's latest bedtime reading: 'Mao: The Unknown Story,' an 814-page biography that presents the Chinese dictator as another Hitler or Stalin. Participants in the meeting say Mr. Bush spoke glowingly of the book." The Times adds," The book might at first seem an odd choice for Mr. Bush, whose taste in biography, like that of other American presidents, runs to previous occupants of the Oval Office. But it is not so surprising given that 'Mao: The Unknown Story' has been embraced by the right as a searing indictment of Communism. … Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, said last week that Laura Bush gave the book to her husband as a gift, and that the president had just finished reading it. Asked why Mr. Bush liked the book, Mr. McClellan said he would find out, then reported back on Friday that Mr. Bush had told him that 'Mao' 'really shows how brutal a tyrant he was' and that 'he was much more brutal than people assumed.'"

Conservative Book Club Attacks Barnes' New Book About Bush. The Washington Post (1/23, C1, Kurtz, 744K) reports in its "Media Notes" column that the Conservative Book Club has attacked Weekly standard executive editor Fred Barnes' forthcoming book, "Rebel-in-Chief: Inside the Bold and Controversial Presidency of George W. Bush." Book club editor in chief Jeffrey Rubin writes, "'Rebel-in-Chief' is filled with 'empty puffery.'' Rubin adds that Barnes is "too favorable toward 'all those things that Bush does to drive traditional conservatives to despair' in a way that 'call[s] into question his own understanding of conservatism. ... Fred Barnes isn't doing the president -- or the country -- any favors by celebrating his worst political tendencies.'"

Rice Pushes Diversity In State Department Workforce. The Washington Post (1/23, A13, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice caused a bit of a stir in Foggy Bottom last week when she unveiled plans to redeploy diplomats from Europe to world hot spots. And no promotions, she said, without service in dangerous posts and fluency in two foreign languages, especially those spoken by people who may fancy grenade launchers and scream 'Death to America.' She also talked about the need for a more diverse Foreign Service, something that might improve diplomats' feel for foreign cultures. After all, just because you speak the language doesn't mean you can figure out when someone is lying through his teeth." The Post adds, "Diversity is one area where neither the State Department nor the National Security Council nor the Pentagon, despite decades of talking about it, have claimed much success. … At the State Department, four of six undersecretaries working for Rice are women, but a check of the top 45 or so officials at the assistant secretary level and higher finds fewer than a half-dozen minorities."

HHS IG Finds Low Rates Of Foster Care Visits, Poor Record Keeping. In the absence of proof from most of the states, federal officials are concerned that many foster children are not being visited regularly by caseworkers. The Washington Post (1/23, A13, 744K) reports, "Only 19 states and the District were able to produce computer-based reports detailing how often such visits occurred in fiscal 2003, according to a new report by the inspector general for the Department of Health and Human Services. Seventeen of those states required monthly visits. Yet, five reported that less than half of their foster care children were visited that frequently. Another five states reported a visitation rate of 75 percent or less. Most states said they lacked the resources to produce such a report or they did not have a computer record-keeping system."

DeLay Says He's Focused On Future. In her Pittsburgh Tribune-Review column (1/22), Salena Zito interviewed Rep. Tom DeLay, noting that it is his "nature to move forward, whatever chaos swirls around him." At a Houston campaign rally for Gov. Rick Perry, DeLay said, "My top priorities are my constituents ... homeland-border security, improving our regional transportation infrastructure and NASA." The Tribune-Review adds Democrats "hate DeLay because he beat them, often and hard -- and he enjoyed it. Democrats may be miles apart on issues but they're united when it comes to taking down a wounded Republican, especially this former House majority leader." DeLay said, "Politics has to be about the issues ... . (W)hen you personalize political differences, you might occasionally hurt your opponent but you ultimately just destroy yourself. Politics should be about who's right and wrong, not who's good and bad." DeLay "says he'd rather concentrate on keeping Republicans what even many Republicans say they no longer are -- the party of fiscal responsibility and reform."

Obama Draws Fire For Criticizing GOP Ethics Lapses, But Not Those Of Illinois Democrats. In his Chicago Tribune column (1/22), John Kass says Sen. Barack Obama is "trying to pull off a real miracle. Obama, the Chicago Democrat, is the lead public thwacker of Republicans on the corruption issue involving self-admitted crooked Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff." The miracle is "that he's trying to do this and push ethics legislation, while avoiding mention of the corruption among Democrats in Illinois. Federal investigations are crawling through the administrations of Chicago Mayor Richard Daley and Gov. Rod Blagojevich while Obama skips the mess back home." Obama "can't discuss virtue in Washington without speaking to the sleaze in Chicago. If he does, he'll be just another suit mouthing hollow words. Barack Obama is better than that."

Most Find Medicare Drug Program Difficult To Understand. The AP (!/22, Lester) reported on an AP/Ipsos poll which found that most people, "particularly senior citizens, say they are having a hard time understanding the new Medicare prescription drug program. … More than half, 52 percent, of respondents say they think the program that began enrolling people on Jan. 1 is tough to understand. Two-thirds of older people surveyed and two-thirds of those who have signed up say they are confused by the program, which is intended to help many save more on their prescription drugs. A third said they had not decided what they think of the new program and 16 percent said they have little trouble figuring out the program."

McClellan Blames Late Enrollments For Drug Benefit's Difficulties. Time (1/30, Thottam) reports, "A quarter of the 24 million people now enrolled in Medicare Part D are 'dual eligibles,' people who qualify for both Medicaid and Medicare. In other words, they are among the poorest and frailest people in the country. More than 70% of them make less than $10,000 a year; 372,000 of them have Alzheimer's. Republicans realize that after Katrina, they cannot risk another crisis in which the government appears to be abandoning its most vulnerable citizens. Some are already making that connection." Time adds, "In an interview with TIME last week, Mark McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said most people entered the new system without encountering trouble. He attributed much of the difficulty of those who did to the huge number of people who enrolled or switched plans at the end of December. Although assigned to plans, dual eligibles had the right to change by Dec. 31 to one that best suited their needs. The Medicare bureaucracy is still catching up with all that data, McClellan says." Time also notes that "in response to the bipartisan outrage, House Republican leaders are considering a proposal, initially suggested by Democrats, to extend the deadline for signing up for the new benefit from May 15 to Dec. 31, a House G.O.P. aide tells TIME."

Center for Medicare and Medicare Services (CMS). McCutcheon "is deep in the weeds of the largest, most complex and -- judging from its first three weeks -- messiest expansion of the program in its history." She "works 12-hour days, taking conference calls, combing through statutory language and rethinking the fine print of 60 pages of federal regulations she helped to write." The Post adds, "As complaints and confusion about the drug benefit have spread around the country this month, McCutcheon said, 'some of the specific issues that come up have been surprising.' Still, she said, 'you never bring up a huge program and have everything perfect.'"

Kristol Warns GOP Could Lose Seats Over Medicare Drug Benefit. Bill Kristol, editor of The Weekly Standard, said on Fox News Sunday (1/22, Wallace), "Republicans have much…to fear about the Medicare drug prescription benefit going bad and them being blamed for -- that was passed on a party vote, pretty much. That is an October ad, 'he voted for this Medicare benefit, which isn't a benefit, which is going to cost you a lot money, which has been incompetently administered' -- whatever the charge is going to be. That could cost a congressman his seat."

Obama Says Administration Has "Competence Issue." Asked on NBC's Meet the Press (1/22, Russert) if he agreed with Sen. Clinton that this administration "will go down in history as one of the worst," Sen. Barack Obama responded, "I agree with her remarks about cronyism and incompetence. I don't think that anybody who has been watching the news over the last year, who has seen what happened in New Orleans, who has seen some of the botched planning that took place, post-war in Iraq, would not think that there is a competence issue when it comes to this administration."

Celebrities Push Pet Causes On Capitol Hill. The Los Angeles Times (1/22, Shiver, 958K) reported on the "growing parade of celebrities trekking up Capitol Hill to talk to the nation's lawmakers about issues that rarely have anything to do with their day jobs. Trying to get attention for pet causes easily lost in the clutter of public policy debates, stars hope their cachet can make the difference in opening doors, getting media attention and scoring face time on C-SPAN. … For celebrities, testifying and lobbying in the nation's capital offers the ego stroke of being taken seriously on important issues, and a chance to make headlines for something other than their latest loves or public mishaps. … But it also can often backfire when it appears a celebrity is simply fronting for an issue in which he or she has no special expertise. In 2002, Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) walked out of a Senate subcommittee hearing on the environmental effect of mountain mining when Kevin Richardson, a Kentucky native and member of the Backstreet Boys singing group, was called as a witness. Voinovich told reporters the proceedings had turned into 'a joke.'"

OTHER NEWS:

Oil Prices Could Climb Above $70 A Barrel. Crude oil futures reached a 20-year high Friday, closing at $68.35 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange sparking speculation that oil could soon rise above $70 a barrel. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Goodman, 2.11M) reports, "That is a significant milestone and a telling indication of sentiment in the market: The only time oil prices have traded above $70 was Aug. 30, 2005, just after Hurricane Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast, blazing a trail of destruction through the oil industry."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/23, Scherer, 61K) adds, "This time, the main impetus appears to be a bad case of international jitters, ranging from Iran to Nigeria to Osama bin Laden. If the tensions don't cool off, energy analysts warn, consumers should brace themselves to pay more at the gas pump in weeks ahead."

NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 3, 1:00, Mathison) reported, "The natural price for oil is probably in the $70 a barrel. However if things do cool off in Iran the risk premium could be lowered and prices could fall off and could you see oil prices in the $60 neighborhood."

Investors Nervous Amid Oil, Profit Worries. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Browning, 2.11M) reports, "With the current bull market now more than three years old, the question is whether the economy can improve enough to get people…to feel good enough to start buying stocks again." At the start of the year, amid "optimism that the Federal Reserve would soon stop raising short-term interest rates and that corporate profit and economic growth would remain robust, investors bid stocks up strongly. But then, two bad things happened: Oil prices surged again amid concerns over rebel activity in oil-producing Nigeria and the West's showdown with Iran over its nuclear program. Then, prominent companies such as Intel, Citigroup and General Electric announced quarterly results that missed Wall Street expectations. That double whammy raised questions…about whether investor expectations had gotten too high and stock prices had become 'frothy.'" The Journal adds, "If investors adjust this week to the Iran worries, some of that selling pressure could ease. But a more fundamental reason that investors are nervous is that they fear that some of the market's underpinnings have weakened, making it harder for stocks to hold up in the face of the oil and profit worries."

Euphoria About Close Above 11,000 Has Faded. USA Today (1/23, Shell, Krantz, 2.31M) adds, "When the Dow closed above 11,000 on Jan. 9 for the first time in 4½ years, Wall Street viewed it as a harbinger of better things to come. The euphoria was short-lived. The Dow Jones industrial average's fast start is history. And the bright outlook for stocks in 2006 has suddenly turned cloudy. A 213-point sell-off Friday, the Dow's biggest one-day point decline since March 24, 2003, not only erased the Dow's 3% year-to-date gain and left it 333 points below the key 11,000 level, it also chipped away at investors' confidence." The "sharp reversal could offset the psychological boost that accompanied the Dow's topping of 11,000. Wall Street was hoping that the upbeat headlines would increase investors' comfort level and make them more willing to commit fresh money to stocks. Now there's concern they will remain on the sidelines."

Greenspan To Leave Federal Reserve Chair Quietly. USA Today (1/23, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports that Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan will leave his job "just as quietly as he came in more than 18 years ago. No speeches are planned for investors to parse his every word. No testimony is scheduled on Capitol Hill for lawmakers to hear the chairman's opinion on pet issues. And he's not accepting interview requests from the media. He will quietly walk out the door on the evening of Jan. 31 with very little fanfare. … Greenspan's last day at the Fed will be marked by a luncheon with other policymakers, and a staff reception is scheduled. Small, private parties are also being held around Washington to mark his departure."

The AP (1/23, Benac) says Greenspan has managed the US economy "with great assurance for the past 18 years, presiding over an era of remarkable prosperity (interrupted by two mild recessions). He has done this as chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, a powerful and somewhat mystical institution that guides U.S. monetary policy. From that vantage, Greenspan has steered the economy through multiple international and domestic crises while keeping inflation and unemployment in check and helping the country adapt to the tectonic shifts of globalization and technology."

Some Analysts Say Greenspan Is Leaving "A Prosperity Built On Borrowing." A front page story in the Washington Post (1/23, A1, Henderson, 744K) reports that Greenspan's legacy "will be judged not just by his record at the Fed, but also by the economy he bequeaths. And when he leaves office Jan. 31, Greenspan leaves a nation awash in debt -- record household debt and a record trade gap. Many analysts say his low interest rate policies contributed to these huge imbalances, which threaten the economy he nurtured." The Post adds, "Greenspan's Fed didn't do it alone, economists agree. Other factors helped fuel the borrowing binge, including global financial trends that have helped keep mortgage rates low and prompted lenders to extend more credit to more people. The result is a prosperity built on borrowing, say many economists."

Runway Warning System Said To Be Outdated. USA Today (1/23, Levin, 2.31M) reports, "An antiquated warning system for the nation's pilots has led dozens of them to receive unreliable information about slippery runways and to land in dangerous conditions, according to a USA TODAY review of accidents and pilot reports during the past decade. In at least 42 cases since 1995, pilots of commercial and corporate aircraft reported skidding off runways after receiving reports that the runways were safe, according to NASA's Aviation Safety Reporting System." USA Today notes, "Icy conditions came into play in last month's crash of a Southwest Airlines jet, which skidded off a snowy runway at Chicago's Midway Airport and onto a nearby road…killing a 6-year-old boy."

Poll Finds Support Among Young For Abstinence-Only Sex Education. The Washington Times (1/22, Harper, 90K) reports that there is support among young people for abstinence-only sex education programs. According to a new Harris Poll, "56 percent of people ages 18 to 24, and 60 percent of those 25 to 29 think abstinence programs effectively reduce or prevent the occurrence of HIV/AIDS. Another 49 percent of people ages 18 to 24 and 52 percent of those ages 25 to 29 say the programs reduce or prevent unwanted pregnancies. Among six age groups and three political groups, younger respondents showed the strongest support for abstinence over safe-sex programs." The poll of 1,961 adults "was conducted Dec. 8-14."

Duckworth Only Seriously Wounded Iraq Vet Running For Congress. USA Today (1/23, Stone, 2.31M) reports on Illinois House candidate Tammy Duckworth, an retired Army Major and Iraq war veteran who lost both her legs and the use of her right arm when her Blackhawk helicopter was hit by a rocket propelled grenade. Many "in Chicago's western suburbs have already heard" of Duckworth, the "only seriously wounded combat veteran running this year for Congress, whose ranks of members with military experience are at their lowest since World War II, according to Congressional Quarterly." At least "nine other veterans who served in the post-Sept. 11 military have announced House bids. All but one — Republican Van Taylor in Texas — are Democrats who have criticized the Bush administration's conduct of the war." Duckworth says it "was 'a bad decision' to invade Iraq. So she is competing on another field of battle: politics. She hopes to succeed retiring Rep. Henry Hyde, a Republican who has held a House seat for more than 30 years. Duckworth must first beat two other Democrats in a primary and then take on Peter Roskam, a Republican state senator in the GOP-leaning district." University of Virginia political analyst Larry Sabato said, "Since Vietnam, the Democratic Party has been viewed as the weaker on national security issues. Who better to make the case than veterans of the war? It's hard to accuse them of a lack of patriotism."

Ford To Announce Layoffs, Restructuring Plan Today. NBC Nightly News (1/22, lead story, 2:00, Thompson) reported, "Detroit is holding its collected breath as tomorrow Ford will announce its restructuring blueprint. Having lost more than a billion dollars in North America last year, Ford is expected to cut up to 30,000 hourly and salaried jobs and close several plants, as part of its 'way forward' plan. That way forward will hurt. Analysts say among the plants shuttered are Atlanta, where the Ford Taurus is built, St. Louis, SUV sales hurt by high gas prices, also plants in St. Paul, Minnesota and in Michigan, the goal to bring numbers in line with the numbers themselves." Though its "redesigned Mustang is a hot seller, its market share is shrinking, today just capturing 17% of the American market compared to 25% a decade ago. It is competition from foreign manufacturers plus labor costs and gas price that is has put Ford in a situation one analyst described as dire."

Girl's Death Sparks Reevaluation Of NYC Protective Services. The New York Times (1/23, 1.19M) editorializes, "In a city that has seen child abuse fatalities before, the death of Nixzmary Brown, just 7 years old, was a particularly horrifying one. … What raised the level of outrage was the disclosure that city workers inexplicably ignored or bungled opportunities to save her. It's reassuring that Mayor Michael Bloomberg acknowledged the city's failures, and that child welfare workers and supervisors involved in the case have been suspended or reassigned. Some may lose their jobs. A larger investigation will take place and thousands of cases are being reviewed. The self-examination, though, cannot stop there."

Top Iranian Official Warns Against Referral To Security Council. The Financial Times (1/23, Khalaf, Smyth) reports, "Iran's top nuclear official on Sunday warned Tehran would resume efforts to enrich uranium on an industrial scale if its case was reported to the UN Security Council, further raising the stakes in the crisis over its nuclear program. 'If the case goes to the Security Council, we're obliged...to lift all voluntary measures,' he said, specifying that this included industrial-scale uranium enrichment." The story continues: "Mr Larijani spoke at the start of a week of intense diplomacy. European officials will visit capitals represented on the 35-member IAEA governing board to lobby for an EU-backed resolution on referral. Meanwhile, Mr Larijani is likely to be in Moscow to discuss a Russian proposal to find a compromise, an effort to forestall the Europeans or at least temper the tone of any IAEA resolution." The Financial Times (1/23) also reports Larijani "ridiculed western governments' request for a document said to show a weapons design obtained from the illegal nuclear procurement network of Pakistani scientist A.Q. Khan, and suggested Tehran would not hand it over to UN inspectors." Larijani told the FT, "If you can find anyone in the world who can make a bomb with one and a half pages, we will cover their whole body with gold."

Meanwhile, under the headline "West Talks Tough With Iran, Treads Lightly," the Wall Street Journal (1/23, Robbins, 2.11M) reports, "As U.S. and European officials press to have Iran brought before the United Nations Security Council, they are also promising that Tehran won't face serious punishment there -- for quite a while. ... Even as they press for a showdown with Tehran, American officials privately acknowledge that they aren't sure how to calibrate political or economic sanctions to bring maximum pressure on Iran's leadership without alienating the country's pro-reform and pro-American public. In recent weeks, officials in Washington and London have begun thinking about an aggressive public-relations campaign, beamed into Iran, to counteract Tehran's certain efforts to incite a strong nationalist backlash."

Sadr Says His Militia Would Defend Iran If Attacked. Reuters (1/23) reports, "Firebrand Iraqi cleric Moqtada al-Sadr has assured Iran that his Shi'ite Muslim militiamen will support the Islamic Republic if it comes under attack, the official IRNA news agency reported on Sunday. … 'If neighboring Islamic countries, including Iran, should come under attack, then the Mehdi Army will support them,' Sadr said on a visit to Tehran."

Iran Seeking To Use Oil Production As Leverage In Confrontation Over Nuclear Program. NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 2, 1:30, Williams) reported, "Iran, one of the world's biggest oil producers, has refused to halt its nuclear program. And many nations, including the US, see that as a potential security threat." NBC (Jordan) added, "Iran is not just a serious diplomatic challenge for the US and its allies, it's also turning into a challenge to their economies. The price of unleaded still going up nationwide. Overseas, no sign of any real retreat in the price of crude. All this, say analysts, prove the market is worried about Iran, its nuclear program and the global economy, especially if the UN Security Council gets involved. But on the Sunday talk shows, no agreement on the best way to hold Iran accountable." Sen. Pat Roberts: "Sanctions don't work unless you have a unified position with all trading partners with Iran." Sen. Joseph Lieberman: "If we feel Iran having nuclear weapons is that much danger to the rest of the world, then we have to be prepared to take military action." Jordan: "The White House has been trying to convince the public the economy is doing well, but Iran could turn into a very unwelcome complication."

Iranians Said To Stand Behind Government's Atomic Program. The Washington Post (1/23, A9, Vick, 744K) reports, "If any doubt remains that Iranians support their government in its quest to harness the atom, the answer comes quickly and emphatically in Persepolis, the magnificent ruins that symbolize the ancient pride and fading glory bound up with the nuclear issue here. Ordinary Iranians overwhelmingly favor their country's nuclear ambitions, interviews and surveys show." The support "runs deep in the population of 68 million, cutting across differences of education, age and, most significantly, attitudes toward the fundamentalist government that the Bush administration says is intent on using an energy program as a cover for developing atomic weapons." The Post adds, "Interviews with Iranians touring the ruins on a holiday weekend here suggest the breadth of the challenge facing Western powers determined to freeze Iran's recently reactivated nuclear program."

Israel Playing "Childish Game," Iran Says. The AP (1/23, Karimi) reports, "Iran said Sunday that Israel would be making a 'fatal mistake' if it takes military action against Tehran's nuclear program and dismissed veiled threats from the Jewish state as a 'childish game.'" While Israeli "Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz stopped short of an outright threat of military action [in comments Saturday], he said Israel "must have the capability to defend itself...and this we are preparing." The story cites Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Hamid Reza Asefi as saying: "We consider Mofaz's comments a form of psychological warfare. Israel knows just how much of a fatal mistake it would be (to attack Iran). ... This is just a childish game by Israel." The Washington Times (1/23, Rabinovich, 90K) reports Israel's defense minister "hinted strongly over the weekend that his country would act unilaterally if necessary to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons."

West Pursuing "Frog Strategy" With Iran. Time (1/30, Shannon) reports in its "Notebook" column, "As Iran shows no signs of giving in to global calls to cease its nuclear-research activities, Western nations have been mapping out a careful, incremental plan to stop Tehran. The West's plan is informally known to diplomats as the frog strategy," referring "to the old saw that if you want to boil a frog, you put the unsuspecting amphibian in a pot of cold water. … The plan was crafted by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her French, German and British counterparts. The E.U. trio requested a meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency, now set for Feb. 2, to consider referring Iran to the U.N. Security Council. If the case goes there, the allies plan a three-step approach: first, a mild resolution exhorting Tehran to end its questionable atomic activity voluntarily. If after two or three months Iran remains intransigent, they would then propose a stronger Security Council order based on the U.N.'s authority to combat threats to international peace. Step three would call for targeted sanctions, such as a freeze on government bank accounts a possibility for which Tehran apparently began planning last week when it started to shift its foreign-currency reserves from E.U. banks." Proponents of the strategy "say that only the go-slow approach can win support from Russia and China. … As for a step four to the strategy, there is no clear one yet: an uncooperative frog is something nobody wants to talk about."

UBS To Stop Doing Business With Iran. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, 2.11M) reports, "UBS AG said yesterday that it will stop doing business with Iran because of the Swiss bank's economic and risk analysis of the situation in the country." UBS "will no longer deal with individuals, companies or state institutions such as Iran's central bank, said bank spokesman Serge Steiner. A similar policy is being implemented in Syria, he said."

McCain Says Military Action Must Be Only "Last Option." Asked on Fox News Sunday (1/22, Wallace), if believes the "diplomatic track" will "stop Iran from developing a nuclear capability," Sen. John McCain said, "I don't know. I believe we have to exhaust all those options. But we cannot take the military option off the table. But we have to make it very clear it's the last option."

Roberts Cites Difficulties In Targeting Iranian Nuclear Facilities. Commenting on possible military action against Iran's nuclear facilities, Sen. Pat Roberts, on CBS' Face the Nation (1/22, Schieffer), said, "Their whole operation is spread out much more broadly than they have in the past. I would never rule that out. But at this particular time, I just do not think that that is...any kind of an alternative."

Lieberman Describes Potential Air Attack. Sen. Joseph Lieberman, on CBS' Face the Nation (1/22, Schieffer), said, "The fact is that it's good that we're working with Britain, France, and Germany now. But the pace is too slow. We've got to try to take it to the United Nations. I'm pessimistic that Russia and China will let us do what we want to do. And then I think we've got to form a coalition of the willing, first to impose economic sanctions on Iran, and secondly, we can never take the military option off the table. And if we feel that Iran having nuclear weapons is that much a danger to the rest of the world, then we've got to be prepared to take military action to deter their ability to get nuclear weapons." Lieberman continued, "This would be primarily an air attack. It's not going to involve massive use of ground forces. … We never want to be in a position to have to essentially contract out the protection of our national security vis-a-vis Iran to another country like Israel. And it's not easy for the Israelis. They don't have the same aircraft capacity that we do, capable of doing this."

US Spent $1.9 Million To Help Boost Fatah In Palestinian Elections. Following a Sunday report in the Washington Post, the New York Times (1/23, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports this morning, "The United States spent about $1.9 million of its yearly $400 million in aid to the Palestinians on dozens of quick projects before elections this week to bolster the governing Fatah faction's image with voters and strengthen its hand in competing with the militant faction Hamas, American and Palestinian officials said Sunday. ... American and Palestinian officials who spoke anonymously because they were not authorized to speak to reporters said that the program, which started in August, was intended to help defeat Hamas and that the government had done a detailed political analysis to try to focus on constituencies where Hamas was doing well." Meanwhile, Micaela Schweitzer-Bluhm, a spokeswoman for the American consulate in East Jerusalem, told the Times: "The spending was intended 'to work with the Palestinian Authority to enhance democratic institutions and support democratic actors, not just Fatah.' ... Although American aid was always acknowledged publicly, Ms. Schweitzer-Bluhm said, 'Our logo was not always on the banner.'"

NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 6, 1:30, Fletcher) added, "Election fever in Gaza, from children shouting slogans to women running for Parliament. Palestinians swept along in a wave of democracy. Wednesday will be their first elections in 10 years. It's neck and neck between the only party ever to hold power, and the arch rivals are fundamentalist Hamas. They are toning down its rhetoric which calls for the destruction of Israel. Instead, they are focused on clean government, an end of corruption, and they don't rule out negotiations with Israel. Now Fatah is getting help. $2 million of foreign aid is being used to help financial the campaign, paying for a tree-planting ceremony, praising Mahoud Abbas."

Israel Braces For Likely Hamas Win. The AP (1/23, Federman) reports Acting Israeli PM Ehud Olmert "met with top military and political officials Sunday to discuss the growing likelihood that the militant group Hamas could dominate this week's Palestinian elections. The ascendance of Hamas has alarmed Israel, which appears to have been caught off guard by the group's surging popularity before Wednesday's vote." The New York Times (1/23, Erlanger,

1.19M), meanwhile reports, "Fatah, the mainstay of the Palestinian Authority and the Palestine Liberation Organization, is in trouble, even ... in Nablus, one of the West Bank's toughest and largest cities, and a longtime stronghold for the group. Fatah is struggling to beat back" Hamas, "which won an astonishing 13 of Nablus's 15 local council seats a month ago, and elected an efficient, worldly yet devout mayor."

The Washington Times (1/23, Mitnick, 90K) also reports on the "kaleidoscope of campaign banners," noting "nowhere to be seen is the likeness of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. With his Fatah Party dangerously close to losing Wednesday's parliamentary elections to the Islamic militants of Hamas, the Palestinian moderate has taken a surprisingly low profile in a contest that many see as a referendum on his tenure." The Times adds, "Aides say election laws forbid campaigning by the president, who is not up for re-election." But "others say Palestinians are so disappointed with Mr. Abbas that he would only hurt his party." The New York Times (1/23, Erlanger, 1.19M) runs a similar story under the headline "In A Stronghold, Fatah Fights To Beat Back A Rising Hamas."

Wolfowitz's Drive Against World Bank "Corruption" Causes Controversy. The Financial Times (1/23, Balls, Alden) reports, "Paul Wolfowitz, president of the World Bank, has triggered a bitter conflict with the bank's senior career staff by empowering a group of close political advisers to pursue aggressively what he sees as widespread corruption surrounding bank projects." The dispute "has come to a head with the appointment last week of Suzanne Rich Folsom, a counsellor to Mr Wolfowitz with close ties to the Republican party, as the new director of the Department of Institutional Integrity, the internal bank watchdog that investigates suspected fraud and staff misconduct." Her appointment "has raised objections that a person close to Mr Wolfowitz, and with a political background, has been put into a senior position at a unit that was seen as independent of the president's office since it was set up in 2001."

China, Saudis Expected To Sign Energy Deal. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Oster, 2.11M) reports, "China and Saudi Arabia are expected to sign a wide-ranging agreement today on energy cooperation amid Beijing's quest to secure more energy resources vital to fuel its fast-growing economy." China, "the world's second-biggest consumer of oil, has been seeking to tighten economic and political partnerships with its major oil suppliers across Central Asia, Africa and Latin America. Its quest has taken on added urgency since 2004, when the country's oil demand surged about 15%, helping underpin the biggest rise in international oil prices in a generation."

Russian Explosions Sever Gas Lines To Georgia. The New York Times (1/23, Chivers, 1.19M) reports, "Explosions in southern Russia on Sunday morning severed the country's natural gas pipelines to Georgia, swiftly plunging Russia's neighbor into heat and electricity shortages and causing a diplomatic flare-up between the nations. ... By late afternoon, President Mikheil Saakashvili of Georgia said gas flow had ceased and energy rationing would be necessary. ... The shortage was expected to last at least two days." According to the Times, "Russian officials initially said the explosions appeared accidental but later announced that a criminal investigation had begun and that the blasts were acts of sabotage."

Morales Sworn In As Bolivian President. The Financial Times (1/23, Weitzman) reports, "Evo Morales was sworn in on Sunday as Bolivia's first indigenous president in a historic and emotional ceremony that set the tone for his new government." In a long speech, Morales "warned the US not to try to dominate the region, promised to slash parliamentary salaries and stamp out corruption, and reaffirmed his commitment to nationalising Bolivia's hydrocarbons sector." He also "pledged to change Bolivia's economic model. 'We have to end neo-liberalism,' he said. A central theme was the long struggle by the indigenous majority in Bolivia against discrimination: 'We need to repair 500 years of history.'"

The New York Times (1/23, Forero, 1.19M) adds that "in the Congress, Mr. Morales asked for a moment of silence for Inca martyrs, for the Argentine guerrilla Che Guevara, who died in a failed effort to start a revolution here in 1967, and 'the millions of humans who have fallen in all of Latin America.'" In "a rambling, passionate speech" that "mixed Spanish and Aymara, Mr. Morales did not veer from the populist themes that enthralled his followers and gave him a landslide win in the election on Dec. 18."

notes Morales "demanded the world community cancel the impoverished Andean country's $6.43 billion in foreign debt, saying, 'This money definitely never helped our indigenous people.'"

India Cultivating Closer Ties With US Congress. The New York Times (1/23, Sengupta, 1.19M) reports, "New Delhi, the Indian capital, has had a flurry of visitors from Capitol Hill lately, with the American Embassy here recording 10 Congressional delegations in 2005 alone. The reasons for the newfound interest in India are self-evident: its growing strategic importance for an American administration eager to check Chinese dominion over Asia, the lure of the Indian market for American companies, and the emergence of Indian-Americans as an increasingly engaged political bloc. For India, too, the stakes are important. Rarely, if ever, has the United States Congress been as important for New Delhi. It alone can grant a boon that India desperately wants: approval of a deal signed last July by President Bush and Prime Minister Manmohan Singh to share nuclear materials, including fuel and reactors, to help this energy-starved country."

Martin Attempts To Tie Harper To Bush. NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 7, 2:00, Williams) reported, "As voters prepare to go to vote in Canada, there is mud slinging between liberals and conservatives and there are also attack ads against the US. … Paul Martin is in danger of being thrown out of power, weakened by financial scandal and voter fatigue. So there were a series of attack ads trying to link" Conservative Party leader Stephen Harper "to one of the least popular figures in Canada, George Bush. The liberals are playing off wide spread antipathy George Bush, including Iraq." Prime Minister Martin was shown saying, "Let me tell you, Stephen Harper, we have our own values, and we don't have to borrow from the farthest right in the US conservative movement." NBC noted, "On the campaign trail, Harper has kept his distance from US policy, too."

USA Today (1/23, For, 2.31M) reports, "The weekend before the election…Martin accused…Harper of being too much like U.S. Republicans." Harper "dismissed Martin's criticism and struck a confident note as he campaigned."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/23, Dube, 61K) reports, "Canada's Conservatives have captured the momentum as the country nears its Jan. 23 election date, with polls showing a majority of Canadians would be happy to see the Liberal Party's 13-year winning streak come to an end."

The New York Times (1/23, Krauss, 1.19M) reports, "A change in Ottawa would almost certainly bring, at the least, a warming of relations with Washington, which have been strained since the American-led invasion of Iraq and have worsened over a series of recent trade disputes and Canadian moves to soften domestic drug laws. Mr. Harper, while careful not to appear overly supportive of President Bush, has suggested he would reconsider Canada's refusal to join the American missile defense program. He has also promised to increase military spending and make a bigger contribution to NATO and peacekeeping operations in places like Haiti and Afghanistan. But he also said recently that he had no intention of sending troops to Iraq."

In an op-ed for the New York Times (1/23, 1.19M) the National Post's Andrew Coyne writes, "Slowly, by stages, rather than suddenly and violently, the Western world's most enduring political dynasty is cracking up. The Liberal Party of Canada, it is often noted, held power for more years in the 20th century than the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. … Though decidedly from the (libertarian) right of the party, Mr. Harper has learned to temper his ambitions to reshape Canada's federal system and rein in its sprawling government."

Chavez May Face Domestic Backlash. U.S. News and World Report (1/30, Cue) reports that December's election in Venezuela "further consolidated power" for President, Hugo Chavez. But "even as he uses influence and money to push other Latin America nations leftward, political watchers say Chavez may face a serious domestic backlash." Venezuela "has become increasingly polarized in the seven years since Chavez was first elected president. … Since Chavez took office, the country has gone through a cascade of political tumult: the adoption of a new Constitution that many consider antidemocratic, a failed coup attempt, an unsuccessful recall referendum that large segments of society say was fixed, and a costly two-month oil-workers strike. For disaffected Venezuelans, their president is simply illegitimate."

Left-Wing Parties Said To Be On The March In Latin America. U.S. News and World Report (1/30, Pethokoukis) reports that in country after country in Latin America, "left-wing parties with more skeptical attitudes toward free markets have been on the march. … Why the leftward turn? Some blame rampant inequality." But "fiery political rhetoric may not translate into radical economics, says analyst Carol Graham of the Brookings Institution." Most Latin American leaders "are modeling themselves on Tony Blair -- not Fidel Castro. … 'Although there's been lots of talk about the return of the left, the way the economies are being managed suggests otherwise,' Graham says."

Israeli Foreign Minister Says Sharon Disengagement Plan Changed Israeli Politics. Newsweek (1/30, Weymouth) interviews Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni. Asked, "What was [Ariel] Sharon's most important political contribution," Livini said, "The disengagement plan changed totally the terms of the conflict and the political map in Israel. It changed some of the right-wing understanding and should change the international community's attitude toward Israel. Until then, Israel was blamed as a country that wants to control the lives of the Palestinians and will not dismantle any settlements. What we did changed the relationship between Israel and the Palestinians and the status of Israel within the international community." Asked why she decided to join Sharon's new party, Livini said, "I entered Israel's political life and joined Likud because I thought it should lead Israel in terms of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict... Then I understood that there is no chance to get the Likud to be a united party because most Likud leaders couldn't make clear statements about the need for Israel to support a two-state solution."

Japanese Public Said To Have Become More Accepting Of US Military Presence. The New York Times (1/23, Brooke, 1.19M) reports, "After a United States Navy sailor was confined on an American base near here [Tokyo], accused of the Jan. 3 beating death of a Japanese woman, 20 people held a protest at the base. … A decade ago, when three American servicemen were detained on an American base in Okinawa for the rape of a 12-year-old girl, 85,000 people marched one weekend, many demanding the expulsion of American bases from the island. The difference is only partly explained by the way the United States handled the two cases. In 1995, American officials were much slower to allow the Japanese to place an American in custody; this time the suspect was transferred as soon as a Japanese arrest warrant was issued. Another major factor is the change in Japanese attitudes toward the military alliance with the United States. In 1995, the cold war had only recently ended, and many Japanese expressed the belief that Japan no longer needed American troops. But the most recent case occurred days after Taro Aso, the foreign minister, warned that China was becoming 'a considerable threat.'"

Zoellick Says Banned Beef Shipment To Japan Was An "Unacceptable Mistake." Reuters (1/23) reports Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick "told Japanese Agriculture Minister Shoichi Nakagawa on Sunday that a beef shipment to Japan that resulted in a renewed ban on U.S. imports was an unacceptable mistake, according to a U.S. Embassy official. Japan, the biggest market for American beef, had just last month lifted a ban on imports imposed in 2003 after a U.S. case of the brain wasting mad cow disease. … The discovery on Friday of spinal material, believed to have a higher risk of causing a fatal human form of mad cow, in a shipment from the United States, prompted Japan to renew the ban. Tokyo had lifted the ban under strict conditions, including a stipulation that materials such as spinal cord tissue be removed."

New Liberian President Supports Stronger Ties To US. USA Today (1/23, For, 2.31M) reports, "Liberia's new president says she wants to rebuild close ties with the United States in the wake of a 14-year civil war that undermined the relationship. Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, sworn in Jan. 16 as Africa's first female head of state, said American help is essential to restoring vital services, such as running water and power. She warned that tens of thousands of former fighters could destabilize the country again if they don't get work or education."

Bird-Watching Pediatrician Among Turkey's Top Authorities On Avian Flu. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, A1, Shishkin, 2.11M) reports on Metehan Özen "one of Turkey's foremost birdwatchers" and a pediatrician who has monitored patients suspected of having bird flu. The Journal notes, "For years Dr. Özen's hospital job and his hobby existed in unconnected worlds. As Turkey grapples with the bird-flu outbreak here that has quickly infected at least 21 people and killed four, the doctor's two callings have put him in the middle of the quest to understand the virus and contain its spread. … In September, Dr. Özen warned colleagues at a medical congress that wild birds could bring avian flu to Turkey during the winter migratory season, and that is now an accepted theory."

Catholic Order's Influence In Latin America Noted. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, De Córdoba, 2.11M) reports on the Legion of Christ, "a fast-growing conservative Roman Catholic order. … Founded in 1941, the order concentrates on ministering to the wealthy and powerful in the belief that by evangelizing society's leaders, the beneficial impact on society is multiplied. Like the Jesuits who centuries ago whispered in the ear of Europe's princes, the Legion's priests today are the confessors and chaplains to some of the most powerful businessmen in Latin America."

Kim Jong Il Visit To China Regarded With Skepticism. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal's Melanie Kirkpatrick (1/23) writes, "North Korea's worst-kept secret was formally breached last week when Pyongyang confirmed, after the fact, that Kim Jong Il had paid an 'unofficial' visit to China. … Kim's travels took him to the thriving south of China, prompting speculation that he's finally, really, truly going to introduce substantive economic reforms to his nation, one of the poorest on the planet. Scholars and journalists rushed to interpret the visit as a sign that Kim is gearing up to follow China's path to prosperity through free markets. … Nowhere is that fantasy more indulged than in South Korea, where political leaders have been predicting since the '80s that the North's capitalist conversion is just around the corner." Kirkpatrick concludes, "Kim's recent trip to China isn't likely to result in economic transformation, or prosperity for his people. His authority depends on his ability to control the economy, keeping his people shackled to the state for food, shelter and work. That's the ugly bottom-line."

Bush Accused Of Failing To Promote Democracy In Russia. The Washington Post's Fred Hiatt (1/23) writes, "If promoting democracy is President Bush's largest ambition, then Russia is his largest failure. Not that President Vladimir Putin is the world's most repressive ruler -- far from it. … But no other nation has regressed from openness to authoritarianism during Bush's time in office as dramatically and decisively as Russia -- and with less apparent objection from Bush."

Rice Said To Lag Behind Foreign Policy Consensus. In his column for the Washington Post (1/23, 744K) Sebastian Mallaby writes that "the strange thing about Condoleezza Rice is that, when it comes to the stuff that a professor-politician should be really good at, she can be oddly flat-footed. … Rice gave two speeches last week calling for 'transformational diplomacy,' meaning diplomacy that will transform undemocratic societies: The internal affairs of other countries turn out to be important after all." Rice "has caught up with the 1990s consensus that powerful states may pose less of a problem than disintegrating weak ones and that the best hope for peace in the long term is a world of stable democracies."

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House To Launch "Political Campaign" To Defend NSA Wiretapping. USA Today (1/23, Jackson, 2.31M) reports, "The White House launches a political campaign this week, not for a candidate but for a controversial program: warrantless surveillance of some U.S. citizens by the National Security Agency." President Bush "plans to defend the program in a counterterrorism speech today at Kansas State University, aides said." The speech "will kick off a flurry of administration activity leading to Senate hearings scheduled for Feb. 6." White House spokesman Scott McClellan said, "We are stepping up our efforts to educate the American people about this vital tool in the war on terrorism." Bush and aides "plan to repeat arguments they have made before: This is a limited program that kicks in only when one of the parties is beyond US borders and has some kind of link to the al-Qaeda terrorist organization." Just before Bush's speech today in Manhattan, KS, "Gen. Michael Hayden plans to discuss the surveillance program at the National Press Club. Hayden, the principal deputy director of national intelligence, once headed the National Security Agency, which conducts the surveillance." Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "is scheduled to address the issue in a speech Tuesday, McClellan said. On Wednesday, the president plans to visit the NSA headquarters at Fort Meade in Maryland."

Under the headline "Delicate Dance For Bush In Depicting Spy Program As Asset," the New York Times (1/23, Nagourney, 1.19M) reports, "With a campaign of high-profile national security events set for the next three days, following Karl Rove's blistering speech to Republicans on Friday," the White House "has effectively declared that it views its controversial secret surveillance program not as a political liability but as an asset, a way to attack Democrats and re-establish…Bush's standing after a difficult year." The Times adds, "Whether the White House can succeed depends very much, members of both parties say, on its success in framing a complicated debate when the country is torn between its historic aversion to governmental intrusion and its recent fear of terrorist attacks at home." Polls "suggest that Americans are divided," but "as the White House and Democrats are well aware, the issue can draw very different reactions depending on how it is presented. These next few days could prove critical, as both Mr. Bush and Congressional Democrats move aggressively to define what is at stake."

Yesterday, lawmakers appeared on the political talk shows to comment on the controversy. Reuters (1/23, Kenen) says "Democrats and some Republicans have said the Bush administration's classified warrantless eavesdropping program is illegal," while the AP (1/23, Yen) also covers the lawmakers' comments, saying "several" of them "said Sunday they will press…Bush to justify his decision to allow domestic eavesdropping, rebuffing GOP suggestions their criticism of broad executive authority puts the nation at risk." The AP adds, "During the Sunday talk shows, lawmakers were responding to efforts by White House aide Karl Rove to make national security the top partisan issue in the November midterm elections." Rove "made the comments about the time that new audiotape warnings by Osama bin Laden were released, threatening an upcoming attack on the US."

Lawmakers "from both parties" called "for Congress to consider whether new restrictions were needed on government surveillance in suspected terrorism cases involving people in the United States," says the Los Angeles Times (1/23, Richter, 958K). Congress, adds the Times, "is deeply divided on whether the Bush administration acted illegally in carrying out warrantless eavesdropping on communications in hopes of detecting terrorist plots," but "several influential lawmakers said Congress should play a larger role in determining how the surveillance should be run." McClellan "issued a written response to lawmakers' comments on the talk shows. 'Senate Democrats continue to engage in misleading and outlandish charges about this vital tool that helps us do exactly what the 9/11 commission said we needed to do -- connect the dots,' McClellan said.

Asked on ABC's This Week (1/22, Stephanopoulos) to say whether he agreed with former Vice President Al Gore that the use of the NSA for domestic surveillance "may be an impeachable offense" which deserves to be investigated by a special counsel, Sen. John Kerry replied, "I agree that we ought to have a special counsel investigate. I agree that we ought to have an independent commission because this Congress has proven itself unwilling to do what's necessary to perform its responsibilities." The Washington Times (1/23, Hudson, 90K) reports Kerry also "called the National Security Agency's program to eavesdrop on terror suspects illegal, but he said he will continue to support its funding." Kerry "was asked by host George Stephanopoulos, 'If you think this is a clear violation of the law, why not move to cut off funding for the program?' 'That's premature,' Mr. Kerry responded.'

Rep. Jane Harman, also on ABC's This Week (1/22, Stephanopoulos), responded, saying, "I have been part of this so-called Gang of Eight since 2003, and, yes, I have been briefed. … I have raised objections to the Gang of Eight procedure in formal hearings of our committee and all over the place. I also asked a lot of questions in the meetings, the most recent of which was last Friday for two hours." Harman went on to say, "On the process: I think the administration is violating the National Security Act of 1947 by failing to brief the full intelligence committees. … On the program, I believe we should be fully briefed. We should decide…whether the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act is being violated in any way by this program."

Sen. Charles Schumer was asked on CNN's Late Edition (1/22, Blitzer) to respond to footage of Vice President Cheney saying, "These actions are within the president's authority and responsibility under the constitution and laws, and these actions are vital to our security" in reference to the NSA domestic surveillance program. Schumer said, "We do have to be strong in the war on terror, and…Democrats aren't going to take a back seat to anybody on that. But…we can be both strong and have the rule of law. And a large number of people, not just Democrats, Republicans like John McCain, Sam Brownback, Arlen Specter have said they have real doubts about whether what the president did conformed to the law."

Sen. John McCain, asked on Fox News Sunday (1/22, Wallace), if he agrees that President Bush "has the legal authority to engage in these warrant-less wiretaps," replied, "I don't think so, but why not come to Congress? We can sort this all out. … I think they will get that authority, whatever is reasonable and needed, and increased abilities to monitor communications are clearly in order."

Commenting on the NSA domestic surveillance program Chairman of the House Intelligence Committee Peter Hoekstra, on ABC's This Week (1/22, Stephanopoulos), said, "When the program began…congressional leaders were brought in -- the leadership of the House and the Senate, the leadership of the House and Senate intelligence committees…I've been briefed four times on this. … I've been given every opportunity to ask questions about the program, to ask questions about the legality of the program, to understand the scope of the program and how it works and, most importantly, the impact it has. … And we're having a discussion about whether we need to expand the number of members on the committee that are briefed into the program."

Pentagon's Domestic Spying Program May Have Violated Regulations. Newsweek (1/30, Isikoff) reports on the Pentagon's Counterintelligence Field Activity, noting that its role is "'force protection' -- tracking threats and terrorist plots against military installations and personnel inside the United States." According to Newsweek, there are now "questions about whether CIFA exceeded its authority and conducted unauthorized spying on innocent people and organizations. A Pentagon memo obtained by NEWSWEEK shows that the deputy Defense secretary now acknowledges that some TALON reports may have contained information on U.S. citizens and groups that never should have been retained. The number of reports with names of U.S. persons could be in the thousands, says a senior Pentagon official who asked not be named because of the sensitivity of the subject." Newsweek adds, "It isn't clear how many groups and individuals were snagged by CIFA's dragnet. … CIFA researchers apparently cast a wide net and had a number of surveillance methods…at their disposal." Pentagon officials "have broadly defended CIFA as a legitimate response to the domestic terror threat. But at the same time, they acknowledge that an internal Pentagon review has found that CIFA's database contained some information that may have violated regulations."

Technology Changes Face Of Eavesdropping. The AP (1/23, Fordahl) reports, "In the past, intercepting communications meant just that -- copying a telegram mid-route, steaming open an envelope or attaching alligator clips to the copper wires that connected every telephone in the world. … But the old ways of communicating are heading into the sunset like the Pony Express and being replaced by phone calls, instant messages, e-mail and more that are converted into digital data before they gallop across the Internet and other advanced networks." The AP continues, "This constant interchange of massive amounts of data, converging into speeding bitstreams on common pipes, is both a blessing and a curse for eavesdroppers. … It's easier than ever to access wholesale feeds of data. But such work is also more controversial than traditional wiretapping, as seen in objections to post-9/11 warrantless domestic surveillance and to regulatory moves to require networks to be tap-friendly." The AP adds, "Critics question whether safeguards put in place a quarter century ago following FBI wiretapping misconduct are strong enough to prevent abuse in the 21st century. Others fear the information superhighway is turning out to be a fast path to mass surveillance. … 'The thing that really should worry people is that once the capability is there, people will abuse it,' said Jennifer Granick, executive director of Stanford University's Center for Internet and Society. 'The opportunity for abuse is so much greater, because so much more of our private information is transmitted over the network.' … Always a hot topic, the debate over wiretapping is further fueled today not only by the knowledge of what's possible but also by a dearth of details of what's actually happening. … What makes the White House surveillance program…a cause of such concern is that it skirts existing laws and employs techniques resembling a wide-mouthed vacuum before the fine-toothed combs can be wielded."

More Commentary. The Washington Post (1/23, A14, 744K) editorializes, "Especially without knowing the parameters of the surveillance, we hesitate to second-guess the president's argument that FISA's limits are unduly constraining." The surveillance "may be critical for national security, and a law written in a different technological age may well need to be refurbished. But the proper way to handle that -- which the administration rejected -- would have been to seek changes in the law, not to do a stealthy end run around the legislative process. In such an amorphous, long-running conflict as the war against terrorism, it's critical to ensure that limits are in place to prevent the executive branch from overreaching."

Columnist bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (1/23, 1.19M), "Have you ever talked sexy to your wife or your girlfriend -- or your husband or your boyfriend -- on the telephone? Would you keep talking if you thought that one of Dick Cheney's operatives was listening in? Talk about a chilling effect. … Freedom of speech in the United States covers matters trivial and profound. The corrosive damage that is being done to the First Amendment, that cornerstone of free speech, has been largely overlooked in the controversy over…Bush's decision to permit the government to eavesdrop without warrants on phone calls and e-mail messages inside the United States."

Deported Muslims Back In US For Lawsuit Against Officials, Guards. The New York Times (1/23, Bernstein, 1.19M) reports, "Hundreds of noncitizens were swept up on visa violations in the weeks after 9/11, held for months in a much-criticized federal detention center in Brooklyn as 'persons of interest' to terror investigators, and then deported. This week, one of them is back in New York and another is due today - the first to return to the United States." They are "no longer the accused but the accusers, among six former detainees who are coming back to give depositions in their federal lawsuits against top government officials and detention guards, at a time when the constitutionality of part of the government's counterterrorism offensive is under new scrutiny." The Times adds, "As in the cases of all the Muslim immigrants rounded up in the New York area after the terror attacks, the six were never accused of a crime related to 9/11; officials eventually cleared all of them of links to terrorism. A report by the inspector general of the Justice Department found systemic problems with immigrant detentions and widespread abuse at the federal detention center where the six had been held; several guards have since been disciplined."

US Law Firms Offering Free Legal Advice To Guantanamo Detainees. U.S. News and World Report (1/30, Bedard) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that "some 57 American law firms are offering free legal advice to more than 150 'enemy combatants' held at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. A list provided to Whispers shows several prominent shops, many of which brag about their efforts on their websites. The pro bono service, organized by the Center for Constitutional Rights, is under the gun in conservative legal circles and some military offices that suggest it's bad form to help alleged terrorists while also working for clients involved in the war on terrorism like Boeing and General Dynamics."

Bin Laden Tape Seen As Effort To Exploit US War-Weariness. Newsweek (1/30, Hirsh, Hosenball, Yousafzai) reports on the audiotape released last week by Osama bin Laden, calling it "a cynical attempt to exploit American war-weariness, especially in Iraq." By offering a "a long-term truce on fair conditions," bin Laden "seemed to be trying to close the gap. All America had to do was withdraw from Arab lands." Newsweek also notes that some US officials "said they would not be terribly surprised if bin Laden were suing for peace. Other terrorism analysts suggested that, at a time when bin Laden's rival and sometime partner in Iraq, Abu Mussab al-Zarqawi, has offended many Muslims with his ruthless tactics, the Qaeda chieftain's main message was 'I'm still the main man.' Bin Laden may have been trying to appear reasonable and merciful to his own followers by playing the peacemaker."

Time (1/30, Ghosh) adds, "The U.S. believes the 10-minute taped message…was probably recorded sometime since November, partly because of a reference to British newspaper reports from that time about a purported proposal by President Bush to bomb al-Jazeera. The tape suggested that bin Laden is alive, if not quite well. A longtime bin Laden watcher, French terrorism expert Roland Jacquard, speculates that the decision not to release a videotape may reflect a desire to conceal the deterioration of his physical condition." Time also notes that bin Laden's resurfacing "has come at a time when the leadership of al-Qaeda appears to be under as much strain as at any time since the fall of the Taliban in 2001. Antiterrorism experts say the Saudi-born terrorist is no longer in active contact with field commanders, and his ability to plan and direct specific operations is hampered by his isolation."

US Believes Predator Attack In Pakistan Killed Senior Al Qaeda Members. Newsweek (1/30, Hirsh, Hosenball, Yousafzai) reports that the CIA and the Defense Department 'have stepped up missile strikes inside Pakistani tribal regions." Recently, a CIA-guided Predator drone "fired missiles at houses in the village of Damadola," killing at least 18 people. US officials "remained confident that the dead included some senior Qaeda members, and Pakistani authorities maintained that four to five Qaeda operatives were killed in the missile attack. … Civilians are another matter. The Predator killed several women and children, provoking demonstrations in the tribal region, many of them organized by the radical Pakistani Islamic alliance known as Muttehida Majlis Amal."

delegated by the White House to the CIA, according to current and former counterterrorism officials who did not want to be named because the matter is classified. If officials conducting surveillance believe there is a strong chance of civilians' being killed in an attack, operatives are expected to consult higher-ranking agency officials before firing. In the case of the Damadola attack, according to a knowledgeable source who spoke on condition of anonymity because the subject was sensitive, CIA officials made the decision to launch the attack themselves. But they notified higher-ups in the administration, including White House officials, who had enough time to veto the strike if they wanted."

Time (1/30, Ghosh) reports, "A Peshawar-based Pakistani intelligence official speaking on condition of anonymity says Washington has an understanding with Islamabad that allows the U.S. to strike within Pakistan's border regions -- providing the Americans have actionable intelligence and especially if the Pakistanis won't or can't take firm action. Pakistan's caveat is that it would formally protest such strikes to deflect domestic criticism. Some ranking Pakistani officials deny such an agreement exists."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Reports Critical Of CIA Withheld From Agency's Web Site. U.S. News and World Report (1/30, Kaplan) reports, "The CIA's Center for the Study of Intelligence is one of the agency's most open branches. … But since 2003, at least three unclassified CSI reports -- all critical of the agency -- have been withheld from the CIA's website, U.S. News has learned. During that same time, the agency has placed online three other CSI reports, all of those relatively positive or neutral. Among the documents withheld: a tough 69-page report, 'Curing Analytic Pathologies.' The study, published quietly in December, argues that reform efforts have centralized authority but failed to change the intelligence community's core problem -- 'dysfunctional behaviors and practices within the individual agencies.' A second report, 'Analytic Culture in the U.S. Intelligence Community,' was published last May and found the nation's intelligence analysts isolated and lacking overseas experience and training in research techniques. A third report, 'Intelligence for a New Era in American Foreign Policy,' from 2004, is the record of an unclassified conference of intelligence veterans, several of whom made comments sharply critical of the intelligence community." While the three reports are available by mail through the CIA's public-affairs office," the CIA "declined to say why the reports are not posted online nor would it provide a full list of the center's unclassified publications."

TSA May Check Passenger Financial Records. USA Today (1/23, Frank, 2.31M) reports the Registered Traveler program "may require passengers to agree to a check of their personal and financial records, the Transportation Security Administration said. The TSA said it will require 'in-depth security background checks' that may involve 'using commercial data' for people applying to the…program that starts in June. The checks will help verify people's identities to prove they have no ties to terrorism." However, "Business Travel Coalition Chairman Kevin Mitchell said the databases 'are notoriously inaccurate' and could mistakenly label someone a terrorist. 'It raises a huge liability issue,' said Mitchell, who supports Registered Traveler." Meanwhile, "Congress barred the TSA from using commercial data on airline passengers after a government probe criticized the agency last year for improperly storing 100 million records on travelers when it said no data storage would occur. The TSA says the ban does not apply to Registered Traveler because the program is voluntary and the background checks would be done by companies at an airport."

Private Airports Resist Proposal To Restrict Airspace Around DC Permanently. The Washington Times/AP (1/22, Manning) reports that "as the TSA and other federal agencies weigh whether to" permanently restrict zones of airspace around Washington, DC, a group of "private airport operators in the Washington region are pushing for changes in rules that they say unfairly punish harmless private pilots in an overzealous effort to protect Washington." The "three, 60-mile wide overlapping rings" of restricted airspace were "initially temporary, but the FAA is weighing whether to make it a permanent regulation and is taking public comment through Feb. 6. Most private pilots, who could face fines or suspension of their licenses for violating the air space, don't want the zones to stay. The FAA has received more than 20,000 comments on the proposal."

Chertoff's Coattails Extend To Highest Levels Of Administration. The Legal Times (1/23, McLure) reports, "After a rocky year, things are looking brighter for some protégés of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff." The Times continues, "On Jan. 4, President George W. Bush granted a recess appointment to Julie Myers, making the 36-year-old former Chertoff chief of staff the head of Homeland Security's 15,000-employee Immigration and Customs Enforcement. … Just a day earlier, Alice Fisher, Chertoff's former deputy at the Justice Department who now heads the DOJ's Criminal Division, had been on national television touting the guilty plea federal prosecutors had extracted from Jack Abramoff. … That guilty plea had been won by a team of career prosecutors supervised by Noel Hillman, the head of the DOJ's public integrity section who was first hired by Chertoff as a federal prosecutor during Chertoff's tenure as U.S. attorney in New Jersey." The Times adds, "On the surface it would seem that Myers, Fisher, and Hillman, among others, have basked in the reflected glory of Chertoff, who once enjoyed, by Washington standards, a stainless reputation as a straight-shooting, mob-busting, former prosecutor turned general in the war on terror. … But Hurricane Katrina dented Chertoff's armor, leading critics to call into question his leadership at the DHS. And criticism of the response to Katrina as well as terror policies promulgated under Chertoff during his time at Justice has also tarred his understudies — some of whom were forced to claim their positions through the back door of presidential recess appointments. … Their successes — and their travails — provide a window into how one lawyer's high-flying career in public service can both open doors for and complicate the lives of his loyal aides and assistants."

Residents Of Renewed Oklahoma City Generally Unfazed By Fortier Release. Under the headline "Oklahoma City Moves Past Its Infamous Bombing," The Christian Science Monitor (1/23, Axtman, 61K) reports that "as time goes on, wounds heal, memories fade, and hearts soften. At some point in the past decade, Oklahoma City began to look forward instead of back" at the 1995 bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah federal building. "That may be the reason why Michael Fortier's release from prison Friday after serving more than a decade for his role in the bombing sent relatively few ripples through the community. While it's painful to learn of his freedom, some say, their lives no longer revolve around the details of that April day. Their city, in many ways, has been freed from its own prison -- through prayer and urban renewal. … Officials say the bombing…galvanized residents and created a sense of pride about the city. That, in turn, fueled the urban progress."

Residents Returning To New Orleans Overwhelm Emergency Rooms. The New York Times (1/23, Barringer, 1.19M) reports New Orleans' emergency rooms "are facing their own emergency. As thousands of residents have begun returning in the weeks since New Year's, there are far more sick people than there are doctors, nurses, beds and equipment to take care of them." The Times notes, "only seven of what had been 15 adult acute-care facilities in the city and three surrounding parishes are open, and only one-third of the acute-care beds. Hundreds or perhaps thousands of doctors and nurses never returned to New Orleans after the flood; long-term and psychiatric hospitals, not to mention hospices and rehabilitation centers, are now almost nonexistent in and around the city." Meanwhile, "The thought of next month's Mardi Gras festivities has local doctors so worried they have formed a committee just to plan for care during the first large-scale, signature event in the distorted post-hurricane world."

Expert Likely To Investigate Whether Patients Were Euthanized In New Orleans. USA Today (1/23, Johnson, 2.31M) reports, "Louisiana authorities investigating whether patients were euthanized at New Orleans-area hospitals after Hurricane Katrina probably will appoint a new medical consultant because the Pennsylvania coroner assisting the inquiry was indicted on federal charges Friday. Kris Wartelle, spokeswoman for Louisiana Attorney General Charles Foti, said the indictment of coroner Cyril Wecht will not slow the state inquiry into more than 200 deaths at hospitals and nursing homes after Katrina hit Aug. 29." Meanwhile, "Wecht's work in Louisiana was not addressed in the indictment, which among other things accuses him of trading unclaimed bodies at the Allegheny County morgue to a local university's research program in exchange for laboratory space to expand his consulting business."

"Louisiana Speaks" Forums Held For Hurricane Refugees. The Washington Times (1/23, 90K) reports, "Hurricane refugees from Louisiana told federal and state officials at forums across the South yesterday that what they want most when their state is rebuilt is affordable housing, better schools and stronger levees. Some refugees at the 'Louisiana Speaks' forums also worried that officials have no real plans to restore certain areas, such as New Orleans' impoverished Lower 9th Ward." The forums are sponsored by the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Louisiana Recovery Authority. "Input…will be incorporated in a long-term regional plan for rebuilding South Louisiana after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita."

WAR NEWS:

Bush's Decision On Iraq War Called Return To US "Dominant Tradition." In its cover package, U.S. News and World Report (1/30, Barone) examines "the picture we have of the way America, and American presidents, go to war. It comports with what we think happened in World War I and, especially, in World War II. In this view of U.S. history, American presidents lead the nation only into wars that are forced upon them. There's only one problem. This picture is almost entirely contrary to the facts. Critics of George W. Bush like to say that Iraq was a war of choice -- a conflict that could have been avoided. But almost all American wars have been, to a greater or lesser degree, wars of choice. It is said that Bush went to war in Iraq without sufficient forces, without a game plan for the occupation, and without an exit strategy. Even if all those charges are true, then he has plenty of company in American history." Bush's decision to go to war in Iraq "a return to the dominant tradition of our history. The United States has never been an isolationist nation; Americans and American military forces have been roaming the globe since the Revolutionary War. Until the 20th century, the oceans seemed to protect the American homeland from attack, but not always."

Wartime Records Of Bush 43, 41 Compared. In a separate story in its cover package, U.S. News and World Report (1/30, Walsh) compares the wartime records of President Bush and his father, former President George H.W. Bush, noting that "there are more differences than similarities in their role as commander in chief. The 41st president was a coalition builder and a diplomat. The 43rd president was willing to go it alone and ignore international opprobrium. The first Bush had a sense of limits about American power. His son believes the military is his best tool for working his will abroad. The two men made the case for war in different fashion as well. It is true the father's job was easier than his son's. Saddam Hussein had invaded Kuwait and was an unmistakable threat. Nonetheless, George Herbert Walker Bush tried to build consensus at home and abroad before starting the Gulf War. George W. Bush made his case in a more controversial way, arguing for a pre-emptive strike to depose Saddam." US News adds, "It is striking that the son rarely cites his father as his role model as commander in chief. George W. Bush says the world has changed dramatically since his father's tenure, largely because of 9/11 and the threat posed by terrorists. The challenges he faces, he says, are unique." US News also notes, "The senior Bush felt equipped…to challenge both the military and his advisers. George W. Bush seems more accepting of the advice of his in-house 'experts.'"

Bush Has Gotten "Broad Pass" On Expansion Of Executive Power. A separate story in U.S. News and World Report's (1/30, Tolson) cover package considers "just how imperial" the American president can be. Disclosures about Bush's "support for a National Security Agency-run domestic-spying program have pushed those questions to the fore once again. … Bush, so far, has gotten a broad pass on his amplification of the commander in chief's prerogatives, which many Americans view as justified in the name of the war on terrorism. But there are growing signs of resistance."

Bill Clinton Says President Should Not Micromanage Military Operations. In another story in its cover package, U.S. News and World Report (1/30, Walsh) interviews former President Bill Clinton about his views "on what it takes to lead during times of conflict and at times of peace." On "directly supervising the military and the issue of 'micromanagement' during a crisis," Clinton said, "Generally, it is best not to micromanage military operations, though in some cases it is unavoidable. For example, after the accidental bombing of the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade because of outdated maps, I had daily meetings to go over the proposed targets for the next day. On a few occasions, I disagreed with the military's choices, but wherever possible I tried to set policy and let them decide how best to carry it out." On "how much he relied on his senior military advisers," Clinton said, "I relied heavily on my military advisers for tactical advice. On the question of whether to use force, I sought their advice but made the final decisions myself, sometimes disagreeing with them, as in Kosovo and Haiti."

Sunni Political Block Commits To Talks With Shiite, Kurdish Groups. Reuters (1/23) reports, "Iraq's biggest Sunni political bloc committed itself on Sunday to talks with Shi'ites and Kurds to form a government of national unity, but said its key demands, including changes to the constitution, must be met." The United States "wants the Kurds and majority Shi'ites, who dominated last month's elections, to form a government that includes minority Sunnis. It hopes an inclusive coalition will undermine the raging Sunni Arab insurgency." The Iraqi Accordance Front, "which comprises three mainly Islamist Sunni Arab groups," said "it would appeal against the results of an election it believes was rigged but would still take part in talks on a new coalition government."

The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Boudreaux, 958K) that "a leader of Iraq's largest Sunni Arab political bloc said Sunday that he would shun any government that included officials responsible for police brutality against his minority sect, a stand aimed at removing the powerful Shiite interior minister." Tariq Hashimi of the Iraqi Accordance Front "spelled out its conditions for entering a 'national unity' administration after most Iraqi leaders called for such an outcome in order to quell the Sunni Muslim-led insurgency." Hashimi "said his Sunni bloc's first condition for entering the government was a guarantee of personal security for Sunnis, who he said had suffered abuse by the transitional regime's Interior Ministry police." He "set other terms: He demanded an end to official corruption, a 'charter of honor' that renounces sectarian and ethnic strife, an agreement to set a timetable for withdrawal of US forces, and a promise 'not to hamper' constitutional changes demanded by Sunnis to prevent the Shiite and Kurdish regions from dominating Iraq's oil wealth."

USA Today (1/23, Jervis, 2.31M) adds that "Iraqi election officials announced Friday that the Shiite and Kurdish coalitions won a combined 181 of the 275 seats in parliament, three shy of the two-thirds majority needed to name a new government for the next four years." The two major Sunni blocs, the Iraqi Accordance Front and the Iraqi

Front for National Dialogue, "won a combined 55 seats." The Christian Science Monitor (1/23, Levinson, 61K) reports "it was no surprise that religious Shiites dominated the polls." But "the hard numbers have given new steam to Iraq's politicians, who are wheeling and dealing to find enough common ground on which to build the country's first freely elected four-year government." In a process that "could stretch into April, Iraq's factions will decide on a governing program, agree on whether the new Constitution can be changed, and haggle over the crucial positions of president, prime minister, and cabinet ministers."

Obama Calls US Presence "An Irritant" For Iraq. Commenting in his recent visit to Iraq on NBC's Meet the Press (1/22, Russert) Sen. Barack Obama said, "My position has been that it would not be responsible for us to unilaterally and precipitously draw troops down, regardless of the politics, because I think that all of us have a stake in seeing Iraq succeed." Obama added, "I have to emphasize that there is a cost for our presence there. We are an irritant. And we help spur the insurgency, even as we are defending a fledgling Iraqi government against that insurgency." Obama contended that the Sunnis "may feel that in fact the United States is the guy with the club standing behind the Shias and putting them in a position in which they have no power. … I think that what we want to do is we want to reach out to Sunni leadership that clearly has connections to the insurgency."

At Least 23 Iraqis Killed By Insurgents Over Weekend. The AP (1/23, Yacoub) reports, "Insurgents fired rocket-propelled grenades at a policeman's home northeast of Baghdad on Sunday, killing his four children and his brother and raising to at least 23 the number of Iraqis killed in attacks this weekend." Also Sunday, "police found the bullet-riddled bodies of nearly two dozen men abducted last week north of Baghdad after being rejected entry into a police academy, officials said."

Attacks Against Coalition Troops Increased 23% Last Year. USA Today (1/23, Jervis, 2.31M) reports, "The number of attacks against coalition troops, Iraqi security forces and civilians increased 29% last year, and insurgents are increasingly targeting Iraqis, the U.S. military says." Insurgents "launched 34,131 attacks last year, up from 26,496 the year before, according to U.S. military figures released Sunday."

Iraqi Professionals, US Contractors Leaving Iraq. The Washington Post (1/23, A1, Struck, 744K) reports "Iraq's top professionals -- doctors, lawyers, professors -- and businessmen have been targeted by shadowy political groups for kidnapping and ransom, as well as murder, some of them say. So many have fled the country that Iraq is in danger of losing the core of skilled people it needs most just as it is trying to build a newly independent society. … Professionals and businessmen with the means to escape are going to Jordan, Syria, Egypt or, if they have visas, to Western countries. Those left behind say they feel abandoned."

Meanwhile, the Washington Times (1/23, Behn, 90K) says "US private contractors, until now the biggest private-sector employers in Iraq, are preparing to leave as US money runs out and Iraqi ministries take charge of the reconstruction effort." The Times adds, "Most US-funded projects are scheduled to be completed by the end of this year, and it is unlikely that any significant new US funds will be forthcoming. Iraqi government ministries, which will be taking over responsibility for the reconstruction effort, tend to issue much smaller contracts that do not interest large US companies."

US Soldier Says Top Brass Directed Abu Ghraib Abuses. The Washington Post (1/23, A3, White, 744K) reports that Megan Ambuhl, "one of the original seven military police soldiers singled out by the Pentagon for their roles in abusive techniques" at Abu Ghraib, "is speaking out because she believes the truth has been obscured by high-ranking officials intent on covering up a policy of abuse. Though her defense differs little from the arguments made previously by the defendants' attorneys, Ambuhl's first-person description of the macabre world of Abu Ghraib provides a vivid perspective on how things went out of control at the prison outside of Baghdad." Ambuhl "has since married one of her fellow MPs -- Charles A. Graner Jr., the man the military has labeled the ringleader of the abusers -- and is on a mission to secure his release from prison." Ambuhl "says the military's top brass have dodged responsibility for what was going on at the prison by scapegoating her and other low-ranking soldiers. … Ambuhl says she and other MPs used aggressive techniques against detainees because that is what military intelligence soldiers and civilian interrogators told her to do."

US Hopes To Exploit Differences Among Iraqi Insurgent Factions. Time (1/30, McGirk) reports on the January 5 suicide in Ramadi, saying the blast was a "deadly miscalculation" by the group al Qaeda in Iraq. While the attack "killed two U.S. service members and more than 70 Iraqi police recruits," most of the victims "were local Sunnis, and they were joining the police force under the protection of tribal chieftains who, with the U.S. military's approval, are trying to impose order over their violent swath of Iraq." Time adds, "After the Jan. 5 blast, according to insurgents, tribal chiefs in Ramadi notified al-Qaeda that they were withdrawing protection in the city for the group's fighters. The jihadis responded by gunning down several prominent Sunni clerics and tribal leaders. Now al-Qaeda fighters who once swaggered through Ramadi are marked men." US officials in Iraq have tried to exploit the differences among the insurgent factions for months. There are "signs that at least in some parts of Iraq, the tension is boiling over. Iraqi security sources with contacts in the insurgency told TIME that fighting has erupted in several cities that have long been bastions of the resistance, including Fallujah, Samarra, Latifiya and Mahmoudiya. … Some Pentagon decision makers believe that the feuding within the insurgency may help U.S. and Iraqi troops quell the terrorist attacks that have made parts of the country ungovernable."

Iraqi Oil Production Declined For Third Straight Month In December. Newsweek (1/30, Johnson, Hastings) provides a negative view of Iraq's oil production, noting that across Iraq, there is "a major attack on oil facilities about once every three days. December was the third month in a row that Iraqi oil production went down, and it marked the lowest level of exports since the invasion. At a time when global supplies are stretched to their limits, the Iraqi oil bust helps keep world prices near record highs. But most of all, it's a disaster for efforts to get the country back on its feet." Iraqi oil "still isn't flowing at prewar levels." Newsweek adds that there is "certainly no question that the Bush administration, heavily peopled with veterans of the oil industry, focused on the importance of petroleum to Iraq's economy. Even as the rest of Baghdad was opened up to looters in April 2003, the Ministry of Oil was secured by U.S. troops. But no force was put in place to protect the pumps and pipes."

Army Interrogator Convicted Of Negligent Homicide Of Iraqi Detainee. The Washington Post (1/23, A2, White, 744K) reports, "Iraqi general into a sleeping bag during questioning in northern Iraq in 2003 was convicted of negligent homicide and negligent dereliction of duty late Saturday after a military jury in Colorado decided the general's death was not murder." Chief Warrant Officer Lewis E. Welshofer Jr. "was on trial for allegedly killing Iraqi Maj. Gen. Abed Hamed Mowhoush, a high-ranking Saddam Hussein loyalist who was believed to have been fueling the Iraqi insurgency in the Qaim area near the Syrian border." Mowhoush "died while bound in the Army sleeping bag, which was part of an aggressive interrogation tactic aimed at getting the general to talk." The Los Angeles Times (1/22, Riccardi, 958K) and New York Times (1/23, Schmitt, 1.19M) also report the story.

Halliburton Accused Of Exposing US Troops, Civilians To Polluted Water In Iraq. The Washington Post/AP (1/23, A2, Margasak) reports, "Troops and civilians at a US military base in Iraq were exposed to contaminated water last year, and employees for the responsible contractor, Halliburton Co., could not get their company to inform camp residents, according to interviews and internal company documents." Halliburton, "the company formerly headed by Vice President Cheney, disputes the allegations about water problems at Camp Junction City, in Ramadi, even though they were made by its own employees and documented in company e-mails." Sen. Byron Dorgan "is to chair an inquiry session into alleged neglect of water pollution at a U.S. base camp in Iraq."

Confusion Surrounds Question Of Who Will Preside Over Saddam Trial. The New York Times (1/23, Worth, 1.19M) reports, "Two days before the trial of Saddam Hussein is set to resume after a month's recess, confusion surrounds the tribunal that is trying him, with the identity of the judge who will preside in court still uncertain." The judge "who has become the trial's most public face, Rizgar Muhammad Amin, submitted a letter of resignation this month, saying he was fed up with criticism by high-ranking Iraqi officials who wanted him to be tougher with Mr. Hussein. A colleague on the five-judge panel, Said al-Hammash, is prepared to replace Judge Amin if he does not return Tuesday." But "in recent days President Jalal Talabani and other Iraqi leaders, apparently eager to dispel the widespread impression that Judge Amin was forced off the case through political pressure, have urged him to stay on." The tribunal "has not accepted Judge Amin's resignation. An American official who is close to the tribunal said Sunday that he did not know which judge would be presiding." Amin's "potential successor is facing troubles of his own. Last week, a senior Iraqi official petitioned the court to bar Judge Hammash from presiding at the trial, saying the judge was a former member of Mr. Hussein's Baath Party."

At FBI's Request, CBS Withheld Some Details About Iraqi Bomb Makers. The Washington Post (1/23, C1, Kurtz, 744K) reports in its "Media Notes" column, "In reporting last week that the FBI was making progress in identifying the origins of homemade bombs used against Americans in Iraq, CBS News agreed to withhold some details at the bureau's request. Rome Hartman, executive producer of the 'CBS Evening News,' says CBS News President Sean McManus and correspondent Jim Stewart spoke with FBI officials who 'made the case that putting in certain details might in their view jeopardize American lives. They felt very strongly about it.' During a 'very spirited' internal debate, Hartman says, the FBI's case 'felt to me, and to Sean and Jim in the end, to be a pretty persuasive argument. You ought to err on the side of discretion and caution.' Stewart's report mentioned that CBS was withholding part of the story."

No Word On Fate Of Kidnapped American Journalist. NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 5, 1:30, Williams) reported, "In Iraq today, still no update about kidnapped American journalist Jill Carroll. It's been two days since the deadline set by her captors, who threatened to kill her unless the US freed all Iraqi women prisoners."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/23, 61K) reports a delegation from the Council on American-Islamic Relations "arrived in Baghdad Saturday, adding its voice to what is described as an unprecedented outpouring of Muslim support for the release of American reporter Jill Carroll. 'The kidnapping of Jill Carroll does not benefit the kidnappers,' said Nihad Awad, executive director of the Washington-based group that represents US mosques and Islamic associations." At press time Sunday, David Cook, the Monitor's Washington bureau chief, "said that there has been no new information about Ms. Carroll."

The New York Times (1/23, Tavernise, 1.19M) runs a story headlined "Abduction Of US Reporter Underscores Risks In Iraq," a theme also covered in Peter Johnson's column in USA Today (1/23, 2.31M), titled "In Iraq, Specter Of Kidnapping Keeps Journalists On Edge."

In 1998, Pelosi Said Saddam Was Developing WMD. In its "History Lessons" column, the Washington Times (1/23, 90K) excerpts comments by Rep. Nancy Pelosi on December 16, 1998. Pelosi said, "As a member of the House Intelligence Committee, I am keenly aware that the proliferation of chemical and biological weapons is an issue of grave importance to all nations. Saddam Hussein has been engaged in the development of weapons of mass destruction technology which is a threat to countries in the region and he has made a mockery of the weapons inspection process. The responsibility of the United States in this conflict is to eliminate weapons of mass destruction, to minimize the danger to our troops and to diminish the suffering of the Iraqi people."

Pentagon Says Meeting Of Military Commanders Was "Uninhibited Exchange Of Ideas." The Washington Times (1/23, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "Pentagon officials say this month's closed-door conference of the military's top field commanders was gratifying, describing it as an uninhibited exchange of ideas rather than a fixed-agenda meeting monopolized by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. Officials said Mr. Rumsfeld, four-star generals and admirals, and top civilians brainstormed over two main topics: how to fight the war on Islamic terrorists and how to reconfigure the military for future threats." The conference "was composed of the most powerful military men in the world. Besides Mr. Rumsfeld, there were the nine combatant commanders from Europe, the Middle East, Asia and other commands; the four service chiefs; the Joint Chiefs chairman and vice chairman; defense undersecretaries and assistant secretaries; and the services' civilian secretaries."

Reagan Administration Official Criticizes "Disunity Of Command" In Iraq. Bing West, an assistant secretary of defense in the Reagan Administration, writes in the New York Times (1/23, 1.19M), "The lesson the Pentagon should learn from Iraq is to avoid another L. Paul Bremer. This is less a reflection on Mr. Bremer, who accurately described himself as 'the American viceroy' in Iraq and 'the president's man,' than on the position he and the American military commanders in Iraq were placed in by the White House's failure to put one person in charge." West adds that the "disunity of command reached its tragic apex in the spring of 2004, during what Mr. Bremer calls 'the most critical crisis of the occupation.' When four American contractors were killed and their bodies mutilated in Falluja on March 31, Mr. Bremer joined with Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and Gen. John Abizaid, the commander of American forces, in ordering the fractious city seized. Five days later, however, Mr. Bremer changed his mind after Sunni members of the Iraqi Governing Council threatened to quit in protest. He prevailed on General Abizaid to order the Marine battalions that were advancing through Falluja to halt. Mr. Bremer acknowledged that this 'temporary cessation of offensive action' would be 'rough on the military.' Secretary Rumsfeld, for his part, disagreed with the halt and urged General Abizaid to finish the attack. But as the military prepared to end things quickly, Mr. Bremer changed his mind about the 'temporary' cessation. He told President Bush that the assault would 'collapse the entire political process'; the president sided with his viceroy and told General Abizaid 'to let the political situation there develop.' Develop it did. The insurgents' morale soared and their defenses toughened." West concludes, "The singular lesson in war is to put either the civilian viceroy or (better) the general in charge, but not both."

Krugman Says Bush Has Given Up Trying To Win In Iraq. Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (1/23, 1.19M), "In the State of the Union address, President Bush will surely assert, to choreographed applause, that he has a strategy for victory in Iraq. I don't believe him. In fact, I believe that three years into the conflict his administration refuses to admit defeat but has given up even trying to win." Krugman adds, "Power shortages are a crucial issue for ordinary Iraqis, and for the credibility of their government. … Lack of electricity isn't just an inconvenience. It prevents businesses from operating, destroys jobs and generates a sense of demoralization and rage that feeds the insurgency. So why is power scarcer than ever, almost three years after Saddam's fall? Sabotage by insurgents is one factor. But as an analysis of Iraq's electricity shortage in The Los Angeles Times last month showed, the blackouts are also the result of some incredible missteps by U.S. officials. … In short, U.S. officials thoroughly botched their handling of Iraq's electricity sector. They did much the same in the oil sector. But the Bush administration is determined to achieve victory in Iraq, so it must have a plan to rectify its errors, right? Um, no. Although there has been no formal declaration, all indications are that the Bush administration…doesn't plan to ask for any more money for Iraqi reconstruction." The Bush Administration "doesn't have a plan; it's entirely focused on short-term political gain. Mr. Bush is just getting by from sound bite to sound bite, while Iraq and America sink ever deeper into the quagmire."

Pakistani Prime Minister Condemns US Airstrike. The AP (1/23, A2) reports, "Pakistan's prime minister yesterday condemned an American airstrike on a remote Pakistani village, saying such attacks should be cleared with Islamabad first." Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz "said no understanding exists between US and Pakistani officials that allows American military forces to attack alleged terrorists in Pakistan without first consulting the government." Said Aziz, "The understanding is that we will work. … We will work in collaboration with each other."

Incidents On Afghan-Pakistan Border Highlight "Precarious" Anti-Terror Alliance. The Washington Post (1/23, A1, Witte, Khan, 744K) reports from Kabul, "Events along the ever-volatile Afghanistan-Pakistan border this month have exposed deep fault lines in the anti-terrorism alliance among the United States, Afghanistan and Pakistan, and officials on all sides say their joint efforts against militants in the region are now highly precarious." The "heightened tension comes as militant extremists and the United States have both become more aggressive in their tactics, with the Pakistani government caught in between." The Post adds recent incidents "have revealed just how tenuous relations among the countries have become." The Post adds, "Afghan government officials are feeling especially vulnerable now because the United States announced late last year that it would reduce its troop strength from 19,000 to 16,500. NATO soldiers are supposed to fill the gap by taking over some operations in the south, but the Netherlands, seen as pivotal to that transition, has wavered over whether it will send troops." Meanwhile, "the Taliban, al Qaeda and other groups that are trying to destabilize the nascent Afghan government appear to be taking advantage of the uncertainty."

Kerry Says Administration Misled Public On Tora Bora. On ABC's This Week (1/22, Stephanopoulos) Sen. John Kerry was shown a clip of Vice President Cheney saying, "The fact of the matter is, we have not been attacked in more than four years. That is not an accident, it's not just dumb luck." Asked if he agreed with the Vice President's assessment Kerry replied, "No. … The simple fact is that we had Osama bin Laden cornered, trapped, ready to be captured or killed in the mountains of Tora Bora. And this administration -- it is a fact -- has misled Americans about the knowledge they had of whether or not he was there, number one, and, number two, did not do everything that they could have in order to capture him. I know this. Others know this." Kerry went on to say, "So, yes, we have not been attacked here. Many people surmise that one of the reasons we haven't been attacked here is because they are being so successful at doing what they need to do to attack us in Iraq and elsewhere."

McCain Calls Lack Of Attack Since 9/11 "Indicator Of Some Success." Asked if he considered the failure to apprehend Osama bin Laden "a failure in the president's war on terror," Sen. John McCain, on Fox News Sunday (1/22, Wallace), said, "No. I don't think it's good that we haven't gotten him. … But look, the fact that there has not been an attack on the United States in four years is an indicator of some success. … So let's give the President and this Administration some credit for that."

Scheffer Affirms NATO Commitment To Afghanistan. NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer writes in the Financial Times (1/23), "As NATO prepares to expand the operations of its International Security Assistance Force in Afghanistan to the country's more volatile south, where violence is intensifying, debate is under way about the role the alliance will play. … The debate surrounding this mission comes as no surprise. After all, NATO's operation in Afghanistan has been, from the start, a fundamentally new step for the alliance. It is also the most ambitious mission in NATO's history, in terms of the strategic distance from our home countries, in terms of the complexity of the challenges we face in Afghanistan and in terms of the multiple roles the alliance must take on." Scheffer adds, "No one should doubt NATO's resolve to carry out this mission. All 26 allies realise that fighting terrorism, and helping the Afghan people and their government, is a collective effort – not a matter of picking and choosing where one might wish to chip in. We have already been delivering for quite some time, with 10,000 troops in the country. In coming months, we will expand southwards, as an alliance united in our determination to help the Afghan people build the stability and peace they deserve."

2.11M), "As times have changed, so has the North Atlantic Alliance. That is particularly evident in the way NATO has moved to protect our citizens from terrorism. … The most dramatic illustration of NATO's new priorities is our support for the democratically elected government of Afghanistan. More than 9,000 troops and military advisers are currently deployed throughout multiple Afghan provinces in the form of Provincial Reconstruction Teams (PRTs). These troops from 25 NATO members and 11 partner nations are there to provide both security and support to local authorities and people, and are doing such things as digging wells, building schools and refurbishing mosques. In a similar vein, NATO is facilitating, together with several international organizations, the rehabilitation of Kabul International Airport, and has made significant investments in airports in Herat and Mazar-e-Sharif." Billingslea adds, "When NATO's 26 armaments chiefs meet in Brussels this spring, they will sit down to review NATO's counterterrorism technology efforts. My hope is that they will come armed with ideas on how to press ahead in the fight against terrorism. Our first challenge will be to review all the operations to see where additional support to NATO troops is urgently needed. Certainly we need to expand, intensify and better fund the ongoing technological program of work. But perhaps more importantly, we need to create a NATO-Technical Support Working Group on a trans-Atlantic scale."

Professor Says Bin Laden Tape Confirms He Is Isolated, Weak. Jonathan Stevenson, a professor of national security affairs at the US Naval War College, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/23, 2.11M) that last week's missive from Osama bin Laden "confirmed several things that we knew or at least suspected: that he is isolated, besieged and physically weak. … In the recent tape, he asks the U.S. itself to stand down in Iraq and Afghanistan in exchange for a 'long truce.' As with the Madrid tape, bin Laden has made an offer that he knows will be refused." Stevenson adds, "Most likely bin Laden's hope is that his wider audience -- especially potential recruits -- will read U.S. beleaguerment as proof of al Qaeda's might. In suggesting that he himself maintains a significant degree of command over far-flung assets, he wants the world to believe that he and al Qaeda possess concentrated power that has not substantially diminished since 9/11. … The overarching significance of bin Laden's counterfactual assertion of authority, however, is how little it matters." Even if bin Laden "wanted to work toward coexistence, he wouldn't be able to deliver his end of the bargain precisely because he no longer enjoys close operational control over most of those he inspires. His word could be countermanded by Zarqawi, by a Moroccan in Spain, or by a British Pakistani. Quite simply, bin Laden's ideology and résumé have become bigger than the man himself."

USA Today Says Bin Laden Sought To Enhance Leadership Stature With New Tape. An editorial in USA Today (1/23, 2.31M) says the bin Laden tape "raised an interesting, and increasingly perplexing, question: What power, exactly, does the terrorist leader, who is likely living much as a cornered animal, have? To non-Muslim ears, bin Laden's message was clumsy and easy to dismiss. … But to Muslim ears…the same words sound very different. Bin Laden spoke in terms steeped in Islamic tradition. The truce that he offered, for example, recalls great past leaders, including the prophet Mohammed, who offered one in his battle with the Quraysh tribe that he eventually defeated. Bin Laden's aim was to give himself the stature of a leader -- specifically the leader who can realize the Muslim dream of establishing a caliphate, or worldwide Muslim superstate." USA adds, "Bin Laden's message offered nothing useful for Americans. Its value lies only in reminding us that Muslims are reacting to our messages in much the same way."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Judge To Review Former Gemstar-TV Guide Official's Plea Deal. The National Law Journal (1/23, Bronstad) reports, "The former chief executive of Gemstar-TV Guide International Inc. may face jail time if a federal judge in Los Angeles rejects his plea agreement this week." The Journal continues, "Henry Yuen, who was ousted in 2002 after Gemstar lost almost $3 billion in market capitalization due to accounting restatements, pleaded guilty in October to destroying computer files during a separate investigation by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. As part of the deal, he agreed to pay a $250,000 fine and to donate $1 million to charity while serving two years' probation and six months of home detention." The Journal adds, "Prosecutors and Yuen's lawyers have said the sentence fits his crime of obstruction of justice, reiterating that he has not been charged with securities fraud. … But lawyers for Gemstar and the SEC have expressed concern about the plea agreement, with Gemstar lawyers calling it a 'travesty of justice.' … The company also said it spent $100 million in legal fees and lawsuit settlements because of Yuen." The Journal notes, "U.S. District Judge John Walter is expected to reject the agreement when he issues a final ruling on Yuen's sentence today. In December, Walter issued a tentative ruling criticizing the sentence, saying that it 'sends the wrong message to corporate America,' and is 'wholly inappropriate,' according to court transcripts."

Lay, Skilling Lawyers Press For Trial To Be Moved. The USA Today (1/23, Farrell) reports, "With jury selection in the trial of former Enron chiefs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling scheduled to begin in Houston next Monday, their lawyers are insisting that the trial be moved out of state" because the attorneys "don't think Lay and Skilling can find an open-minded jury in Houston, whose residents bore the financial brunt of the highflying energy company's implosion four years ago." USA Today says that "Of 280 potential jurors who were surveyed last year, 80% said they had a negative bias toward Lay, Skilling or both." According to the article, "U.S. District Judge Sim Lake rejected the defense's motion several weeks ago. After a third defendant, former Enron accounting chief Rick Causey, agreed to plead guilty in late December, the defense team renewed its request." The defense team, "noted the 80% negative response among potential jurors was before Causey changed his plea. The 'media maelstrom' afterward about how Causey's plea could hurt Skilling and Lay only reinforced a presumption of guilt, defense lawyers argued." According to the article, "some jury experts agree with another defense motion asking that lawyers be able to question potential jurors without other juror candidates and spectators present." Judge Lake "is expected to rule this week on the defense motion to allow voir dire to be individualized," the article said.

Livedoor CEO Denies Allegations In His Blog. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Morse) reports, "Takafumi Horie, the CEO of Internet-portal company Livedoor Co.," denied that he misled investors "on his Web log after a television program yesterday morning in Japan examined the widening allegations surrounding his company." The Journal quotes, Horie, "'The extent of the fabrications [in the program] is such that it is difficult to deny them one by one … 'I don't know who or how these stories were researched.'" The Journal noted that Tokyo prosecutors raided Livedor's offices Jan. 16 "as part of a probe of possible securities-law violations." The Journal further reports, "Yesterday's comments by Mr. Horie come amid growing speculation he will be questioned by prosecutors, who called the company's chief financial officer, Ryoji Miyauchi, and several other Livedoor executives to their offices Friday." According to the article, "Since prosecutors raided Livedoor, the company's share price has dropped by more than 50% to 336 yen ($2.92), taking many other Japanese stocks with it."

US Chamber Asks Congress To Soften Auditing Rule. The Washington Post (1/23, A7, Day, 744K) reports, "The U.S. Chamber of Commerce is asking the federal government to soften a rule adopted after financial scandals that accounting firms failed to expose at Enron Corp., WorldCom Inc., Freddie Mac and other major U.S. companies." The Chamber "wants the Securities and Exchange Commission to allow accounting firms to perform audits for any company within a year of having provided consulting or other services for that company. The current rule bars a company from hiring as its auditor any accounting firm that has performed other services for it within five years." The Chamber "makes its request in a policy paper it will release publicly today and circulated to some people last week. It is the group's latest effort to weaken some provisions of Sarbanes-Oxley, which it says has added burdensome and costly business regulations."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Google Stakes Reputation On Dispute With DOJ. USA Today (1/23, Hopkins) reports, "Google, facing its biggest public relations battle yet, has more at stake than competitors as it fights a federal government demand for data on how millions of users search the Internet." USA continues, "As the No. 1 online search company, Google has the highest profile, and a brand built on a "don't be evil" motto that it must defend as it expands further into search-related ventures. … 'That is their motto and their ambition, and they need to be true to that,' says Denise Garcia, an analyst who follows Google at W.R. Hambrecht." USA adds, "Google's stance will likely burnish its image as a search engine industry leader that can be trusted to guard its users' data, Garcia says. … But in the short run, investors are worried. Friday, stock in the company plummeted 8.5%, or $36.98 a share, to $399.46, a day after published reports of its refusal to bow to a Justice Department subpoena. It was Google's biggest daily percentage decline since it went public in August 2004. … Garcia said the subpoena fight was the biggest factor in the stock's decline. It also was driven by a weak revenue forecast earlier in the week by competitor Yahoo. That spooked investors anti-cipating Google's fourth-quarter results, due out Jan. 31."

Trial Of Former Atlanta Mayor Begins Today. The New York Times (1/23, Dao) reports, "He was, once, the go-go mayor of the South's most go-go city. Suave and acid-tongued, Bill Campbell was the protégé of a new black politics, steeped in the argot of civil rights yet able to smooth-talk corporate executives. Democrats from President Clinton on down courted him. … But those days are long gone. On Monday, Mr. Campbell, who left office in 2002, is to enter a federal court house here to defend himself against charges that he turned City Hall into a criminal enterprise during his eight years in office." The Times continues, "Mr. Campbell's trial will be the culmination of an investigation that dates back to at least 1999 and that has already led to convictions against 10 people on an array of charges that include bribery, tax fraud and perjury. Three of the people convicted worked in Mr. Campbell's administration. … The seven-count indictment alleges a wide-ranging conspiracy directed by Mr.

Campbell and his associates to shake down companies trying to do business with the city. The indictment charges Mr. Campbell, 52, took payoffs totaling more than $150,000; accepted more than $100,000 in illegal campaign contributions; filed false personal income tax returns; and received gifts from contractors, including a $12,000 trip to Paris and nearly $10,000 worth of heating and air-conditioning equipment for his home. … But Mr. Campbell's lawyers assert that the case is built on shoddy evidence and unreliable witnesses who traded lenient punishment for their testimony."

Former DOJ Lawyer Says There Was No Cover Up In Cisneros Case. Former Justice Department attorney Robert Litt writes in the Washington Post (1/23, A15, 744K), "An independent counsel has issued a report claiming that officials of the Clinton administration blocked his investigation into allegations of tax violations by former housing secretary Henry Cisneros. Although these sensational charges have been trumpeted by partisans as evidence of Democratic corruption, they are completely false. … The independent counsel, David Barrett, was appointed to investigate charges that Cisneros had lied about payments he made to his mistress. … In 1997 Barrett came to the Justice Department, where I was serving in the Criminal Division, and asked permission to expand his case to investigate whether Cisneros had evaded income taxes over four years. … Nonpartisan career lawyers in the department's Criminal Division and in the Tax Division studied the independent counsel's application in great detail over several weeks. They met with his office, reviewed documents and interviewed witnesses. Each of them concluded that, with the exception of a single year's tax return, there were no reasonable grounds to investigate Cisneros for tax violations. These career lawyers found that the independent counsel's submission was full of legal and factual errors. … The conclusions of the career lawyers were reviewed in detail by other officials including myself, up to the attorney general. Every single lawyer in the Justice Department who reviewed this matter concurred in the analysis. … Sadly, this independent counsel seemed unable to recognize that different lawyers could reach different conclusions in good faith. Instead, he decided that everyone who disagreed with him could only be corrupt. He did not let the complete absence of evidence to support that fantasy deter him from smearing nonpolitical government lawyers, who have devoted their careers to serving the public, without hearing their side of the story. That's the real scandal."

Chicago City Clerk Not Resigning Despite Corruption Charges. The Chicago Tribune (1/21) reports, "Rebutting suggestions by the media and City Hall insiders that he would resign amid corruption charges, City Clerk James Laski said Friday he 'will continue to serve and represent the citizens of Chicago.' A federal investigation into his dealings 'are not connected to the operations of this office,' Laski said in a written statement. 'Employees of this office will continue to effectively serve the needs of the citizens of Chicago.' Meanwhile, U.S. Magistrate Judge Sidney Schenkier freed Laski from the requirement to wear an electronic monitoring device that had been ordered a week ago after the clerk was charged with bribery and obstruction of justice." The AP (1/21) adds Laski said in the statement "that reports that he has been absent from work recently have been exaggerated and unfair. … Laski says other than a few absences due to illness and two weeks of vacation he has taken to spend time with his family December for the past eleven years, he has been at work."

FBI Investigating Possible Contract Fraud By Veteran Connecticut City Official. The Connecticut Post (1/22, Cummings) reports a veteran Bridgeport employee "is under investigation for allegedly accepting kickbacks -- sometimes in the form of cash-filled envelopes passed openly at City Hall -- in exchange for awarding contracts. The FBI is probing the activities of Chris Kovachi, a 20-year city employee and specialist in the city's Housing Department, three separate sources confirmed. … Kovachi denied any wrongdoing when asked about the allegations," but "a former city employee, who asked not to be identified, told FBI agents about witnessing" contractor Wayne Jones "giving Kovachi an envelope filled with cash. City records show Jones was paid more than $717,000 over the last five years for various jobs." The Post adds, "Two sources within city government also confirmed the FBI is investigating Kovachi. … The sources stressed that the FBI is not investigating the entire housing office, and said the city is cooperating with the probe."

FBI Investigating Philadelphia Schools Contract. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/22, Dilanian) reports, "Philadelphia schools chief Paul Vallas came to town three years ago promising to clean up the district's 'dysfunctional' workers' compensation system, which costs taxpayers tens of millions a year. But his pledge soon foundered on the shoals of the city's political culture. For reasons that Vallas has declined to publicly explain, the district hired a workers' compensation consultant with no government experience but with two important patrons: Democratic City Councilman Rick Mariano and Republican State House Speaker John Perzel. After Mariano personally introduced Danlin Management to Vallas, the newly formed company won a no-bid contract in 2003 to advise the district on ways to cut costs by reducing worker injuries and curbing fraud. The district's top financial officer at the time had concerns about Danlin but felt pressured by Vallas to hire the Center City firm, according to newly released records of the FBI's investigation into the matter."

FBI, IRS Investigating Possible Improper Political Activity By Fumo-Linked Nonprofit. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/22, Cattabiani, Shiffman, McCoy) reports, "A South Philadelphia nonprofit with ties to State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo secretly financed a lawsuit to oust a powerful political opponent from the state Senate, sources said. The FBI is asking why the nonprofit -- created to clean streets and revitalize businesses in Fumo's district -- financed an unsuccessful 2001 lawsuit against the head of the state Senate, Republican Robert C. Jubelirer of Altoona, according to people familiar with the investigation." The Inquirer notes, "The nonprofit, Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, didn't pay for the lawsuit against Jubelirer directly, according to people familiar with the transaction. Instead, the nonprofit sent about $17,000 to Howard Cain, a longtime close political adviser to Fumo. Cain's political consulting firm then cut a $17,000 check for the suit, the sources said." The Inquirer adds, "For two years, the FBI, IRS agents and prosecutors have been aggressively scrutinizing a series of nonprofits connected to Fumo, looking at how Fumo raised money for them and how they spent it."

Houston Emerging As Major Center Of MS-13 Activity. The Austin American-Statesman (1/22, Ward) reports MS-13 is "a burgeoning criminal enterprise that has spread into 33 states and the District of Columbia, leaving a bloody trail of vicious crimes in its wake amid persistent reports that al Qaeda might be trying to use its smuggling network to sneak terrorists into the United States. … Its epicenter of recent growth has been neighborhoods of Central American immigrants in Houston, where federal investigators say the gang's membership and crimes have mushroomed. It is now facing a multiagency crackdown aimed at curbing its influence and violence. Los Angeles 'is still the place where you go to make your bones with MS-13, but Houston has emerged as a very large problem area,' FBI Special Supervisory Agent Stephen Kodak said in Washington. … 'It's like the old-time Mafia: They prey on their own, offering protection and then extorting money from other illegals who aren't likely to report the crimes,' Kodak said. 'It's definitely a growing problem.'" The American-Statesman notes, "'Law enforcement in 28 states have reported MS-13 members are engaged in retail drug trafficking, primarily trafficking in powdered cocaine, crack cocaine and marijuana, and, to a lesser extent, in methamphetamine and heroin,' Chris Swecker, assistant director of the FBI's criminal investigations division, testified before a U.S. House subcommittee in April 2005. 'The drug proceeds are then laundered through seemingly legitimate businesses.'"

Al Qaeda-MS-13 Alliance Seen As Unlikely. In a separate story, The Austin American-Statesman (1/22, Ward) reports, "Could al Qaeda terrorist operatives be teaming up with the MS-13 gang? No, federal investigators say. There is little, if any, evidence of such a link, and it is highly unlikely that the radical Muslim organization would align itself with a predominately Catholic gang, they say."

Five Indicted On Katrina-Related Fraud Charges. The Baton Rouge Advocate (1/21, Roberts) reports, "A Georgia man allegedly on his way to getting $125,000 in unemployment benefits for 49 imaginary people and four Baton Rouge residents who may have lied to get thousands in disaster relief are facing federal prison time." Drewey Pierre Whitaker, Ivory Profit, De'Ondra Profit, Monique C. Preston and Billy R. James were indicted by the federal grand jury. "The indictments — made public Friday — bring to 26 the total number of people who have been charged in Baton Rouge federal court with fraud in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. Nationwide, more than 180 people have been arrested, said Baton Rouge U.S. Attorney David Dugas, who oversees the national Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force. Whittaker faces five counts of wire fraud, each of which carries up to 30 years in prison, and 11 counts of illegal use of Social Security numbers, each of which carries up to five years in prison."

Former NOPD Officer Charged With Katrina-Related Theft. The Baton Rouge Advocate (1/21, Gyan) reports, "A federal grand jury accused a former New Orleans police officer Friday of driving across state lines with a new pickup truck looted from a Cadillac dealership during Hurricane Katrina. Willie Earl Bickham Jr. is charged with interstate transportation of a stolen motor vehicle: a black 2005 Chevrolet Silverado. Houston police arrested Bickham in November driving the stolen truck. Police said he admitted taking the vehicle." The Advocate adds, "U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said Friday that federal prosecutors and the FBI are keeping their ears 'close to the track' for incidents such as Bickham's that might arise and require federal attention." The AP (1/21) also reports on the charges.

Siemens Executives Indicted Over Alleged Sham Minority Partnership. The AP (1/21, Robinson) reports, "A Pennsylvania-based subsidiary of German electronics company Siemens AG and two of its executives have been indicted on charges of forming a sham partnership with a minority-owned company to land a $49 million county contract, prosecutors announced Friday. The minority-owned company and its owner were also charged. Both were previously indicted in the investigation. … A spokesman for

Siemens Corp., the parent company for its U.S. operations, says it broke no laws and will fight the charges." The AP notes, 'Robert D. Grant, special agent in charge of the Chicago office of the FBI, said the government is 'determined to ensure that public contracts, especially those in the lucrative health care industry, are obtained based on merit and are not tainted by corruption.'"

The Chicago Tribune (1/20, Ciokajlo, Becker) reported on its Web site, "The charges were announced today in a superceding indictment that also added new charges against minority contractor Faust Villazan and his former company, Faustech Industries." Villazan "and Faustech originally were indicted in September for allegedly passing a $20,000 bribe to a Cook County employee to influence the award of the radiology contract during the construction of the new Stroger Hospital. … In the superceding indictment handed up late Thursday afternoon, prosecutors alleged the joint venture was a sham and did not comply with county contracting rules because Villazan received a flat fee of $500,000 and did not share in the profit or loss of the deal." The Tribune adds that Grant "said Villazan entered into the Siemens deal 'for the sole purpose of personal greed,' saying, in effect, 'I'm a minority business enterprise, and I'm for sale.'" However, in the version of the story which ran in Saturday's Chicago Tribune, the paper did not include Grant's statement.

The Chicago Sun-Times (1/21, Pallasch, Newbart) reports, "GE -- which lost to Siemens in the bidding -- sued the county and Siemens in federal court, alleging fraud in the bidding process. Siemens officials…lied in court and said there had been no fraud, officials said." US Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald "and Grant credited GE's civil lawsuit filed four years ago with starting the process of exposing the alleged fraud. 'If not for the light shed on this scheme by a competitor, this fraud might not have been uncovered,' Grant said.

New Orleans Man Sentenced To Prison For Credit Card Fraud. The AP (1/21) reports, "A New Orleans man has been sentenced to four years in prison and ordered to pay $35,000 in restitution after a jury found him guilty of stealing the credit card numbers of people and using them to buy merchandise that he would resell. The US Attorney's Office says Jerome McNeil and an accomplice recruited some cashiers at Kenner's Esplanade Mall and a restaurant to use a credit card skimmer to record customers credit card numbers. … US Attorney Jim Letten said the pair was so brazen that they even began to distribute business cards on the street."

Cities Report Shortage Of Police Recruits. The Christian Science Monitor (1/23, Axtman, 61K) says a "major shortage of police recruits" has "reached crisis proportions in some cities." The problem "has several sources: low pay, a big hole left by retiring baby boomers, and an image problem that steers the few young people who are interested in law-enforcement careers toward crime-scene investigation and forensics, rather than everyday street patrols." The Monitor adds, "To remedy the manpower shortage, some law-enforcement agencies are getting creative. They are giving new recruits help with down payments on homes and, for experienced officers in other locales, they are offering signing bonuses for switching to a new city. They're even encouraging their own officers to find new recruits in exchange for extra vacation time."

CIVIL LAW:

Federal Government May Take Hard Line On Contractors' Conflicts. The Washington Post (1/23, D4, Babcock, 744K) reports defense contractor Alion Science and Technology Corp. "faced the imminent loss of one of its largest contracts, a $275 million deal helping manage the Pentagon's military communications network. The government had just announced that Advanced Engineering & Sciences of Reston, a division of contracting giant ITT Industries Inc., would take over the work." But Alion is now "back in contention for the job. In a case that could signal a more aggressive federal approach toward potential conflicts of interest in contracting, Alion convinced government reviewers that a division of ITT should not be allowed to manage a program that potentially would be evaluating products made by the defense conglomerate -- or at least not without much more analysis then the Pentagon initially performed." This month, the Government Accountability Office "agreed, indicating that it was going to begin looking more closely at 'organizational conflicts of interest' -- the potential for a company to end up in a situation in which it is essentially evaluating itself or its competitors -- and would make sure contracting agencies begin paying more attention as well."

WSJournal Sees Evidence Of Fraud In Diagnosis Of Asbestos Ailments. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, 2.11M) editorializes, "Of all the unsavory details rolling out of investigations into the silicosis and asbestos scams, some of the ugliest concern doctors who abandoned their ethics to cash in. Even more disturbing is the growing evidence that what has allowed them to get away with this is a federal certification program. That's why a coalition of industry and other groups has began pushing the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health (Niosh) to start policing its 'B-reader' program, which certifies doctors to read X-rays. The federal agency proposed new ethics rules in November, after a federal judge slammed several government-certified doctors who had ginned up sham diagnoses in a silicosis suit. But Niosh needs to go much further to clean up this corrupt corner of American medicine."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Former Officials Say Bush Administration Has Politicized DOJ Voting Section. The Washington Post (1/23, Eggen, 744K) reports in a front page story that the Justice Department's voting section, "a small and usually obscure unit that enforces the Voting Rights Act and other federal election laws, has been thrust into the center of a growing debate over recent departures and controversial decisions in the Civil Rights Division as a whole." Many current and former lawyers "in the section charge that senior officials have exerted undue political influence in many of the sensitive voting-rights cases the unit handles. Most of the department's major voting-related actions over the past five years have been beneficial to the GOP, they say, including two in Georgia, one in Mississippi and a Texas redistricting plan orchestrated by Rep. Tom DeLay (R) in 2003." The section "also has lost about a third of its three dozen lawyers over the past nine months. Those who remain have been barred from offering recommendations in major voting-rights cases and have little input in the section's decisions on hiring and policy." Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales "and his aides dispute such criticism and defend the department's actions in voting cases."

Demonstrators Mark 33rd Anniversary Of Roe V. Wade. Thousands of anti-abortion demonstrators gathered outside Minnesota's Capitol Sunday to mark the 33rd anniversary of the Roe v. Wade ruling. The AP (1/23, Lohn) reports that the Minnesota event was one of several nationwide yesterday. In San Francisco, "thousands of abortion opponents shouldering signs with slogans such as 'Peace Begins in the Womb' marched Saturday, while abortion rights supporters along the march route waved clothes hangers and shouted 'Bigots go home.' … In Idaho, nearly 400 abortion protesters marched at the Statehouse Saturday." The AP adds, "The largest abortion demonstration was expected Monday in Washington, D.C., where anti-abortion activists planned to converge on the mall to hear speakers supporting their cause and march on the Congress and Supreme Court."

Pro-Life Groups Optimistic About Movement's Future. The Washington Times (1/23, Price, 90K) reports, "As tens of thousands of abortion foes prepare for today's 33rd annual March for Life, they are buoyed by developments they see as promising for their cause, both at the state and federal levels. … Pro-life advocates are excited about broad abortion bans proposed by lawmakers in two states, Ohio and Indiana. It's their hope that these bills become law and that the statutes are eventually considered and upheld by a more conservative U.S. Supreme Court in a challenge to the Jan. 22, 1973, ruling in Roe v. Wade that abortion was a constitutional right." The Times notes that pro-life advocates "make it clear they are optimistic the Supreme Court will be more favorable to abortion restrictions, with the addition of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and this week's expected confirmation of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr."

Roe Seen As Likely To Be Overturned If GOP President Is Elected In 2008. The Wall Street Journal's James Taranto (1/23) writes, "The Supreme Court is not racing the clock to resolve the abortion question. Most likely, sometime in the next decade the court will either overturn or reaffirm Roe. If President Bush gets to replace another pro-Roe justice or two, or a Republican is elected president in 2008, Roe will probably be history. Otherwise, it will be with us for another generation. In either case, politics will determine the outcome of what should have been a political matter all along."

Terms Of Abortion Debate Said To Have Caught Up With Public Attitudes. Time (1/30, Tumulty) reports, "Listening just to the alarms of abortion-rights groups on the one hand and the cheers of opponents on the other, you could come away with the impression that the fate of" Samuel Alito's nomination to the Supreme Court "will determine whether abortion remains available in this country. That is not what is at stake. Alito's confirmation would not produce the votes sufficient to overturn the Supreme Court's landmark Roe v. Wade decision guaranteeing abortion rights throughout the country. … Today the tussle is over not whether abortion will exist but how. In that respect, the terms of the debate have caught up with the public's attitude toward the issue: polls consistently show that most people in the U.S. want abortion to be legal; they just don't want it to be easy." Time adds, "Pollsters say that Americans' views on abortion have shifted relatively little since Roe v. Wade, that they have always been complicated and that sometimes they are even contradictory. In a survey by the Pew Research Center last July, for instance, 65% of those polled said they oppose the idea of overturning Roe v. Wade, but nearly an identical percentage said they would like to see more legal restrictions. Among the most popular: mandatory waiting periods, parental- and spousal-notification requirements and a ban on all late-term abortions."

White House To Push Pentagon On Prayers Specifically Referencing Jesus Christ. An evangelical Christian chaplain's group says the White House will pressure the Pentagon to be more explicit in saying military chaplains can pray in the name of Jesus Christ. The Washington Times (1/23, Duin, 90K) reports, "The administration struck a deal on Thursday with Rep. Walter B. Jones, North Carolina Republican, said the Rev. Billy Baugham of the Greenville, S.C.-based International Conference of Evangelical Chaplain Endorsers. … Claude Allen, White House domestic policy adviser, promised the congressman that President Bush will take up the issue personally with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, said Mr. Baugham, who was involved in the discussion. … Mr. Jones' office, which confirmed that the conversation had taken place, says chaplains should be able to pray to whomever 'their faith tradition' demands, including named gods, saints or prophets."

ANTITRUST:

Albertson's Closes Deal for Sale To Consortium. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Adamy, Berman) reports, "A consortium of retailers and financial buyers could announce a deal to acquire Albertson's Inc. for roughly $9.6 billion as early as today, say people familiar with the matter, offering an end to a tumultuous sale process. The Albertson's board was expected to meet last night to approve the deal, people familiar with the process said. As happened in December, it is possible the deal could collapse at the final moment. The deal could give grocery-store chain Supervalu Inc., which would acquire most of Albertson's stores, a challenge in freshening up hundreds of supermarkets. Meanwhile, drugstore operator CVS Corp., which would acquire Albertson's free-standing pharmacies, would pull closer to rival Walgreen Co., the nation's largest drugstore chain by revenue." According to the Journal, final terms were not known, but "they are expected to roughly mirror the ones that the board turned down in December," except that "Albertson's buyers would assume any antitrust risk involving Chicago-area stores, a sticking point that helped unwind a previous deal, said the people familiar with the matter." According to the Journal, "The buyout consortium is planning to pay about $26 per Albertson's share, said the people familiar with the matter. Based on the terms for the December deal, that would entail offering 0.182 of a share of Supervalu stock plus $20.25 in cash, or $26.05 in total, based on Friday's closing price. … Albertson's shares closed up 24 cents at $24.11, rising 1%, in 4 p.m. composite trading Friday on the New York Stock Exchange. Supervalu on Friday fell 34 cents, or 1%, to $31.85 on the NYSE."

The New York Times (1/23, Sorkin) reports, "While people involved in the negotiations were hopeful that this deal would be completed, they also cautioned that it remained possible that the talks could drag on or collapse altogether again if an unforeseen issue arises the way it did in December." Since that deal fell through, the Times reports, "the board of Albertsons has been under increased scrutiny from analysts and investors who have questioned why the December deal was abandoned at the last minute. Albertsons shares fell more than 10 percent after the company announced it had terminated talks." In the wake of the December breakdown, analysts were critical, and some shareholders called "for the resignation of Albertsons' chief executive, Larry R. Johnston, a former General Electric executive who was brought in to revive the business. The company's independent directors issued a statement pledging their support for him." IN this deal, "the buying group plans to break Albertsons into three parts by splitting the supermarket business in two and merging the drugstore business with CVS. Supervalu supermarkets is expected to acquire Albertsons' most attractive stores, like its Jewel stores in the Chicago area. Cerberus Capital and Kimco Realty plan to buy its underperforming businesses and either sell them and their real estate or try to institute a turnaround plan, depending on the store." The Times also notes, "The possible sale of Albertsons, based in Boise, Idaho, comes as traditional grocers are being squeezed by larger discount competitors like Costco and Wal-Mart Stores," and, "on the other end of the spectrum, … upscale rivals like Whole Foods and Trader Joe's."

Toshiba Beats Out GE To Buy Westinghouse. The Financial Times (1/23) reports, "Toshiba, the Japanese engineering company, has won the battle for control of Westinghouse, the US power plant arm of British Nuclear Fuels, with a bid of almost $5bn, more than double original expectations." Toshiba's competition included "General Electric of the US and Mitsubishi Heavy Industries of Japan." According to the article, "The group's bid of close to $5bn was not only the highest offer but BNFL decided it would also be the best for Westinghouse's future growth prospects and its workers, said a person close to BNFL." The board of directors "would make a final decision at a board meeting on Thursday," the paper reported. The Financial Times also notes political opposition to "a non-US group gaining control of Pittsburgh-based Westinghouse. Last month Ralph Hall, Republican chairman of the House of Representatives' energy subcommittee, wrote to the US Treasury arguing that Westinghouse's "sensitive technology" should not be controlled by a foreign company." Also, the article notes, "A person close to the deal said Toshiba was favoured because BNFL believed it was most likely to allow senior Westinghouse management to run the business on its own." But "GE was seen as having a more aggressive corporate culture than Toshiba, which could have harmed Westinghouse's chance of winning a Chinese nuclear reactor contract, it said. "

Nuclear Energy In Favor With Governments. The New York Times (1/23, Mouawad, Sorkin) reports some of the same facts, but also notes developments in the nuclear-power industry. The Times says, "Nuclear energy is gaining support with governments around the world amid high oil and natural gas prices, tight petroleum supplies and growing demand for electricity. Technology by Westinghouse is found in half the world's operating commercial nuclear power plants, according to the company's Web site." While nuclear opponents cite Three Mile Island, Chernobyl, and the problems of disposing of waste fuel, "nuclear energy never lost the favor of governments who view it as a reliable source of energy," the article says. The Times also says, "Energy companies are seeking licenses around the country to build new power plants, notably in Alabama and Mississippi. The Bush administration, which is also encouraging the development of nuclear energy as a way to reduce dependence on foreign energy sources, is seeking to streamline the application process and permits needed to build new plants."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Second Fatal West Virginia Accident Spurs Calls For Mine Safety Improvements. NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 4, 1:30, Williams) reported, "There are more questions about the mine fire that killed two miners" in West Virginia "and the demands for new safety regulations." NBC (Costello) added the fire "broke out Thursday afternoon on a conveyor belt two miles inside the Alma mine. They were using that same way to draw in fresh air. The government had banned that. But companies said digging fresh-air tunnels was expensive. So the Bush Administration allowed it." The Bush Administration "says it will look at getting better equipment and whether those oxygen tanks every miner wears should last longer than one hour. Congress will hear conditions coal miners work. The mine involved in the fire is owned by one of the country's biggest coal producers, the Massey Company."

US Ranks 28th In World On Key Environmental Standards. A nation-by-nation study of environmental performance shows that just six nations have achieved 85 percent or better success in meeting critical environmental goals including clean drinking water, low ozone levels, sustainable fisheries and low greenhouse gas emissions. The New York Times (1/23, Barringer, 1.19M) reports, "The study, jointly produced by Yale and Columbia Universities, ranked the United States 28th over all, behind most of Western Europe, Japan, Taiwan, Malaysia, Costa Rica and Chile, but ahead of Russia and South Korea. … The pilot study, called the 2006 Environmental Performance Index, has been reviewed by specialists both in the United States and internationally."

Senators Disagree On Fishing Quotas. The Washington Times (1/22, Price, 90K) reports, "A Senate spat over relaxed fishing quotas could snag the renewal of the 1976 Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act. Reauthorization of Senate Bill 2012, which governs offshore ocean fisheries, is expected by late spring, but differences remain over whether it should permit relaxed enforcement of annual catch limits for each fishery or impose strict limits. … The version of the bill approved by the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee on Dec. 15 had an amendment to soften annual fishing quotas, as a result of pressure by New England fishermen and the members of Congress who represent them. … Congressional observers say it is ironic that the difference of opinion regarding catch limits has made Massachusetts Democrats such as Sens. Edward M. Kennedy and John Kerry and Rep. Barney Frank, normally viewed as environmental champions, to favor looser controls on fishing. Meanwhile, Sen. Ted Stevens, Alaska Republican and Commerce Committee chairman, who favors oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, is seen as a lawmaker dedicated to conservation of declining fish stocks and protection of their habitats with the bill."

Allen Foods Offers To Burn Chicken Manure, Producing Power And Reducing Waste. The Washington Post (1/23, B1, Morse) reports that Allen Family Foods "last week presented plans to the Dorchester County Council to burn chicken manure in Linkwood on Maryland's Eastern Shore. The resulting steam would help run an Allen Family Foods factory that processes leftover chicken parts" and help reduce the waste generated by chicken farms in Maryland. According to the article, "In Maryland, some leading conservationists back the project. If more manure is burned, they say, less will end up on farms and potentially in runoff." The Post says, "Chicken executives have been talking up manure burning for more than two decades. But it is technologically challenging, and no one has made it work commercially in the United States, according to industry executives and engineers." Additionally, Allen Family Foods has no assurance of regulatory approval; according to the article, the "Maryland Department of the Environment plans to question Allen Family Foods about odors and emissions. Allen said it won't start construction until it gets an operating permit from the department." The idea, the Post says, "goes back to at least 1983, when the Delmarva Power company experimented with the fuel at a power plant in Delaware, Delmarva Power spokesman Matt Likovich said. The utility later studied retrofitting another plant, in Maryland, estimating it would cost $50 million. Neither project got off the ground."

Royalty Payments For Use Of Public Land Have Not Kept Pace With Market Prices. The New York Times (1/23, Andrews, 1.19M) reports, "At a time when energy prices and industry profits are soaring, the federal government collected little more money last year than it did five years ago from the companies that extracted more than $60 billion in oil and gas from publicly owned lands and coastal waters. If royalty payments in fiscal 2005 for natural gas had risen in step with market prices, the government would have received about $700 million more than it actually did, a three-month investigation by The New York Times has found. But an often byzantine set of federal regulations, largely shaped and fiercely defended by the energy industry itself, allowed companies producing natural gas to provide the Interior Department with much lower sale prices - the crucial determinant for calculating government royalties - than they reported to their shareholders. As a result, the nation's taxpayers, collectively, the biggest owner of American oil and gas reserves, have missed much of the recent energy bonanza.'

WPost Urges Administration To Fund Ocean Research. The Washington Post (1/23, 744K) editorializes, "The Bush administration remains in denial about climate change and sometimes treats environmental protection as an inconvenience. Yet there was reason to hope, when the U.S. Commission on Ocean Policy issued its report more than a year ago, that President Bush would seize the issue of the dire threat to this country's coastal waters. … So far, it is an opportunity Mr. Bush has largely passed up. To be sure, there have been some constructive changes. Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) is pushing legislation to improve fisheries management." According to the Times, "a big test will come when the administration has to propose funding for oceans research in its coming budget."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

States Report Flood Of Potent Mexican Crystal Meth. The New York Times (1/23, Zernike, 1.19M) reports, "In the seven months since Iowa passed a law restricting the sale of cold medicines used to make methamphetamine, seizures of homemade methamphetamine laboratories have dropped to just 20 a month from 120. … But…officials in other states with similar restrictions" are "now worried about a new problem: the drop in home-cooked methamphetamine has been met by a new flood of crystal methamphetamine coming largely from Mexico. Sometimes called ice, crystal methamphetamine is far purer, and therefore even more highly addictive, than powdered home-cooked methamphetamine, a change that health officials say has led to greater risk of overdose." According to the Times, "although child welfare officials say they are removing fewer children from homes where parents are cooking the drug, the number of children being removed from homes where parents are using it has more than made up the difference."

DEA Investigation Uncovers Suspected Cocaine Trafficking Ring. The Madison (IN) Courier (1/23) reports, "More light is being shed on the Drug Enforcement Administration drug raid last week in the Courier area. Aaron Payne, a special deputy for the DEA, testified at a detention hearing Friday in Indianapolis. Payne was one of the lead investigators for the government during the yearlong investigation that lead to the arrests of 14 Courier-area residents on federal charges. Results of the investigation uncovered a Mexico-to-Chicago cocaine trafficking ring that then came through Madison. The indictment indicates that both John Scruggs and Randy Thomas were the ringleaders of the organization. They acquired cocaine from their sources in Chicago and then distributed it to 12 mid-level dealers in the Courier area, according to the federal indictment. During the investigation, Payne obtained court-ordered wiretaps on four telephone lines. The wiretaps began in November to accompany aerial surveillance already under way in the investigation."

Virginia "Pain Doctor" Loses License. The Roanoke (VA) Times (1/21) reports, "Roanoke pain doctor Cecil Knox was stripped of his right to practice medicine and sentenced to five years of probation Friday, marking the end of what has been called both a legitimate prosecution and an unnecessary persecution. The conclusion came as a relief to many in the packed federal courtroom, but outside, both camps still expressed regrets -- that loved ones who died were not around to see the day, and that chronic pain patients no longer have a physician they can trust. … Knox was first indicted in February 2002, along with his practice, his former office manager, Beverly Boone, and two employees. His charges included prescribing controlled substances such as the painkiller OxyContin outside the scope of legitimate medical practice, and the government said Knox's irresponsible behavior led to injury or death to patients. At one point, he faced more than 300 charges. … As part of the plea agreement, Knox voluntarily surrendered his medical license to the state of Virginia and his registration number for prescribing medicine to the Drug Enforcement Administration."

Lawsuit Settled In Texas In DEA-Involved Shooting. The San Antonio (TX) Express (1/23) reports that on Jan. 3, relatives of Ashley Villarreal gathered at San Fernando Cemetery and "observed what would have been her 17th birthday. The ceremony was half a celebration and half a call for justice over the controversial shooting by federal agents that put her in her grave when she was 14. But four days before the civil case was to head to trial, U.S. District Judge Fred Biery ruled Thursday that the government would be allowed to put on evidence that could have hurt the plaintiffs' case. Hours later, the wrongful-death suit was settled for $200,000 — far less than the $35 million listed in the plaintiffs' original demand letters to the government. Under the settlement, released Friday, the government denied any liability in the shooting that occurred during a stakeout for Ashley's father. The government argued that the agents fired at a Mitsubishi Eclipse driven by Ashley the night of Feb. 9, 2003, because they feared the car was going to hit one of them. 'This tragedy weighs heavily on all of those involved: the family, the special agents involved and the entire community,' said Joe Arabit, head of the Drug Enforcement Administration in San Antonio. 'The DEA is hopeful that the community can now move forward beyond this incident.'"

Canada Clears Way For Medical Marijuana Advocate To Be Deported To US. The Los Angeles Times (1/21, Bailey) reports, "A judge in Canada on Friday rejected an eleventh-hour appeal by a California medical marijuana refugee trying to avoid deportation to the United States, five years after fleeing to avoid a short jail stint he called a death sentence. Steve Kubby, a former Laguna Beach resident who was a 1998 Libertarian candidate for governor and one of the authors of California's watershed medical marijuana law, suffers from a rare form of adrenal cancer that can cause blood-pressure spikes that his doctors say are controlled by smoking cannabis. Canadian Federal Justice Yvon Pinard ruled that Immigration Canada may now proceed with its order to return Kubby to the U.S. — along with his wife, Michele, and two young children."

US Drug Agents Said To Be Hitting Drug Cartels In The Pocketbook. The Dallas Morning News (1/20, Mclemore) reports, "In the last three years, customs agents have seized more than $20 million in currency at the eight ports of entry from Brownsville to Del Rio – roughly one-fifth of the value of the bulk cash seizures the agency made nationally. While U.S. drug agents have long concentrated their efforts on stopping drugs at the border, they're increasingly going after the money, hitting the drug cartels in the pocketbook and providing invaluable intelligence of the trafficking networks. And with stricter controls on bank accounts and wire transfers, trafficking organizations are running piles of cash into Mexico, in cars, trucks, boats, and airplanes and even strapped to the bodies of couriers, federal officials said." The Morning News adds, DEA Administrator Karen Tandy, during a Senate hearing on narcotics control last March, called tracking the money the key to controlling the $65 billion a year trade in illegal drugs. 'To make a significant impact on the drug trade in America and around the world, there is no strategy more effective than following the money back to the sources of drug supply and taking away the dirty proceeds of that trade,' she said. 'But our efforts to date clearly have not successfully done the job.' Total seizures – which include all assets and can be in the form of cash, houses, guns and vehicles – amounted to well short of $1 billion, Ms. Tandy said. 'Drug traffickers pay more than that each year in fees to launder their ill-gotten gains,' she said. Officials said there is no established formula to determine what percentage of cash gets across the border successfully."

US, Venezuela Expected To Sign Anti-Drugs Agreement. The BBC (1/21) reports, "Venezuela and the US appear ready to sign a new agreement to fight international drug trafficking. … For the past five months all official relations between Venezuelan and US anti-narcotics agents have been frozen. But after tough negotiations between Venezuelan and US diplomats a new contract is now on the table. This accord will re-establish a basic working relationship in the fight against drugs. Luis Correa, the chief of Venezuela's anti-narcotics police unit, says the new agreement with Washington will be signed…once all the paperwork has been finalized."

IMMIGRATION:

Scholar Released From China Faces Deportation From US. The AP (1/23, Barakat) reports, "Nearly five years ago, the U.S. government exerted high-profile diplomatic pressure on China to secure the return of scholar Gao Zhan, a researcher at American University whom Beijing believed was a spy for Taiwan. … Now the Department of Homeland Security is pushing with equal vigor to have her deported back to China, despite objections from the Department of Justice and a federal judge. A hearing is scheduled Monday in immigration court to determine whether Gao poses a risk to national security, as DHS contends." The AP continues, "Gao's case became international news in February 2001 when the American University researcher and her family were arrested by the Chinese on suspicion of espionage. Her husband, Xue Donghua, and the couple's 5-year-old son were released after a month in custody. … But the Communist government charged Gao with espionage." The AP adds, "The State Department protested and worked hard to secure her release. Sen. George Allen, R-Va., was one of many elected officials who took up her cause and introduced legislation, which ultimately failed, to grant her U.S. citizenship in absentia. … The Chinese government put Gao on trial in July 2001, convicted her and sentenced her to prison. But they decided to deport her to the United States rather than imprison her, and Gao received a hero's welcome when she returned to the U.S. a month later. … Then in 2003 came shocking news: Gao had pleaded guilty to illegally exporting more than $1 million in military-grade computer microprocessors to a Chinese government agency. Court documents indicate that the scheme had preceded her 2001 arrest and that Gao knew the microprocessors could be used by the Chinese military. … She struck a plea bargain that resulted in a seven-month jail sentence, plus eight months in a halfway house. Her jail time was severely reduced because prosecutors believed Gao had cooperated with their investigation and provided useful information to the United States. … As part of the plea bargain, the Justice Department recommended to the Department of Homeland Security against deporting Gao after she served her sentence. … Normally such recommendations carry great weight, but in this case, DHS and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement are ignoring the recommendation and pushing for deportation."

Illegal Immigration Is Contentious Issue Nationwide. The Christian Science Monitor (1/23, Knickerbocker, 61K) reports, "Immigration has become an increasingly contentious political and social issue around the country. Organizations patterned after the controversial 'Minuteman Project' along the US-Mexico border have sprung up in New England, the Midwest, the South, and the Pacific Northwest. This has led to demonstrations and shouting matches with those opposed to what they call 'vigilantes.' State and local officials are working to limit government services to illegal immigrants and their children (such as college tuition and worker's compensation), requiring proof of citizenship to get a driver's license and cracking down on day labor sites where men - many in the country illegally - gather to seek work." The Monitor adds, "In Washington this year, Congress and the Bush administration are expected to continue wrangling over immigration reform. But most of the action, observers say, is likely to be at the state level: legislation and ballot initiatives."

Two California Police Departments Will Train To Enforce Immigration Laws. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Winton, Yi, 958K) reports that the Costa Mesa Police Department and Orange County Sheriff's Department in California "are developing plans for their officers to be trained alongside federal immigration agents so they can understand and help enforce immigration laws. They are among the first in the nation to seek the training, and their effort has generated both interest from other agencies and protests from immigrants' rights groups." The Orange County Sheriff's Department "wants to send 200 deputies for special training by Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and hopes federal approval comes soon. Likewise, Costa Mesa seeks training for up to 40 officers initially, mostly detectives, gang investigators and jail personnel. The training will be to familiarize officers with immigration law, give them an understanding of the federal immigration bureaucracy and let them observe how federal agents do their jobs."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Alito Expected To Be Confirmed By Narrow Margin. Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito appears to be headed for Senate confirmation by one of the narrowest margins in history. The Washington Times (1/23, Hurt, 90K) reports that while Alito has not lost the support of any Republicans, he has "won endorsement from only one Democrat. Republicans say they expect the vote to be close to the 55-45 partisan break in the chamber. … Republican leadership aides also say they are worried they may lose one of the Northeast Republicans who represent liberal states. Sens. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Olympia J. Snowe and Susan Collins, both of Maine, have declined to say how they will vote. Those same centrists, however, have said that a Democrat filibuster of the nominee would be out of order. Still, Democrat leaders insist, that option remains a possibility. … Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee has made clear that if Democrats filibuster Judge Alito, he will move to change the rules in the Senate to ban such filibusters of judicial nominations."

The Legal Times (1/23, Goldman) reports, "There are any number of ways to fault the performance of Senate Democrats in their campaign to keep Samuel Alito Jr. -- seemingly as rock-ribbed a conservative as you'll find -- off the high court." The Times continues, "During Alito's weeklong confirmation hearings, Senate Judiciary Committee Democrats were, by turns, hostile, pedantic, bombastic and confused. Follow-up questions? No time for that. … There were larger strategic miscalculations as well: notably that the majority of pro-abortion rights Americans would rise up in outraged opposition to a nominee who had so clearly expressed disdain for abortion rights at several points during his legal career. Or that Americans would find credible the shrill discourse of Alito's opponents, which by now had been assimilated as so much background noise. … And there was last year's 'Gang of 14 filibuster deal, one that Democrats initially claimed as a victory but that helped seal their defeat. … The causes are myriad, but the result seems clear: Alito's opponents threw everything they had at him and nothing worked. He is now virtually guaranteed to be confirmed."

Kerry Will Vote Against Confirmation. Sen. John Kerry said yesterday he will vote against Alito's confirmation, saying the nominee would take the High Court "backwards." The AP (1/23) reports that Kerry, speaking on ABC's This Week with George Stephanopoulos, said, "I think he will shut the door of court access to the average person in America," adding, "I will vote against him because I think he will take the court backwards."

Allen Challenges Democrats To Attempt Filibuster. Sen. George Allen said on CNN's Late Edition (1/22, Blitzer), "Judge Alito has an outstanding record. … I think he's going to be an outstanding Supreme Court justice, respecting the will of the people in our representative democracy. And if the Democrats want to filibuster, let them. We'll pull the constitutional trigger. And as far as I'm concerned, it's not too much to ask a senator to get off his or her cushy seat and show some backbone and spine and vote yes or vote no, but vote."

Alito Said To Be "Fitting Replacement" For O'Connor. In an op-ed for USA Today (1/23, 2.31M) the University of Notre Dame's Richard Garnett writes, "notwithstanding her recent 'liberal' votes in several hot-button cases, [Justice Sandra Day] O'Connor was for two decades a consistent and crucial partner with Chief Justice William Rehnquist in moving the court's constitutional doctrines in a more conservative direction: She believed, among other things, that ours is a national government of limited powers, that the states are sovereign laboratories of democracy, that religious faith and expression are protected by our Constitution and welcomed in the public square, and that our criminal laws best serve human dignity by preventing and punishing crime." Garnett adds, "Alito is an eminently worthy successor to O'Connor. What's more, he is all the more fitting a replacement, given their shared commitment to what has been quite rightly called our 'first freedom': The freedom of religion protected by the First Amendment."

Kennedy Seen As Supreme Court Swing Vote. Newsweek (1/30, Thomas, Taylor) reports that with the retirement of Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, Justice Anthony Kennedy "is seen by liberals and status-quo devotees as the remaining swing vote, a check on the court's rightward tilt as more justices are appointed by Republican presidents." Kennedy has 'evolved,' say the liberals -- much like other GOP-appointed justices before him, such as the late Harry Blackmun. Conservative lawyers scoff (though rarely on the record, lest they have to argue before Kennedy) that the justice is squishy and vainglorious, too worried about what the headlines will say about him. Other hard-liners regard him as a traitor."

NYTimes Argues Against Confirming Alito. An editorial in the New York Times (1/23, 1.19M) says Alito "is exactly the kind of legal thinker President Bush wants on the Supreme Court. He has a radically broad view of the president's power, and a radically narrow view of Congress's power. He has long argued that the Constitution does not protect abortion rights. He wants to reduce the rights and liberties of ordinary Americans, and has a history of tilting the scales of justice against the little guy. As senators prepare to vote on the nomination, they should ask themselves only one question: will replacing Sandra Day O'Connor with Judge Alito be a step forward for the nation, or a step backward?" Alito "may be a fine man, but he is not the kind of justice the country needs right now. Senators from both parties should oppose his nomination." The Times concludes, "If the far right takes over the Supreme Court, American law and life could change dramatically. If that happens, many senators who voted for Judge Alito will no doubt come to regret that they did not insist that Justice O'Connor's seat be filled with someone who shared her cautious, centrist approach to the law."

Bush To Unveil Market-Oriented Healthcare Proposals. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Gosselin, 958K) reports President Bush is "preparing to unveil a series of proposals that are intended to make the nation's healthcare system more efficient, but are likely to revive a bitter debate — begun last year over Social Security — about how much of life's biggest risks Americans should bear on their own." Many of the proposals, "such as limits on medical malpractice lawsuits, are ones the president has failed to get through Congress," but "he plans to unveil the initiatives as part of his vision for reshaping U.S. healthcare policy, aides and advisors said." Possible initiatives include "offering additional tax breaks for the use of Health Savings Accounts, and making most out-of-pocket medical spending by individuals tax-deductible." Bush's supporters "say that the changes would help tame rocketing medical costs by encouraging people to buy their own healthcare insurance and become smarter shoppers, rather than relying on employers or government programs such as Medicare and Medicaid to cover their health costs." Critics "argue that Bush's expected proposals would undermine the employer-provided health insurance system that now covers most working Americans." Despite the "political drubbing that the administration sustained on Social Security and over the flawed rollout of its Medicare prescription drug benefit, Bush appears eager to return to the fray."

U.S. News and World Report (1/30, Walsh) reports that White House officials say that in his State of the Union Address, President Bush "will focus in particular on controlling healthcare costs, which polls show is a top priority for voters. Bush is expected, for example, to recommend raising the amount individuals can deposit in health savings accounts, offering additional tax breaks for those who buy private insurance on their own, and allowing more portability for health insurance when people change jobs."

Newsweek (1/30, Wolffe, Bailey) adds, "After a series of 'listening' sessions with Hill allies last month, White House aides told members they wanted to do something 'achievable' after last year's failure to overhaul Social Security and the tax code. In his State of the Union speech, Bush will return to his old idea of tax-free health savings accounts, hoping that will appeal to younger voters who can carry their savings from one job to another. And he'll tout the new Medicare prescription-drug benefits, urging seniors to stay the course despite early bureaucratic snafus that have left some without coverage."

Bush Expected To Portray Himself As "Thrifty." Time (1/30, Cooper, Allen) adds, "After five years of tax cuts and massive spending that brought back deficits and ensured that they will continue for years if not decades, Bush plans to use his State of the Union address on Jan. 31 to portray himself as, well, thrifty. He will talk about the need to rein in programs like Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security, and he'll tout the modest budget cuts that Congress passed at his request last year. His staff wants to make 'restraining spending' a defining Bush characteristic, along with spreading democracy around the world and prosecuting the war on terrorism." However, Time adds that Bush "has a huge credibility problem," but he hopes to "earn his credentials as a fiscal disciplinarian when he talks about the long-term challenges posed by the exploding cost of entitlement programs, which together take up half the budget and are immune to White House or congressional tinkering. He wants to use his remaining years in office to persuade Congress to make transformational, money-saving changes in those programs, especially Medicare."

Bush Likely To Propose New Nuclear Energy Program. U.S. News and World Report (1/30, Bedard) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column, "Energy experts are predicting that President Bush is likely to offer up a new nuclear program in his State of the Union address. … The experts think Bush will push a plan to reprocess spent nuclear fuel for use in advanced reactors."

Aides See 2006 As Start Of Bush's "Third Term." U.S. News and World Report (1/30, Walsh) reports that President Bush is about to embark on "what he hopes will be a fresh start for his presidency. Bush tells friends that despite the many setbacks of the past year, the country still wants him to provide strong leadership, and that's what he aims to do. But that also means being more realistic, Bush has concluded, so he is ready to trim his sails a bit. … Some Bush strategists see 2006 as the start of Bush's 'third term.' They regard his first four years as a period of solid achievement that culminated in his re-election victory. They see 2005 as a 'term' of its own, 12 months marked by disappointment. They hope '06 will start an upswing." US News adds, "On a personal level, Bush is described by aides as upbeat and eager to get started on the 2006 agenda." US News also that the "real kickoff of 2006 will be the State of the Union address January 31. … Bush will continue to argue that progress is being made against the insurgents in Iraq and that the domestic economy is strong. But Republican insiders say he will also emphasize a series of smaller proposals that they predict will find ready acceptance among voters."

2005 Called Worst Year Of Bush Presidency. Newsweek (1/30, Wolffe, Bailey) says that 2005 was "the worst year of [Bush's] presidency." Bush "knows he needs something smart to offer the anxious GOP majority on Capitol Hill as its members head home to face the voters this fall. So he's shelved the ambitious domestic agenda he launched a year ago, and gone back to the mantra that's worked so well in the last two election cycles: it's the war, stupid." The Bush team "will remind the public of the controversy over Bush's decision to eavesdrop on Americans without a warrant as he keeps an ear out for terrorist activity. But Bush's aides believe they can rebrand the domestic snooping program as 'enemy surveillance' vital to protecting the country. The well-worn plan is premised on the notion that three elections after 9/11, the Democrats still don't have an answer to that line of attack."

Bush Team Said To Be Worried About Photos Of Bush With Abramoff. Time (1/30, Zagorin, Allen) reports that the White House has sought to portray the scandal surrounding lobbyist Jack Abramoff "as a Capitol Hill affair with little relevance to them." But, President Bush's "memory may soon be unhappily refreshed. TIME has seen five photographs of Abramoff and the President that suggest a level of contact between them that Bush's aides have downplayed. While TIME's source refused to provide the pictures for publication, they are likely to see the light of day eventually because celebrity tabloids are on the prowl for them. And that has been a fear of the Bush team's for the past several months: that a picture of the President with the admitted felon could become the iconic image of direct presidential involvement in a burgeoning corruption scandal like the shots of President Bill Clinton at White House coffees for campaign contributors in the mid-1990s."

Reuters (1/23) reports Time magazine reports "at least five photos show U.S. President George W. Bush with the lobbyist at the center of a corruption scandal," Jack Abramoff. The White House "has tried to play down any contact with" Abramoff, who "pleaded guilty to fraud charges this month and agreed to help prosecutors in a congressional corruption investigation." TIME "did not publish the photographs, saying its source refused to provide them for publication. Most look like those taken at presidential receptions, it said." The White House has said Bush "does not know Abramoff and does not recall meeting him, and that the lobbyist attended two Hannukah receptions and a few staff-level meetings at the White House."

The AP (1/23) reports, "Both Washingtonian and Time magazines have reported the existence of about a half-dozen photos showing the two together." The White House "has acknowledged that Abramoff attended some events at the Executive Mansion, and spokeswoman Dana Perino said Sunday it's not surprising that the two would have met." Perino said, "The president has taken tens upon thousands of pictures at such events."

Bloomberg (1/23, Willis) reports one photograph "shows Bush, Abramoff and Raul Garza Sr., who was then chairman of the Kickapoo Indian tribe, an Abramoff client who is under indictment for allegedly embezzling more than $300,000 from his tribe, Time reported. Another photo bears Bush's signature and shows the president shaking hands with Abramoff. Three others are of Bush, Abramoff and one of the lobbyist's three sons." According to Time, Garza's "meeting with Bush took place in 2001 in the Eisenhower Executive Office Building, next to the White House. Garza said the session was arranged with the help of Abramoff and Grover Norquist, a Republican activist, the magazine reported." Garza's tribe "owned a casino in Bush's home state of Texas, and there is no indication the administration acted to benefit the Kickapoo tribe at Abramoff's behest, Time said."

Democrats Deny They Benefited From Abramoff Contributions. Sen. John Kerry, on ABC's This Week (1/22, Stephanopoulos), responded to allegations that his 2004 campaign said, "got about $100,000 from…Abramoff-affiliated lobbying groups." Kerry stated, "I've never met Jack Abramoff. I've never had a dime come to me from Jack Abramoff. And I'm not going to stand for them suggesting that. … This is a Republican scandal."

Asked if corruption tied to Jack Abramoff is a "bipartisan scandal," Sen. Barack Obama, appearing on NBC's Meet the Press (1/22, Russert), said, "The specific problem of inviting lobbyists in who have bundled huge sums of money to write legislation, having them -- oil and gas companies come in to write energy legislation, having drug companies come in and write the Medicare prescription drug bill, which we now see is not working for our seniors. Those are very particular problems of this administration and this Congress. And I think Jack Abramoff and the K Street Project -- that whole thing is a very particular Republican sin."

Sen. Dick Durbin, on Fox News Sunday (1/22, Wallace), said, "I've never met Jack Abramoff, his wife or had any meeting with him. He and his wife donated $204,000 to politicians over a five-year period of time. Every single penny went to a Republican congressman or senator. … It is dead wrong for the Republican National Committee to be arguing now that the K Street Project that Tom DeLay and many others created on Capitol Hill had something to do with Democrats."

Texas Tribe Says It Was Victimized By Abramoff. In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (1/23), Ronnie Thomas, chairman of the Alabama-Coushatta Tribe of Texas, says, "In a Jan. 5 editorial-page commentary – 'The Least Transparent Industry in America' -- Fergus Bordewich identified the Alabama-Coushatta Tribe of Texas as a client of Jack Abramoff. Our tribe was never a client of Mr. Abramoff; we've had absolutely no relationship with him, other than being a victim of his unethical actions. On behalf of one of his clients, Mr. Abramoff worked to prevent our tribe from securing the rights to seek economic opportunities afforded federally recognized tribes under the Indian Gaming Regulatory Act (IGRA). Moreover, he directed another of his tribal clients to request that our tribe make a $50,000 donation to the Capital Athletic Foundation. Members of that tribe have admitted that they misrepresented what the donation was for, telling us that it was to support a congressional fact-finding mission and never mentioning Mr. Abramoff. We now know that Mr. Abramoff used our donation to pay for his trip to Scotland with Rep. Bob Ney."

Levitt Compares Congressional Lobbying Scandal To Corporate Corruption. In a Washington Post op-ed (1/23, A15), Arthur Levitt Jr., former chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, said, "I've come to think that our federal government is plagued by some of the same problems that have been hurting corporate America, primarily a lack of transparency, accountability and independence. As with many of the disgraced corporations of the past few years -- Adelphia, Tyco and WorldCom, for example -- so it is with Congress: Conflicts of interest abound, oversight has been myopic and those given the public's trust have used it to enrich themselves." Lawmakers "need not look far for an example of how to reform themselves. Just as Congress passed the Sarbanes-Oxley Act in 2002 to clean up American industry, it should pass similar legislation to clean up American government." Congressional lobbyists "should be required to disclose weekly, online, which members of Congress they contributed to and met with, which staff members they lobbied, and what issues were discussed. Lobbyists also should have to affix their signature to these disclosures and, like CEOs who sign false financial statements, face serious criminal penalties if the disclosures are not accurate." Levitt also identifies reforms that would restore congressional accountability and independence.

Kristol Says Election Of Shadegg Would Show House GOP Is Committed To Reform. Bill Kristol, editor of The Weekly Standard, appearing on Fox News Sunday (1/22, Wallace), said, "I think one test will be the House Republican leadership fight for majority leader to see how seriously Republicans want to send a signal of reform. … I think John Shadegg, who is the conservative reformist candidate, both because he was not a member of the leadership previously and was sort of a rebel against the leadership, and he voted against some of the big government programs that President Bush signed, particularly the Medicare prescription drug benefit. So if you think the problem is that even Republicans have expanded the size of government, Shadegg would send a signal that the Republicans are coming back to not creating new entitlements."

McCain Says Lobbying Reform Proposals Not Addressing Earmarks. Asked if he thinks "Jack Abramoff and his influence-peddling" is "a Republican scandal" Sen. John McCain, on Fox News Sunday (1/22, Wallace), replied, "No, I think it's a bipartisan scandal, because the lobbying is out of control. But the reason why the lobbying is out of control is because of the process, the system that prevails here on Capitol Hill between Republican and Democrat, and that's a thing called earmarking or pork barrel projects." McCain added, "It's time we sat down together, because both Democrat and Republican proposals are very similar."

The AP (1/23) reports Sen. John McCain said "efforts by both Democrats and Republicans to reduce the influence of lobbyists are not addressing the core of the problem." In an appearance on "Fox News Sunday," Sen. McCain "renewed his criticism of 'earmarks,' late additions to bills that often provide millions of dollars for lawmakers' pet projects." Said McCain, "If we don't fix the earmarking, then I can assure you the corruption will go on." The AP adds McCain said "lobbying reform promoted last week by both parties doesn't deal with earmarking because many politicians perceive it to be 'their bread and butter and preserves their incumbency.'"

USA Today (1/23, 2.31M) reports Sen. McCain said "lobbying 'is out of control,' and efforts to curb it don't address the core problem of 'earmarking.'" McCain "described an earmark as a 'pork barrel project' funded 'in the middle of the night' by a single provision 'that nobody's ever seen or heard of' inserted in a bill about to be passed." McCain said it "was a bipartisan problem, but Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said it is a Republican scandal because the GOP controls Congress and the White House."

Novak Questions Whether Parties Will Unite To End "Scourge Of Earmarks." Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (1/23) writes that the GOP and Democratic versions of lobbyist reform that were revealed last week "each fell short of what is called for by the reformer most widely respected by the public, Sen. John McCain. … A reform of a system that has grown ever more rotten must have two salient characteristics in McCain's view. It must be bipartisan, and it must eviscerate, if not eliminate, earmarks." Novak says that McCain faces an extremely difficult task in convincing "Democrats to cooperate with Republicans when they now see an opportunity to crush the GOP," while weaning "his own party from its addiction to government pork." Novak notes, "Annual earmarks, non-existent two decades ago, now near 15,000. McCain sees this as the source of lobbyist corruption, the vehicle used to bribe Duke Cunningham and the focus for half the capital's lobbyists. Both parties are united in silly changes like keeping former congressmen off the House floor and further curtailing how much a lobbyist can spend on a lawmaker's lunch. Will they unite to get rid of the scourge of earmarks?"

Rove Raising His Profile In Advance Of 2006 Elections. Newsweek (1/30) reports in its "Periscope" column, "After months of staying out of the limelight amid scrutiny in the CIA leak investigation, [Deputy White House Chief of Staff Karl] Rove is back and circulating, as Bush and the GOP prepare for battle on the eve of the 2006 midterm elections. He's traveling on domestic swings with Bush and taking high-profile trips of his own." Newsweek notes that Rove 'is still under scrutiny" in the investigation into the leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's name.

Ripon Society Said To Offer Lobbyists Access To Lawmakers. The Washington Post (1/23, A4, Edsall, 744K) reports that since 1964, the Ripon Society "has tried to create a more inclusive GOP through 'moderate, progressive policy formation,' according to its official mission statement." But in "recent years, however, a leading public watchdog group suggests, the Ripon Society has added an unofficial mission: travel agency to lobbyists." Under president Richard S. Kessler, "himself a prominent Washington lobbyist, people who represent corporate interests before Congress have 'spent millions taking lawmakers to European capitals and U.S. resorts' under the auspices of the Ripon Society and the affiliated Ripon Educational Fund, the group Public Citizen charged in a new report." Frank Clemente, director of Public Citizen's Congress Watch, said the "lure for the lobbyists who fund them is that they also take the trips, and gain 'unbridled access' to influential lawmakers." The activities "the report detailed are not illegal, but ethics specialists say they do highlight the difficulty of proscribing certain common Washington practices, if lobbyists and lawmakers are determined to continue them." Kessler is also "president of Kessler & Associates. Among its clients, according to the most recent disclosure forms, are Pfizer Inc. and three other major drug companies; Altria Group Inc., the corporate parent of cigarette maker Philip Morris USA; and railroad giant Burlington Northern Santa Fe Corp." Public Citizen says "members of Congress have gone on trips costing the Ripon Society and Ripon Education Fund $742,000 since 2000. In addition, Kessler's clients have provided another $273,000 for congressional travel."

Bush Speaking Glowingly Of Mao Biography. The New York Times (1/23, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports in its "White House Letter" column, "When President Bush met with Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany in the Oval Office this month, the talk turned to Ms. Merkel's childhood under Communism, then wandered to the subject of Mr. Bush's latest bedtime reading: 'Mao: The Unknown Story,' an 814-page biography that presents the Chinese dictator as another Hitler or Stalin. Participants in the meeting say Mr. Bush spoke glowingly of the book." The Times adds," The book might at first seem an odd choice for Mr. Bush, whose taste in biography, like that of other American presidents, runs to previous occupants of the Oval Office. But it is not so surprising given that 'Mao: The Unknown Story' has been embraced by the right as a searing indictment of Communism. … Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, said last week that Laura Bush gave the book to her husband as a gift, and that the president had just finished reading it. Asked why Mr. Bush liked the book, Mr. McClellan said he would find out, then reported back on Friday that Mr. Bush had told him that 'Mao' 'really shows how brutal a tyrant he was' and that 'he was much more brutal than people assumed.'"

Conservative Book Club Attacks Barnes' New Book About Bush. The Washington Post (1/23, C1, Kurtz, 744K) reports in its "Media Notes" column that the Conservative Book Club has attacked Weekly standard executive editor Fred Barnes' forthcoming book, "Rebel-in-Chief: Inside the Bold and Controversial Presidency of George W. Bush." Book club editor in chief Jeffrey Rubin writes, "'Rebel-in-Chief' is filled with 'empty puffery.'' Rubin adds that Barnes is "too favorable toward 'all those things that Bush does to drive traditional conservatives to despair' in a way that 'call[s] into question his own understanding of conservatism. ... Fred Barnes isn't doing the president -- or the country -- any favors by celebrating his worst political tendencies.'"

Rice Pushes Diversity In State Department Workforce. The Washington Post (1/23, A13, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice caused a bit of a stir in Foggy Bottom last week when she unveiled plans to redeploy diplomats from Europe to world hot spots. And no promotions, she said, without service in dangerous posts and fluency in two foreign languages, especially those spoken by people who may fancy grenade launchers and scream 'Death to America.' She also talked about the need for a more diverse Foreign Service, something that might improve diplomats' feel for foreign cultures. After all, just because you speak the language doesn't mean you can figure out when someone is lying through his teeth." The Post adds, "Diversity is one area where neither the State Department nor the National Security Council nor the Pentagon, despite decades of talking about it, have claimed much success. … At the State Department, four of six undersecretaries working for Rice are women, but a check of the top 45 or so officials at the assistant secretary level and higher finds fewer than a half-dozen minorities."

HHS IG Finds Low Rates Of Foster Care Visits, Poor Record Keeping. In the absence of proof from most of the states, federal officials are concerned that many foster children are not being visited regularly by caseworkers. The Washington Post (1/23, A13, 744K) reports, "Only 19 states and the District were able to produce computer-based reports detailing how often such visits occurred in fiscal 2003, according to a new report by the inspector general for the Department of Health and Human Services. Seventeen of those states required monthly visits. Yet, five reported that less than half of their foster care children were visited that frequently. Another five states reported a visitation rate of 75 percent or less. Most states said they lacked the resources to produce such a report or they did not have a computer record-keeping system."

DeLay Says He's Focused On Future. In her Pittsburgh Tribune-Review column (1/22), Salena Zito interviewed Rep. Tom DeLay, noting that it is his "nature to move forward, whatever chaos swirls around him." At a Houston campaign rally for Gov. Rick Perry, DeLay said, "My top priorities are my constituents ... homeland-border security, improving our regional transportation infrastructure and NASA." The Tribune-Review adds Democrats "hate DeLay because he beat them, often and hard -- and he enjoyed it. Democrats may be miles apart on issues but they're united when it comes to taking down a wounded Republican, especially this former House majority leader." DeLay said, "Politics has to be about the issues ... . (W)hen you personalize political differences, you might occasionally hurt your opponent but you ultimately just destroy yourself. Politics should be about who's right and wrong, not who's good and bad." DeLay "says he'd rather concentrate on keeping Republicans what even many Republicans say they no longer are -- the party of fiscal responsibility and reform."

Obama Draws Fire For Criticizing GOP Ethics Lapses, But Not Those Of Illinois Democrats. In his Chicago Tribune column (1/22), John Kass says Sen. Barack Obama is "trying to pull off a real miracle. Obama, the Chicago Democrat, is the lead public thwacker of Republicans on the corruption issue involving self-admitted crooked Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff." The miracle is "that he's trying to do this and push ethics legislation, while avoiding mention of the corruption among Democrats in Illinois. Federal investigations are crawling through the administrations of Chicago Mayor Richard Daley and Gov. Rod Blagojevich while Obama skips the mess back home." Obama "can't discuss virtue in Washington without speaking to the sleaze in Chicago. If he does, he'll be just another suit mouthing hollow words. Barack Obama is better than that."

Most Find Medicare Drug Program Difficult To Understand. The AP (!/22, Lester) reported on an AP/Ipsos poll which found that most people, "particularly senior citizens, say they are having a hard time understanding the new Medicare prescription drug program. … More than half, 52 percent, of respondents say they think the program that began enrolling people on Jan. 1 is tough to understand. Two-thirds of older people surveyed and two-thirds of those who have signed up say they are confused by the program, which is intended to help many save more on their prescription drugs. A third said they had not decided what they think of the new program and 16 percent said they have little trouble figuring out the program."

McClellan Blames Late Enrollments For Drug Benefit's Difficulties. Time (1/30, Thottam) reports, "A quarter of the 24 million people now enrolled in Medicare Part D are 'dual eligibles,' people who qualify for both Medicaid and Medicare. In other words, they are among the poorest and frailest people in the country. More than 70% of them make less than $10,000 a year; 372,000 of them have Alzheimer's. Republicans realize that after Katrina, they cannot risk another crisis in which the government appears to be abandoning its most vulnerable citizens. Some are already making that connection." Time adds, "In an interview with TIME last week, Mark McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said most people entered the new system without encountering trouble. He attributed much of the difficulty of those who did to the huge number of people who enrolled or switched plans at the end of December. Although assigned to plans, dual eligibles had the right to change by Dec. 31 to one that best suited their needs. The Medicare bureaucracy is still catching up with all that data, McClellan says." Time also notes that "in response to the bipartisan outrage, House Republican leaders are considering a proposal, initially suggested by Democrats, to extend the deadline for signing up for the new benefit from May 15 to Dec. 31, a House G.O.P. aide tells TIME."

Policy Group Charged With Sorting Through Details Of New Drug Program. The Washington Post (1/23, A13, Goldstein, 744K) reports on Tracey McCutcheon, acting deputy director of the Medicare Drug Policy Group at the Center for Medicare and Medicare Services (CMS). McCutcheon "is deep in the weeds of the largest, most complex and -- judging from its first three weeks -- messiest expansion of the program in its history." She "works 12-hour days, taking conference calls, combing through statutory language and rethinking the fine print of 60 pages of federal regulations she helped to write." The Post adds, "As complaints and confusion about the drug benefit have spread around the country this month, McCutcheon said, 'some of the specific issues that come up have been surprising.' Still, she said, 'you never bring up a huge program and have everything perfect.'"

Kristol Warns GOP Could Lose Seats Over Medicare Drug Benefit. Bill Kristol, editor of The Weekly Standard, said on Fox News Sunday (1/22, Wallace), "Republicans have much…to fear about the Medicare drug prescription benefit going bad and them being blamed for -- that was passed on a party vote, pretty much. That is an October ad, 'he voted for this Medicare benefit, which isn't a benefit, which is going to cost you a lot money, which has been incompetently administered' -- whatever the charge is going to be. That could cost a congressman his seat."

Obama Says Administration Has "Competence Issue." Asked on NBC's Meet the Press (1/22, Russert) if he agreed with Sen. Clinton that this administration "will go down in history as one of the worst," Sen. Barack Obama responded, "I agree with her remarks about cronyism and incompetence. I don't think that anybody who has been watching the news over the last year, who has seen what happened in New Orleans, who has seen some of the botched planning that took place, post-war in Iraq, would not think that there is a competence issue when it comes to this administration."

Celebrities Push Pet Causes On Capitol Hill. The Los Angeles Times (1/22, Shiver, 958K) reported on the "growing parade of celebrities trekking up Capitol Hill to talk to the nation's lawmakers about issues that rarely have anything to do with their day jobs. Trying to get attention for pet causes easily lost in the clutter of public policy debates, stars hope their cachet can make the difference in opening doors, getting media attention and scoring face time on C-SPAN. … For celebrities, testifying and lobbying in the nation's capital offers the ego stroke of being taken seriously on important issues, and a chance to make headlines for something other than their latest loves or public mishaps. … But it also can often backfire when it appears a celebrity is simply fronting for an issue in which he or she has no special expertise. In 2002, Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) walked out of a Senate subcommittee hearing on the environmental effect of mountain mining when Kevin Richardson, a Kentucky native and member of the Backstreet Boys singing group, was called as a witness. Voinovich told reporters the proceedings had turned into 'a joke.'"

OTHER NEWS:

barrel. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Goodman, 2.11M) reports, "That is a significant milestone and a telling indication of sentiment in the market: The only time oil prices have traded above $70 was Aug. 30, 2005, just after Hurricane Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast, blazing a trail of destruction through the oil industry."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/23, Scherer, 61K) adds, "This time, the main impetus appears to be a bad case of international jitters, ranging from Iran to Nigeria to Osama bin Laden. If the tensions don't cool off, energy analysts warn, consumers should brace themselves to pay more at the gas pump in weeks ahead."

NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 3, 1:00, Mathison) reported, "The natural price for oil is probably in the $70 a barrel. However if things do cool off in Iran the risk premium could be lowered and prices could fall off and could you see oil prices in the $60 neighborhood."

Investors Nervous Amid Oil, Profit Worries. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Browning, 2.11M) reports, "With the current bull market now more than three years old, the question is whether the economy can improve enough to get people…to feel good enough to start buying stocks again." At the start of the year, amid "optimism that the Federal Reserve would soon stop raising short-term interest rates and that corporate profit and economic growth would remain robust, investors bid stocks up strongly. But then, two bad things happened: Oil prices surged again amid concerns over rebel activity in oil-producing Nigeria and the West's showdown with Iran over its nuclear program. Then, prominent companies such as Intel, Citigroup and General Electric announced quarterly results that missed Wall Street expectations. That double whammy raised questions…about whether investor expectations had gotten too high and stock prices had become 'frothy.'" The Journal adds, "If investors adjust this week to the Iran worries, some of that selling pressure could ease. But a more fundamental reason that investors are nervous is that they fear that some of the market's underpinnings have weakened, making it harder for stocks to hold up in the face of the oil and profit worries."

Euphoria About Close Above 11,000 Has Faded. USA Today (1/23, Shell, Krantz, 2.31M) adds, "When the Dow closed above 11,000 on Jan. 9 for the first time in 4½ years, Wall Street viewed it as a harbinger of better things to come. The euphoria was short-lived. The Dow Jones industrial average's fast start is history. And the bright outlook for stocks in 2006 has suddenly turned cloudy. A 213-point sell-off Friday, the Dow's biggest one-day point decline since March 24, 2003, not only erased the Dow's 3% year-to-date gain and left it 333 points below the key 11,000 level, it also chipped away at investors' confidence." The "sharp reversal could offset the psychological boost that accompanied the Dow's topping of 11,000. Wall Street was hoping that the upbeat headlines would increase investors' comfort level and make them more willing to commit fresh money to stocks. Now there's concern they will remain on the sidelines."

Greenspan To Leave Federal Reserve Chair Quietly. USA Today (1/23, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports that Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan will leave his job "just as quietly as he came in more than 18 years ago. No speeches are planned for investors to parse his every word. No testimony is scheduled on Capitol Hill for lawmakers to hear the chairman's opinion on pet issues. And he's not accepting interview requests from the media. He will quietly walk out the door on the evening of Jan. 31 with very little fanfare. … Greenspan's last day at the Fed will be marked by a luncheon with other policymakers, and a staff reception is scheduled. Small, private parties are also being held around Washington to mark his departure."

The AP (1/23, Benac) says Greenspan has managed the US economy "with great assurance for the past 18 years, presiding over an era of remarkable prosperity (interrupted by two mild recessions). He has done this as chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, a powerful and somewhat mystical institution that guides U.S. monetary policy. From that vantage, Greenspan has steered the economy through multiple international and domestic crises while keeping inflation and unemployment in check and helping the country adapt to the tectonic shifts of globalization and technology."

Some Analysts Say Greenspan Is Leaving "A Prosperity Built On Borrowing." A front page story in the Washington Post (1/23, A1, Henderson, 744K) reports that Greenspan's legacy "will be judged not just by his record at the Fed, but also by the economy he bequeaths. And when he leaves office Jan. 31, Greenspan leaves a nation awash in debt -- record household debt and a record trade gap. Many analysts say his low interest rate policies contributed to these huge imbalances, which threaten the economy he nurtured." The Post adds, "Greenspan's Fed didn't do it alone, economists agree. Other factors helped fuel the borrowing binge, including global financial trends that have helped keep mortgage rates low and prompted lenders to extend more credit to more people. The result is a prosperity built on borrowing, say many economists."

Runway Warning System Said To Be Outdated. USA Today (1/23, Levin, 2.31M) reports, "An antiquated warning system for the nation's pilots has led dozens of them to receive unreliable information about slippery runways and to land in dangerous conditions, according to a USA TODAY review of accidents and pilot reports during the past decade. In at least 42 cases since 1995, pilots of commercial and corporate aircraft reported skidding off runways after receiving reports that the runways were safe, according to NASA's Aviation Safety Reporting System." USA Today notes, "Icy conditions came into play in last month's crash of a Southwest Airlines jet, which skidded off a snowy runway at Chicago's Midway Airport and onto a nearby road…killing a 6-year-old boy."

Poll Finds Support Among Young For Abstinence-Only Sex Education. The Washington Times (1/22, Harper, 90K) reports that there is support among young people for abstinence-only sex education programs. According to a new Harris Poll, "56 percent of people ages 18 to 24, and 60 percent of those 25 to 29 think abstinence programs effectively reduce or prevent the occurrence of HIV/AIDS. Another 49 percent of people ages 18 to 24 and 52 percent of those ages 25 to 29 say the programs reduce or prevent unwanted pregnancies. Among six age groups and three political groups, younger respondents showed the strongest support for abstinence over safe-sex programs." The poll of 1,961 adults "was conducted Dec. 8-14."

Duckworth Only Seriously Wounded Iraq Vet Running For Congress. USA Today (1/23, Stone, 2.31M) reports on Illinois House candidate Tammy Duckworth, an retired Army Major and Iraq war veteran who lost both her legs and the use of her right arm when her Blackhawk helicopter was hit by a rocket propelled grenade. Many "in Chicago's western suburbs have already heard" of Duckworth, the "only seriously wounded combat veteran running this year for Congress, whose ranks of members with military experience are at their lowest since World War II, according to Congressional Quarterly." At least "nine other veterans who served in the post-Sept. 11 military have announced House bids. All but one — Republican Van Taylor in Texas — are Democrats who have criticized the Bush administration's conduct of the war." Duckworth says it "was 'a bad decision' to invade Iraq. So she is competing on another field of battle: politics. She hopes to succeed retiring Rep. Henry Hyde, a Republican who has held a House seat for more than 30 years. Duckworth must first beat two other Democrats in a primary and then take on Peter Roskam, a Republican state senator in the GOP-leaning district." University of Virginia political analyst Larry Sabato said, "Since Vietnam, the Democratic Party has been viewed as the weaker on national security issues. Who better to make the case than veterans of the war? It's hard to accuse them of a lack of patriotism."

Ford To Announce Layoffs, Restructuring Plan Today. NBC Nightly News (1/22, lead story, 2:00, Thompson) reported, "Detroit is holding its collected breath as tomorrow Ford will announce its restructuring blueprint. Having lost more than a billion dollars in North America last year, Ford is expected to cut up to 30,000 hourly and salaried jobs and close several plants, as part of its 'way forward' plan. That way forward will hurt. Analysts say among the plants shuttered are Atlanta, where the Ford Taurus is built, St. Louis, SUV sales hurt by high gas prices, also plants in St. Paul, Minnesota and in Michigan, the goal to bring numbers in line with the numbers themselves." Though its "redesigned Mustang is a hot seller, its market share is shrinking, today just capturing 17% of the American market compared to 25% a decade ago. It is competition from foreign manufacturers plus labor costs and gas price that is has put Ford in a situation one analyst described as dire."

Girl's Death Sparks Reevaluation Of NYC Protective Services. The New York Times (1/23, 1.19M) editorializes, "In a city that has seen child abuse fatalities before, the death of Nixzmary Brown, just 7 years old, was a particularly horrifying one. … What raised the level of outrage was the disclosure that city workers inexplicably ignored or bungled opportunities to save her. It's reassuring that Mayor Michael Bloomberg acknowledged the city's failures, and that child welfare workers and supervisors involved in the case have been suspended or reassigned. Some may lose their jobs. A larger investigation will take place and thousands of cases are being reviewed. The self-examination, though, cannot stop there."

Top Iranian Official Warns Against Referral To Security Council. The Financial Times (1/23, Khalaf, Smyth) reports, "Iran's top nuclear official on Sunday warned Tehran would resume efforts to enrich uranium on an industrial scale if its case was reported to the UN Security Council, further raising the stakes in the crisis over its nuclear program. 'If the case goes to the Security Council, we're obliged...to lift all voluntary measures,' he said, specifying that this included industrial-scale uranium enrichment." The story continues: "Mr Larijani spoke at the start of a week of intense diplomacy. European officials will visit capitals represented on the 35-member IAEA governing board to lobby for an EU-backed resolution on referral. Meanwhile, Mr Larijani is likely to be in Moscow to discuss a Russian proposal to find a compromise, an effort to forestall the Europeans or at least temper the tone of any IAEA resolution." The Financial Times (1/23) also reports Larijani "ridiculed western governments' request for a document said to show a weapons design obtained from the illegal nuclear procurement network of Pakistani scientist A.Q. Khan, and suggested Tehran would not hand it over to UN inspectors." Larijani told the FT, "If you can find anyone in the world who can make a bomb with one and a half pages, we will cover their whole body with gold."

Iran brought before the United Nations Security Council, they are also promising that Tehran won't face serious punishment there -- for quite a while. ... Even as they press for a showdown with Tehran, American officials privately acknowledge that they aren't sure how to calibrate political or economic sanctions to bring maximum pressure on Iran's leadership without alienating the country's pro-reform and pro-American public. In recent weeks, officials in Washington and London have begun thinking about an aggressive public-relations campaign, beamed into Iran, to counteract Tehran's certain efforts to incite a strong nationalist backlash."

Sadr Says His Militia Would Defend Iran If Attacked. Reuters (1/23) reports, "Firebrand Iraqi cleric Moqtada al-Sadr has assured Iran that his Shi'ite Muslim militiamen will support the Islamic Republic if it comes under attack, the official IRNA news agency reported on Sunday. … 'If neighboring Islamic countries, including Iran, should come under attack, then the Mehdi Army will support them,' Sadr said on a visit to Tehran."

Iran Seeking To Use Oil Production As Leverage In Confrontation Over Nuclear Program. NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 2, 1:30, Williams) reported, "Iran, one of the world's biggest oil producers, has refused to halt its nuclear program. And many nations, including the US, see that as a potential security threat." NBC (Jordan) added, "Iran is not just a serious diplomatic challenge for the US and its allies, it's also turning into a challenge to their economies. The price of unleaded still going up nationwide. Overseas, no sign of any real retreat in the price of crude. All this, say analysts, prove the market is worried about Iran, its nuclear program and the global economy, especially if the UN Security Council gets involved. But on the Sunday talk shows, no agreement on the best way to hold Iran accountable." Sen. Pat Roberts: "Sanctions don't work unless you have a unified position with all trading partners with Iran." Sen. Joseph Lieberman: "If we feel Iran having nuclear weapons is that much danger to the rest of the world, then we have to be prepared to take military action." Jordan: "The White House has been trying to convince the public the economy is doing well, but Iran could turn into a very unwelcome complication."

Iranians Said To Stand Behind Government's Atomic Program. The Washington Post (1/23, A9, Vick, 744K) reports, "If any doubt remains that Iranians support their government in its quest to harness the atom, the answer comes quickly and emphatically in Persepolis, the magnificent ruins that symbolize the ancient pride and fading glory bound up with the nuclear issue here. Ordinary Iranians overwhelmingly favor their country's nuclear ambitions, interviews and surveys show." The support "runs deep in the population of 68 million, cutting across differences of education, age and, most significantly, attitudes toward the fundamentalist government that the Bush administration says is intent on using an energy program as a cover for developing atomic weapons." The Post adds, "Interviews with Iranians touring the ruins on a holiday weekend here suggest the breadth of the challenge facing Western powers determined to freeze Iran's recently reactivated nuclear program."

Israel Playing "Childish Game," Iran Says. The AP (1/23, Karimi) reports, "Iran said Sunday that Israel would be making a 'fatal mistake' if it takes military action against Tehran's nuclear program and dismissed veiled threats from the Jewish state as a 'childish game.'" While Israeli "Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz stopped short of an outright threat of military action [in comments Saturday], he said Israel "must have the capability to defend itself...and this we are preparing." The story cites Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Hamid Reza Asefi as saying: "We consider Mofaz's comments a form of psychological warfare. Israel knows just how much of a fatal mistake it would be (to attack Iran). ... This is just a childish game by Israel." The Washington Times (1/23, Rabinovich, 90K) reports Israel's defense minister "hinted strongly over the weekend that his country would act unilaterally if necessary to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons."

West Pursuing "Frog Strategy" With Iran. Time (1/30, Shannon) reports in its "Notebook" column, "As Iran shows no signs of giving in to global calls to cease its nuclear-research activities, Western nations have been mapping out a careful, incremental plan to stop Tehran. The West's plan is informally known to diplomats as the frog strategy," referring "to the old saw that if you want to boil a frog, you put the unsuspecting amphibian in a pot of cold water. … The plan was crafted by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her French, German and British counterparts. The E.U. trio requested a meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency, now set for Feb. 2, to consider referring Iran to the U.N. Security Council. If the case goes there, the allies plan a three-step approach: first, a mild resolution exhorting Tehran to end its questionable atomic activity voluntarily. If after two or three months Iran remains intransigent, they would then propose a stronger Security Council order based on the U.N.'s authority to combat threats to international peace. Step three would call for targeted sanctions, such as a freeze on government bank accounts a possibility for which Tehran apparently began planning last week when it started to shift its foreign-currency reserves from E.U. banks." Proponents of the strategy "say that only the go-slow approach can win support from Russia and China. … As for a step four to the strategy, there is no clear one yet: an uncooperative frog is something nobody wants to talk about."

UBS To Stop Doing Business With Iran. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, 2.11M) reports, "UBS AG said yesterday that it will stop doing business with Iran because of the Swiss bank's economic and risk analysis of the situation in the country." UBS "will no longer deal with individuals, companies or state institutions such as Iran's central bank, said bank spokesman Serge Steiner. A similar policy is being implemented in Syria, he said."

McCain Says Military Action Must Be Only "Last Option." Asked on Fox News Sunday (1/22, Wallace), if believes the "diplomatic track" will "stop Iran from developing a nuclear capability," Sen. John McCain said, "I don't know. I believe we have to exhaust all those options. But we cannot take the military option off the table. But we have to make it very clear it's the last option."

Roberts Cites Difficulties In Targeting Iranian Nuclear Facilities. Commenting on possible military action against Iran's nuclear facilities, Sen. Pat Roberts, on CBS' Face the Nation (1/22, Schieffer), said, "Their whole operation is spread out much more broadly than they have in the past. I would never rule that out. But at this particular time, I just do not think that that is...any kind of an alternative."

Lieberman Describes Potential Air Attack. Sen. Joseph Lieberman, on CBS' Face the Nation (1/22, Schieffer), said, "The fact is that it's good that we're working with Britain, France, and Germany now. But the pace is too slow. We've got to try to take it to the United Nations. I'm pessimistic that Russia and China will let us do what we want to do. And then I think we've got to form a coalition of the willing, first to impose economic sanctions on Iran, and secondly, we can never take the military option off the table. And if we feel that Iran having nuclear weapons is that much a danger to the rest of the world, then we've got to be prepared to take military action to deter their ability to get nuclear weapons." Lieberman continued, "This would be primarily an air attack. It's not going to involve massive use of ground forces. … We never want to be in a position to have to essentially contract out the protection of our national security vis-a-vis Iran to another country like Israel. And it's not easy for the Israelis. They don't have the same aircraft capacity that we do, capable of doing this."

US Spent $1.9 Million To Help Boost Fatah In Palestinian Elections. Following a Sunday report in the Washington Post, the New York Times (1/23, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports this morning, "The United States spent about $1.9 million of its yearly $400 million in aid to the Palestinians on dozens of quick projects before elections this week to bolster the governing Fatah faction's image with voters and strengthen its hand in competing with the militant faction Hamas, American and Palestinian officials said Sunday. ... American and Palestinian officials who spoke anonymously because they were not authorized to speak to reporters said that the program, which started in August, was intended to help defeat Hamas and that the government had done a detailed political analysis to try to focus on constituencies where Hamas was doing well." Meanwhile, Micaela Schweitzer-Bluhm, a spokeswoman for the American consulate in East Jerusalem, told the Times: "The spending was intended 'to work with the Palestinian Authority to enhance democratic institutions and support democratic actors, not just Fatah.' ... Although American aid was always acknowledged publicly, Ms. Schweitzer-Bluhm said, 'Our logo was not always on the banner.'"

NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 6, 1:30, Fletcher) added, "Election fever in Gaza, from children shouting slogans to women running for Parliament. Palestinians swept along in a wave of democracy. Wednesday will be their first elections in 10 years. It's neck and neck between the only party ever to hold power, and the arch rivals are fundamentalist Hamas. They are toning down its rhetoric which calls for the destruction of Israel. Instead, they are focused on clean government, an end of corruption, and they don't rule out negotiations with Israel. Now Fatah is getting help. $2 million of foreign aid is being used to help financial the campaign, paying for a tree-planting ceremony, praising Mahoud Abbas."

Israel Braces For Likely Hamas Win. The AP (1/23, Federman) reports Acting Israeli PM Ehud Olmert "met with top military and political officials Sunday to discuss the growing likelihood that the militant group Hamas could dominate this week's Palestinian elections. The ascendance of Hamas has alarmed Israel, which appears to have been caught off guard by the group's surging popularity before Wednesday's vote." The New York Times (1/23, Erlanger, 1.19M), meanwhile reports, "Fatah, the mainstay of the Palestinian Authority and the Palestine Liberation Organization, is in trouble, even ... in Nablus, one of the West Bank's toughest and largest cities, and a longtime stronghold for the group. Fatah is struggling to beat back" Hamas, "which won an astonishing 13 of Nablus's 15 local council seats a month ago, and elected an efficient, worldly yet devout mayor."

The Washington Times (1/23, Mitnick, 90K) also reports on the "kaleidoscope of campaign banners," noting "nowhere to be seen is the likeness of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. With his Fatah Party dangerously close to losing Wednesday's parliamentary elections to the Islamic militants of Hamas, the Palestinian moderate has taken a surprisingly low profile in a contest that many see as a referendum on his tenure." The Times adds, "Aides say election laws forbid campaigning by the president, who is not up for re-election." But "others say Palestinians are so disappointed with Mr. Abbas that he would only hurt his party." The New York Times (1/23, Erlanger, 1.19M) runs a similar story under the headline "In A Stronghold, Fatah Fights To Beat Back A Rising Hamas."

Wolfowitz's Drive Against World Bank "Corruption" Causes Controversy. The Financial Times (1/23, Balls, Alden) reports, "Paul Wolfowitz, president of the World Bank, has triggered a bitter conflict with the bank's senior career staff by empowering a group of close political advisers to pursue aggressively what he sees as widespread corruption surrounding bank projects." The dispute "has come to a head with the appointment last week of Suzanne Rich Folsom, a counsellor to Mr Wolfowitz with close ties to the Republican party, as the new director of the Department of Institutional Integrity, the internal bank watchdog that investigates suspected fraud and staff misconduct." Her appointment "has raised objections that a person close to Mr Wolfowitz, and with a political background, has been put into a senior position at a unit that was seen as independent of the president's office since it was set up in 2001."

China, Saudis Expected To Sign Energy Deal. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Oster, 2.11M) reports, "China and Saudi Arabia are expected to sign a wide-ranging agreement today on energy cooperation amid Beijing's quest to secure more energy resources vital to fuel its fast-growing economy." China, "the world's second-biggest consumer of oil, has been seeking to tighten economic and political partnerships with its major oil suppliers across Central Asia, Africa and Latin America. Its quest has taken on added urgency since 2004, when the country's oil demand surged about 15%, helping underpin the biggest rise in international oil prices in a generation."

Russian Explosions Sever Gas Lines To Georgia. The New York Times (1/23, Chivers, 1.19M) reports, "Explosions in southern Russia on Sunday morning severed the country's natural gas pipelines to Georgia, swiftly plunging Russia's neighbor into heat and electricity shortages and causing a diplomatic flare-up between the nations. ... By late afternoon, President Mikheil Saakashvili of Georgia said gas flow had ceased and energy rationing would be necessary. ... The shortage was expected to last at least two days." According to the Times, "Russian officials initially said the explosions appeared accidental but later announced that a criminal investigation had begun and that the blasts were acts of sabotage."

Morales Sworn In As Bolivian President. The Financial Times (1/23, Weitzman) reports, "Evo Morales was sworn in on Sunday as Bolivia's first indigenous president in a historic and emotional ceremony that set the tone for his new government." In a long speech, Morales "warned the US not to try to dominate the region, promised to slash parliamentary salaries and stamp out corruption, and reaffirmed his commitment to nationalising Bolivia's hydrocarbons sector." He also "pledged to change Bolivia's economic model. 'We have to end neo-liberalism,' he said. A central theme was the long struggle by the indigenous majority in Bolivia against discrimination: 'We need to repair 500 years of history.'"

The New York Times (1/23, Forero, 1.19M) adds that "in the Congress, Mr. Morales asked for a moment of silence for Inca martyrs, for the Argentine guerrilla Che Guevara, who died in a failed effort to start a revolution here in 1967, and 'the millions of humans who have fallen in all of Latin America.'" In "a rambling, passionate speech" that "mixed Spanish and Aymara, Mr. Morales did not veer from the populist themes that enthralled his followers and gave him a landslide win in the election on Dec. 18."

The Washington Post (1/23, A1, Reel, 744K) reports on Morales' swearing-in under the headline "For Bolivian Majority, A New Promise," while Knight Ridder (1/23, Chang) notes Morales "demanded the world community cancel the impoverished Andean country's $6.43 billion in foreign debt, saying, 'This money definitely never helped our indigenous people.'"

India Cultivating Closer Ties With US Congress. The New York Times (1/23, Sengupta, 1.19M) reports, "New Delhi, the Indian capital, has had a flurry of visitors from Capitol Hill lately, with the American Embassy here recording 10 Congressional delegations in 2005 alone. The reasons for the newfound interest in India are self-evident: its growing strategic importance for an American administration eager to check Chinese dominion over Asia, the lure of the Indian market for American companies, and the emergence of Indian-Americans as an increasingly engaged political bloc. For India, too, the stakes are important. Rarely, if ever, has the United States Congress been as important for New Delhi. It alone can grant a boon that India desperately wants: approval of a deal signed last July by President Bush and Prime Minister Manmohan Singh to share nuclear materials, including fuel and reactors, to help this energy-starved country."

Martin Attempts To Tie Harper To Bush. NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 7, 2:00, Williams) reported, "As voters prepare to go to vote in Canada, there is mud slinging between liberals and conservatives and there are also attack ads against the US. … Paul Martin is in danger of being thrown out of power, weakened by financial scandal and voter fatigue. So there were a series of attack ads trying to link" Conservative Party leader Stephen Harper "to one of the least popular figures in Canada, George Bush. The liberals are playing off wide spread antipathy George Bush, including Iraq." Prime Minister Martin was shown saying, "Let me tell you, Stephen Harper, we have our own values, and we don't have to borrow from the farthest right in the US conservative movement." NBC noted, "On the campaign trail, Harper has kept his distance from US policy, too."

USA Today (1/23, For, 2.31M) reports, "The weekend before the election…Martin accused…Harper of being too much like U.S. Republicans." Harper "dismissed Martin's criticism and struck a confident note as he campaigned."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/23, Dube, 61K) reports, "Canada's Conservatives have captured the momentum as the country nears its Jan. 23 election date, with polls showing a majority of Canadians would be happy to see the Liberal Party's 13-year winning streak come to an end."

The New York Times (1/23, Krauss, 1.19M) reports, "A change in Ottawa would almost certainly bring, at the least, a warming of relations with Washington, which have been strained since the American-led invasion of Iraq and have worsened over a series of recent trade disputes and Canadian moves to soften domestic drug laws. Mr. Harper, while careful not to appear overly supportive of President Bush, has suggested he would reconsider Canada's refusal to join the American missile defense program. He has also promised to increase military spending and make a bigger contribution to NATO and peacekeeping operations in places like Haiti and Afghanistan. But he also said recently that he had no intention of sending troops to Iraq."

In an op-ed for the New York Times (1/23, 1.19M) the National Post's Andrew Coyne writes, "Slowly, by stages, rather than suddenly and violently, the Western world's most enduring political dynasty is cracking up. The Liberal Party of Canada, it is often noted, held power for more years in the 20th century than the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. … Though decidedly from the (libertarian) right of the party, Mr. Harper has learned to temper his ambitions to reshape Canada's federal system and rein in its sprawling government."

Chavez May Face Domestic Backlash. U.S. News and World Report (1/30, Cue) reports that December's election in Venezuela "further consolidated power" for President, Hugo Chavez. But "even as he uses influence and money to push other Latin America nations leftward, political watchers say Chavez may face a serious domestic backlash." Venezuela "has become increasingly polarized in the seven years since Chavez was first elected president. … Since Chavez took office, the country has gone through a cascade of political tumult: the adoption of a new Constitution that many consider antidemocratic, a failed coup attempt, an unsuccessful recall referendum that large segments of society say was fixed, and a costly two-month oil-workers strike. For disaffected Venezuelans, their president is simply illegitimate."

Left-Wing Parties Said To Be On The March In Latin America. U.S. News and World Report (1/30, Pethokoukis) reports that in country after country in Latin America, "left-wing parties with more skeptical attitudes toward free markets have been on the march. … Why the leftward turn? Some blame rampant inequality." But "fiery political rhetoric may not translate into radical economics, says analyst Carol Graham of the Brookings Institution." Most Latin American leaders "are modeling themselves on Tony Blair -- not Fidel Castro. … 'Although there's been lots of talk about the return of the left, the way the economies are being managed suggests otherwise,' Graham says."

Israeli Foreign Minister Says Sharon Disengagement Plan Changed Israeli Politics. Newsweek (1/30, Weymouth) interviews Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni. Asked, "What was [Ariel] Sharon's most important political contribution," Livini said, "The disengagement plan changed totally the terms of the conflict and the political map in Israel. It changed some of the right-wing understanding and should change the international community's attitude toward Israel. Until then, Israel was blamed as a country that wants to control the lives of the Palestinians and will not dismantle any settlements. What we did changed the relationship between Israel and the Palestinians and the status of Israel within the international community." Asked why she decided to join Sharon's new party, Livini said, "I entered Israel's political life and joined Likud because I thought it should lead Israel in terms of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict... Then I understood that there is no chance to get the Likud to be a united party because most Likud leaders couldn't make clear statements about the need for Israel to support a two-state solution."

Japanese Public Said To Have Become More Accepting Of US Military Presence. The New York Times (1/23, Brooke, 1.19M) reports, "After a United States Navy sailor was confined on an American base near here [Tokyo], accused of the Jan. 3 beating death of a Japanese woman, 20 people held a protest at the base. … A decade ago, when three American servicemen were detained on an American base in Okinawa for the rape of a 12-year-old girl, 85,000 people marched one weekend, many demanding the expulsion of American bases from the island. The difference is only partly explained by the way the United States handled the two cases. In 1995, American officials were much slower to allow the Japanese to place an American in custody; this time the suspect was transferred as soon as a Japanese arrest warrant was issued. Another major factor is the change in Japanese attitudes toward the military alliance with the United States. In 1995, the cold war had only recently ended, and many Japanese expressed the belief that Japan no longer needed American troops. But the most recent case occurred days after Taro Aso, the foreign minister, warned that China was becoming 'a considerable threat.'"

Zoellick Says Banned Beef Shipment To Japan Was An "Unacceptable Mistake." Reuters (1/23) reports Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick "told Japanese Agriculture Minister Shoichi Nakagawa on Sunday that a beef shipment to Japan that resulted in a renewed ban on U.S. imports was an unacceptable mistake, according to a U.S. Embassy official. Japan, the biggest market for American beef, had just last month lifted a ban on imports imposed in 2003 after a U.S. case of the brain wasting mad cow disease. … The discovery on Friday of spinal material, believed to have a higher risk of causing a fatal human form of mad cow, in a shipment from the United States, prompted Japan to renew the ban. Tokyo had lifted the ban under strict conditions, including a stipulation that materials such as spinal cord tissue be removed."

New Liberian President Supports Stronger Ties To US. USA Today (1/23, For, 2.31M) reports, "Liberia's new president says she wants to rebuild close ties with the United States in the wake of a 14-year civil war that undermined the relationship. Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, sworn in Jan. 16 as Africa's first female head of state, said American help is essential to restoring vital services, such as running water and power. She warned that tens of thousands of former fighters could destabilize the country again if they don't get work or education."

Bird-Watching Pediatrician Among Turkey's Top Authorities On Avian Flu. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, A1, Shishkin, 2.11M) reports on Metehan Özen "one of Turkey's foremost birdwatchers" and a pediatrician who has monitored patients suspected of having bird flu. The Journal notes, "For years Dr. Özen's hospital job and his hobby existed in unconnected worlds. As Turkey grapples with the bird-flu outbreak here that has quickly infected at least 21 people and killed four, the doctor's two callings have put him in the middle of the quest to understand the virus and contain its spread. … In September, Dr. Özen warned colleagues at a medical congress that wild birds could bring avian flu to Turkey during the winter migratory season, and that is now an accepted theory."

Catholic Order's Influence In Latin America Noted. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, De Córdoba, 2.11M) reports on the Legion of Christ, "a fast-growing conservative Roman Catholic order. … Founded in 1941, the order concentrates on ministering to the wealthy and powerful in the belief that by evangelizing society's leaders, the beneficial impact on society is multiplied. Like the Jesuits who centuries ago whispered in the ear of Europe's princes, the Legion's priests today are the confessors and chaplains to some of the most powerful businessmen in Latin America."

Kim Jong Il Visit To China Regarded With Skepticism. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal's Melanie Kirkpatrick (1/23) writes, "North Korea's worst-kept secret was formally breached last week when Pyongyang confirmed, after the fact, that Kim Jong Il had paid an 'unofficial' visit to China. … Kim's travels took him to the thriving south of China, prompting speculation that he's finally, really, truly going to introduce substantive economic reforms to his nation, one of the poorest on the planet. Scholars and journalists rushed to interpret the visit as a sign that Kim is gearing up to follow China's path to prosperity through free markets. … Nowhere is that fantasy more indulged than in South Korea, where political leaders have been predicting since the '80s that the North's capitalist conversion is just around the corner." Kirkpatrick concludes, "Kim's recent trip to China isn't likely to result in economic transformation, or prosperity for his people. His authority depends on his ability to control the economy, keeping his people shackled to the state for food, shelter and work. That's the ugly bottom-line."

Bush Accused Of Failing To Promote Democracy In Russia. The Washington Post's Fred Hiatt (1/23) writes, "If promoting democracy is President Bush's largest ambition, then Russia is his largest failure. Not that President Vladimir Putin is the world's most repressive ruler -- far from it. … But no other nation has regressed from openness to authoritarianism during Bush's time in office as dramatically and decisively as Russia -- and with less apparent objection from Bush."

Rice Said To Lag Behind Foreign Policy Consensus. In his column for the Washington Post (1/23, 744K) Sebastian Mallaby writes that "the strange thing about Condoleezza Rice is that, when it comes to the stuff that a professor-politician should be really good at, she can be oddly flat-footed. … Rice gave two speeches last week calling for 'transformational diplomacy,' meaning diplomacy that will transform undemocratic societies: The internal affairs of other countries turn out to be important after all." Rice "has caught up with the 1990s consensus that powerful states may pose less of a problem than disintegrating weak ones and that the best hope for peace in the long term is a world of stable democracies."

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House Steps Up Defense Of Domestic Spying Program (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, January 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — The White House launches a political campaign this week, not for a candidate but for a controversial program: warrantless surveillance of some U.S. citizens by the National Security Agency.

President Bush plans to defend the program in a counterterrorism speech today at Kansas State University, aides said. The speech will kick off a flurry of administration activity leading to Senate hearings scheduled for Feb. 6.

"We are stepping up our efforts to educate the American people about this vital tool in the war on terrorism," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said.

At the administration appearances, Bush and aides plan to repeat arguments they have made before: This is a limited program that kicks in only when one of the parties is beyond U.S. borders and has some kind of link to the al-Qaeda terrorist organization.

Just before Bush's speech today in Manhattan, Kan., Gen. Michael Hayden plans to discuss the surveillance program at the National Press Club. Hayden, the principal deputy director of national intelligence, once headed the National Security Agency, which conducts the surveillance.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is scheduled to address the issue in a speech Tuesday, McClellan said. On Wednesday, the president plans to visit the NSA headquarters at Fort Meade in Maryland.

Democrats say they also want to fight terrorism, but some say the once-secret program is unconstitutional because it permits eavesdropping on some U.S. citizens without a court warrant. "No one is above the law," said Josh Earnest, spokesman for the Democratic National Committee.

As for legal authority, Bush and his supporters have cited his constitutional power as commander in chief. They have also pointed to the congressional resolution passed after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks that authorized force against the planners.

Some Republicans, including Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., have questioned the program's legality in light of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA). The act requires warrants from a special secret court when eavesdropping involves Americans. Specter, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, plans to conduct the hearing Feb. 6.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., speaking on Fox News Sunday, said he doesn't see the legal authority for the program. He suggested the administration sit down with members of Congress to discuss possible changes to the FISA law in light of advances in communication since the law passed in 1978. "Why not come to Congress?" McCain said. "We can sort this all out."

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., who lost the presidential election to Bush in 2004, said a special counsel should investigate the program. Appearing Sunday on ABC's This Week with George Stephanopoulos, Kerry said he welcomes the debate over the Bush policy. "There is a way to protect the Constitution and not go off on your own and violate it," Kerry said.

Some Republicans who attended their party's winter meeting during the weekend said the surveillance program should be an election-year issue. Karl Rove, Bush's top political adviser, said Friday in a speech, "This is an issue worthy of public debate."

"President Bush believes if al-Qaeda is calling somebody in America, it is in our national security interest to know who they're calling and why," Rove said.

He said later that "Democrats have a pre-9/11 view of the world."

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., appearing Sunday on CNN's Late Edition, called Rove's remarks a "cheap shot" designed to take the spotlight off White House "incompetence" over Iraq, Hurricane Katrina and problems with its prescription-drug plan.

He said Democrats would take a back seat to no one in “fighting a tough war on terror. But what Karl Rove is doing is trying to divert attention.”

Delicate Dance For Bush In Depicting Spy Program As Asset (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 - With a campaign of high-profile national security events set for the next three days, following Karl Rove's blistering speech to Republicans on Friday, the White House has effectively declared that it views its controversial secret surveillance program not as a political liability but as an asset, a way to attack Democrats and re-establish President Bush's standing after a difficult year.

Whether the White House can succeed depends very much, members of both parties say, on its success in framing a complicated debate when the country is torn between its historic aversion to governmental intrusion and its recent fear of terrorist attacks at home.

Polls suggest that Americans are divided over whether Mr. Bush has the authority to order the searches without warrants that critics say violate the law and that the president says are legal and critical to the nation's security.

But as the White House and Democrats are well aware, the issue can draw very different reactions depending on how it is presented. These next few days could prove critical, as both Mr. Bush and Congressional Democrats move aggressively to define what is at stake.

Americans may be willing to support extraordinary measures - perhaps extralegal ones - if they are posed in the starkest terms of protecting the nation from another calamitous attack. They are less likely to be supportive, members of both parties say, if the question is presented as a president breaking the law to spy on the nation's own citizens.

Viewed from the perspective of the battles over the Homeland Security Act or the USA Patriot Act, this White House holds a tactical edge; it has repeatedly proved highly effective in defining complicated debates against the Democratic Party. Applying the campaign lessons of simplicity and repetition, Mr. Bush and Mr. Rove, his chief political adviser, have systematically presented arguments in accessible if sometimes exaggerated terms, and they have regularly returned to the theme of terrorism since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Mr. Rove's speech on Friday to the Republican National Committee was a classic example. "Let me be as clear as I can be: President Bush believes if Al Qaeda is calling somebody in America, it is in our national security interest to know who they're calling and why," Mr. Rove said. "Some important Democrats clearly disagree."

Democrats - and, though Mr. Rove made no mention of this Friday, some Republicans, too - have indeed challenged the administration for eavesdropping without obtaining warrants. They argue, among other points, that the White House is bypassing legal mechanisms established in 1978 that already allow law enforcement agencies to move rapidly to monitor communications that might involve terrorists. Yet it is difficult to think of a Democrat who has actually argued that it is not "in our national security interest" to track Qaeda calls to the United States, as Mr. Rove contested; he did not offer any examples of whom he had in mind.

Beyond that tactical edge, the White House enjoys the advantage of its platform. The sheer crush of news media attention to a rare public speech by Mr. Rove could not have been lost on Democrats.

By contrast, there is no single Democrat who stands as the voice of opposition. That difference is likely to become particularly glaring this week, with a speech on Monday by Lt. Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the former head of the National Security Agency; a legal defense of the spying program on Tuesday by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales; and a visit by Mr. Bush to N.S.A. headquarters on Wednesday. This orchestrated campaign is the work of the same White House that initially offered a crouched, guarded response to the disclosure of the eavesdropping program last month.

Still, in many significant ways the task the White House faces now may prove more daunting than the battles it has waged on this terrain before.

A number of Republicans have joined Democrats in challenging the surveillance program, pointedly reminding the administration that precedents established today will be in place whenever a Democrat returns to power.

"A lot of Democrats?" said one prominent Republican supporter of Mr. Bush, who did not want to be identified while being critical of a White House that famously does not brook criticism. "Democrats, Karl? Republicans, too."

David A. Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union, said: "A lot of conservatives are very skeptical about it. It is not as clean-cut a political win as the administration thinks that it is."

Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican and chairman of the Judiciary Committee, is planning hearings on the surveillance program. And in an interview on Fox News on Sunday, Senator John McCain of Arizona said he did not think the president had the legal authority for this operation, adding that the White House should seek Congressional approval to alter the 1978 provisions if it thinks they are not working now.

Mr. McCain also came to the defense of Democrats in response to Mr. Rove's suggestion that they were not committed to the nation's security. "Do I think that the president's leadership has been worthy of support of our party and our leadership?" he said. "Yes. But there's too many good Democrats over there who are as concerned about national security and work just as hard as I do."

Beyond that, one Republican analyst who is skeptical about the White House strategy said Mr. Bush's position was hardly helped by the fact that his credibility numbers have dropped along with his popularity since his re-election. Mr. Bush may find that, as some Democrats have suggested, the invocations of Sept. 11 do not have the force they once had.

For their part, Democrats said they have learned from their repeated defeats by this White House. The Democratic presidential candidate of 2004, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, said in an interview on Sunday that Mr. Rove and the White House were willfully distorting the Democratic position.

"He's playing an old game," Mr. Kerry said. "Every time they have a problem, they play the 9/11 card."

"We all support surveillance - that's where they are playing word games again," Mr. Kerry said. "You can protect the safety of the American people and you can protect the Constitution."

The political complexity of the issue was reflected in remarks by Governor Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, a Republican, who, like Mr. Kerry, is considering a run for president. Speaking by telephone on a trip to Iowa, Mr. Romney at first offered full support for the president's surveillance program.

"The eavesdropping is a big matter on the coasts for people who are inclined to dislike the president," Mr. Romney said. "The great majority of Americans think it is the president's first responsibility to protect the lives of the American citizens in an urgent setting where there is a threat of terrorism."

But Mr. Romney called back a few moments later to make clear that he would have a different view if the program were found to be unlawful.

"I would never suggest that the president should break the law," he said. "My guess is, my assumption is, he did not break the law. The president has a responsibility to follow the law, which I believe is likely to be found, but he also has a primary responsibility to protect the American people."

Lawmakers Seek Review Of Eavesdropping Rules (REU-Y2)

By Joanne Kenen

Reuters, January 23, 2006

U.S. surveillance laws should be reviewed and possibly rewritten to allow the type of eavesdropping that U.S. President George W. Bush has been criticized for authorizing, lawmakers from both parties said on Sunday.

Democrats and some Republicans have said the Bush administration's classified warrantless eavesdropping program is illegal. The White House has strongly defended the National Security Agency surveillance as both legal and essential. The Senate Judiciary Committee starts hearings on the issue on February 6.

The NSA has been monitoring communications, such as e-mail and telephone calls, into and out of the United States by people believed linked to al Qaeda or related groups.

An audio tape by Osama bin Laden that emerged last week threatening new attacks on the United States has heightened security concerns. Neither party can afford to be seen as failing to protect the country, particularly as corruption scandals and public questioning of the Iraq war loom over November's congressional elections.

Lawmakers on several Sunday talk shows said that if the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) does not give Bush the tools and legal framework he needs to monitor potential threats, the president should ask Congress to change the law rather than bypass it.

Massachusetts Democrat John Kerry, who endorsed former Vice President Al Gore's call for an independent investigation of the Bush program, said on ABC's "This Week" that some Republicans like Bush adviser Karl Rove are trying to equate Democratic opposition to warrantless spying as weakness.

"What he's (Rove) trying to pretend is somehow Democrats don't want to eavesdrop appropriately to protect the country. That's a lie," Kerry said. "We're prepared to eavesdrop wherever and whenever necessary in order to make America safer."

'THERE IS A WAY'

But Kerry said the spying has to be legal and constitutional and if Bush needs the law to be changed, "then come to us and tell us... There is a way to protect the Constitution and not go off on your own and violate it."

Other prominent Democratic senators including Dick Durbin of Illinois, Charles Schumer of New York and Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut made similar comments about reexamining the breadth and modernity of FISA in television interviews a few days after Rove urged Republicans to campaign on national security and the war on terror.

Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), who has also questioned the legality of the eavesdropping, also urged the administration to work with Congress on modernizing the 1978 FISA law to take into account technological changes in communications.

"I know of no member of Congress, frankly, who, if the administration came and said here's why we need this capability, that they wouldn't get it. And so let's have the hearings," McCain said on Fox News Sunday.

House Intelligence Committee chairman Pete Hoekstra of Michigan, a strong defender of the president's program, said on ABC's "This Week" that "we'll take a look at whether there needs to be a change in the law."

But his Senate counterpart Intelligence Committee chairman Pat Roberts of Kansas said he worried that the public debate about what the NSA can or cannot do would harm its intelligence gathering.

"Al Qaeda are not stupid," he said on CBS's "Face the Nation." "I really worry about losing that capability and seeing a diminished capacity for the president to act and detect a possible attack on the homeland, then do something about it."

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said the administration continues to brief members of Congress as it has done more than a dozen times during the last several years.

Bush will visit the NSA on Wednesday as part of the effort to highlight the need for the program. Air Force Gen. Michael Hayden, former head of the NSA, will make a speech at the National Press Club on Monday and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will speak on Tuesday.

Lawmakers Say Will Press Bush On Spying (AP-Y2)

By Hope Yen

AP2, January 23, 2006

Several lawmakers said Sunday they will press President Bush to justify his decision to allow domestic eavesdropping, rebuffing GOP suggestions their criticism of broad executive authority puts the nation at risk.

During the Sunday talk shows, lawmakers were responding to efforts by White House aide Karl Rove to make national security the top partisan issue in the November midterm elections. Rove made the comments about the time that new audiotape warnings by Osama bin Laden were released, threatening an upcoming attack on the U.S.

"I think Karl Rove made a big mistake last Friday to use this issue as his opening salvo to Republican operatives," said Rep. Jane Harman (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif., the senior Democrat on the Intelligence Committee.

"The terrorists aren't going to check our party registration before they blow us up. ...We're under attack as America," she said on ABC's "This Week."

"The NSA's terrorist surveillance program is targeted at al-Qaida communications coming into or going out of the United States," White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan said in a statement later Sunday. "It is a limited, hot pursuit effort by our intelligence community to detect and prevent attacks."

He accused Democrats of making "misleading and outlandish charges about this vital tool that helps us do exactly what the 9/11 Commission said we needed to do connect the dots."

Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., appearing on "Fox News Sunday," said the new threats emphasize a greater need for Bush to fully consult with lawmakers from both parties on the best strategy for spy programs within the confines of the law.

"Do I think that the president's leadership has been worthy of support of our party and our leadership? Yes," McCain said.

But McCain questioned efforts to paint Democrats as weak on national security.

"There's too many good Democrats over there who are as concerned about national security and work just as hard as I do," McCain said.

On Friday, Rove outlined a blueprint for Republicans to prevail in the midterm elections, suggesting that Democrats have undermined anti-terror efforts by questioning Bush's authority to allow wiretapping without getting court approval first.

Bush has cited a congressional resolution passed after Sept. 11, 2001 that authorized him to use force in the fight against terrorism as allowing him to order the program. The program allows eavesdropping of international phone calls and e-mails of people deemed a terror risk.

Several lawmakers from both parties, including McCain and Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, have questioned the program's legality because Bush did not get court approval nor fully consult with Congress. Specter's committee will hold a hearing Feb. 6.

On Sunday, some Republicans echoed Rove's anti-terror themes, arguing that Bush should have broad power even if the 2001 congressional resolution did not expressly authorize or otherwise notify lawmakers of the domestic spying.

Sen. George Allen (news, bio, voting record), R-Va., who is considered a possible 2008 presidential contender, said there are many security measures he doesn't know — and shouldn't know — because it could risk alerting the enemy.

"Neither did I know what sort of intercepts or communications of financial assistance or other things that I don't know about," he said.

Allen cited in particular the new bin Laden tape which surfaced last week as evidence that the terror cells might exist in the U.S. and might be preparing to attack should law enforcement officials let their guard down.

"I find nothing wrong with having a hearing. This maybe ought to be something that you would ratify — yes, the president has this authority," Allen said on CNN's "Late Edition."

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass. said Rove is being divisive by seeking to exploit the terror threat for political gain. Wartime should not give a president unchecked authority, he said on ABC's "This Week."

"You know, Osama bin Laden is going to die of kidney failure before he's killed by Karl Rove and his crowd," Kerry said. "We're prepared to eavesdrop wherever and whenever necessary in order to make America safer. But we need to put a procedure in place to protect the constitutional rights of Americans."

Lawmakers Debate New Limits On Spying (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — Lawmakers of both parties Sunday called for Congress to consider whether new restrictions were needed on government surveillance in suspected terrorism cases involving people in the United States.

Congress is deeply divided on whether the Bush administration acted illegally in carrying out warrantless eavesdropping on communications in hopes of detecting terrorist plots.

But in interviews in advance of Senate hearings next month on the issue, several influential lawmakers said Congress should play a larger role in determining how the surveillance should be run.

"I know of no member of Congress, frankly, who if the administration came and said, 'Here's why we need this capability,' that they wouldn't get it," Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who has questioned the legality of the eavesdropping, told "Fox News Sunday."

"Let's have the administration come to Congress. I think they will get that authority, whatever is reasonable and needed, and increased abilities to monitor communications are clearly in order."

Sen. Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the Senate's No. 2 Democrat, said that approaching Congress was "exactly the way [President Bush] should have handled it long ago."

"If the president came to us and said there are changes in technology, changes in the threat to America, we need to change and modify the law, you bet he would have a Congress ready to work with him," Durbin said on "Fox News Sunday."

On ABC's "This Week," Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) attacked Karl Rove, Bush's top political advisor, for his remarks to Republican activists last week, in which Rove said "some important Democrats clearly disagree" with the administration's belief that "it is in our national security interest" to know if terrorism suspects are communicating with people in the United States.

"What [Rove is] trying to pretend is somehow Democrats don't want to eavesdrop appropriately to protect the country. That's a lie," Kerry said. "We're prepared to eavesdrop wherever and whenever necessary in order to make America safer."

If the administration has determined that the current setup is unworkable, Kerry said, "then come to us and tell us how you can do it…. There is a way to protect the Constitution and not go off on your own and violate it."

Rep. Jane Harman of Venice, the ranking Democrat on the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, said she believed the administration had broken the law by failing to fully brief the intelligence committees on the program.

"Congress should decide whether [the law] is being violated in any way by this program," she said on "This Week."

But Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.), chairman of the House intelligence committee, said on the same program that he had been invited in the past to ask questions about the program and to consider whether it was legal.

"The problem we have right now is that we have a whole bunch of Democrats who were for this program before they were against it," Hoekstra said. "And the only thing that has changed is that the story was illegally, in a damaging way, leaked to the New York Times," which first reported the surveillance last month.

White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan issued a written response to lawmakers' comments on the talk shows.

"Senate Democrats continue to engage in misleading and outlandish charges about this vital tool that helps us do exactly what the 9/11 commission said we needed to do — connect the dots," McClellan said.

Kerry Criticizes NSA Wiretaps (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, January 23, 2006

Sen. John Kerry yesterday called the National Security Agency's program to eavesdrop on terror suspects illegal, but he said he will continue to support its funding.

"It is a violation of law," said the Massachusetts Democrat and former presidential contender, who also backed former Vice President Al Gore in calling for a special investigation.

"I agree that we ought to have a special counsel investigate. I agree that we ought to have an independent commission because this Congress has proven itself unwilling to do what's necessary to perform its responsibilities," Mr. Kerry said.

Appearing on ABC's "This Week," Mr. Kerry was asked by host George Stephanopoulos, "If you think this is a clear violation of the law, why not move to cut off funding for the program?"

"That's premature," Mr. Kerry responded.

Under the authority of the president, who consulted on the matter with congressional leaders, the National Security Agency engaged in electronic surveillance of al Qaeda suspects, including U.S.-bound phone calls and e-mails, without a warrant.

Sen. George Allen, Virginia Republican, told CNN that Mr. Bush has the authority to conduct wiretapping of terror suspects.

"An argument can be made that the president, by virtue of his office and his role and responsibility, is to prevent attacks on the United States. The more specific authority he has right now was the Congress authorized the use of military force. And, in that use of military force, it was to wage war against those who have declared war on us, specifically al Qaeda."

"The point of the matter is that this is what you would expect," Mr. Allen said. "Wouldn't you want us to know what the enemies are plotting against us? This is focused. These intercepts are focused on calls from phones that are related to al Qaeda that may come into this country."

Democrats and some Republicans question whether the eavesdropping is legal because the administration did not get consent from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court.

Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican and chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, will hold hearings on the matter and has said he does not think the wiretapping was legal.

Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, also said yesterday that he did not think the actions were legal.

"Let us have the hearings," Mr. McCain said on "Fox News Sunday." "Let us have the administration come to Congress. I think they will get that authority, whatever is reasonable and needed, and increased abilities to monitor communications are clearly in order."

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, told CNN that Mr. Bush needs to go after Osama bin Laden "through the system, rule of law, and checks and balances that we've had here."

"Tomorrow, if the president were to decide that he felt that he had to search Americans' homes without a warrant, to just go do it on his own and say, 'I need that power,' " would not be acceptable, Mr. Schumer said.

The Other Big Brother (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff

Newsweek, January 30, 2006

The demonstration seemed harmless enough. Late on a June afternoon in 2004, a motley group of about 10 peace activists showed up outside the Houston headquarters of Halliburton, the giant military contractor once headed by Vice President Dick Cheney. They were there to protest the corporation's supposed "war profiteering." The demonstrators wore papier-mache masks and handed out free peanut-butter-and-jelly sandwiches to Halliburton employees as they left work. The idea, according to organizer Scott Parkin, was to call attention to allegations that the company was overcharging on a food contract for troops in Iraq. "It was tongue-in-street political theater," Parkin says.

But that's not how the Pentagon saw it. To U.S. Army analysts at the top-secret Counterintelligence Field Activity (CIFA), the peanut-butter protest was regarded as a potential threat to national security. Created three years ago by the Defense Department, CIFA's role is "force protection"—tracking threats and terrorist plots against military installations and personnel inside the United States. In May 2003, Paul Wolfowitz, then deputy Defense secretary, authorized a fact-gathering operation code-named TALON—short for Threat and Local Observation Notice—that would collect "raw information" about "suspicious incidents." The data would be fed to CIFA to help the Pentagon's "terrorism threat warning process," according to an internal Pentagon memo.

A Defense document shows that Army analysts wrote a report on the Halliburton protest and stored it in CIFA's database. It's not clear why the Pentagon considered the protest worthy of attention—although organizer Parkin had previously been arrested while demonstrating at ExxonMobil headquarters (the charges were dropped). But there are now questions about whether CIFA exceeded its authority and conducted unauthorized spying on innocent people and organizations. A Pentagon memo obtained by NEWSWEEK shows that the deputy Defense secretary now acknowledges that some TALON reports may have contained information on U.S. citizens and groups that never should have been retained. The number of reports with names of U.S. persons could be in the thousands, says a senior Pentagon official who asked not be named because of the sensitivity of the subject.

CIFA's activities are the latest in a series of disclosures about secret government programs that spy on Americans in the name of national security. In December, the ACLU obtained documents showing the FBI had investigated several activist groups, including People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals and Greenpeace, supposedly in an effort to discover possible ecoterror connections. At the same time, the White House has spent weeks in damage-control mode, defending the controversial program that allowed the National Security Agency to monitor the telephone conversations of U.S. persons suspected of terror links, without obtaining warrants.

Last Thursday, Cheney called the program "vital" to the country's defense against Al Qaeda. "Either we are serious about fighting this war on terror or not," he said in a speech to the Manhattan Institute, a conservative think tank. But as the new information about CIFA shows, the scope of the U.S. government's spying on Americans may be far more extensive than the public realizes.

It isn't clear how many groups and individuals were snagged by CIFA's dragnet. Details about the program, including its size and budget, are classified. In December, NBC News obtained a 400-page compilation of reports that detailed a portion of TALON's surveillance efforts. It showed the unit had collected information on nearly four dozen antiwar meetings or protests, including one at a Quaker meetinghouse in Lake Worth, Fla., and a Students Against War demonstration at a military recruiting fair at the University of California, Santa Cruz. A Pentagon spokesman declined to say why a private company like Halliburton would be deserving of CIFA's protection. But in the past, Defense Department officials have said that the "force protection" mission includes military contractors since soldiers and Defense employees work closely with them and therefore could be in danger.

CIFA researchers apparently cast a wide net and had a number of surveillance methods—both secretive and mundane—at their disposal. An internal CIFA PowerPoint slide presentation recently obtained by William Arkin, a former U.S. Army intelligence analyst who writes widely about military affairs, gives some idea how the group operated. The presentation, which Arkin provided to NEWSWEEK, shows that CIFA analysts had access to law-enforcement reports and sensitive military and U.S. intelligence documents. (The group's motto appears at the bottom of each PowerPoint slide: "Counterintelligence 'to the Edge'.") But the organization also gleaned data from "open source Internet monitoring." In other words, they surfed the Web.

That may have been how the Pentagon came to be so interested in a small gathering outside Halliburton. On June 23, 2004, a few days before the Halliburton protest, an ad for the event appeared on houston.indymedia.org, a Web site for lefty Texas activists. "Stop the war profiteers," read the posting. "Bring out the kids, relatives, Dick Cheney, and your favorite corporate pigs at the trough as we will provide food for free."

Four months later, on Oct. 25, the TALON team reported another possible threat to national security. The source: a Miami antiwar Web page. "Website advertises protest planned at local military recruitment facility," the internal report warns. The database entry refers to plans by a south Florida group called the Broward Anti-War Coalition to protest outside a strip-mall recruiting office in Lauderhill, Fla. The TALON entry lists the upcoming protest as a "credible" threat. As it turned out, the entire event consisted of 15 to 20 activists waving a giant BUSH LIED sign. No one was arrested. "It's very interesting that the U.S. military sees a domestic peace group as a threat," says Paul Lefrak, a librarian who organized the protest.

Arkin says a close reading of internal CIFA documents suggests the agency may be expanding its Internet monitoring, and wants to be as surreptitious as possible. CIFA has contracted to buy "identity masking" software that would allow the agency to create phony Web identities and let them appear to be located in foreign countries, according to a copy of the contract with Computer Sciences Corp. (The firm declined to comment.)

Pentagon officials have broadly defended CIFA as a legitimate response to the domestic terror threat. But at the same time, they acknowledge that an internal Pentagon review has found that CIFA's database contained some information that may have violated regulations. The department is not allowed to retain information about U.S. citizens for more than 90 days—unless they are "reasonably believed" to have some link to terrorism, criminal wrongdoing or foreign intelligence. There was information that was "improperly stored," says a Pentagon spokesman who was authorized to talk about the program (but not to give his name). "It was an oversight." In a memo last week, obtained by NEWSWEEK, Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England ordered CIFA to purge such information from its files—and directed that all Defense Department intelligence personnel receive "refresher training" on department policies.

That's not likely to stop the questions. Last week Democrats on the Senate intelligence committee pushed for an inquiry into CIFA's activities and who it's watching. "This is a significant Pandora's box [Pentagon officials] don't want opened," says Arkin. "What we're looking at is hints of what they're doing." As far as the Pentagon is concerned, that means we've already seen too much.

Eavesdropping Leaps Into 21st Century (AP)

By Matthew Fordahl

AP, January 23, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. -- In the past, intercepting communications meant just that _ copying a telegram mid-route, steaming open an envelope or attaching alligator clips to the copper wires that connected every telephone in the world.

DOJ_NMG_0009981

But the old ways of communicating are heading into the sunset like the Pony Express and being replaced by phone calls, instant messages, e-mail and more that are converted into digital data before they gallop across the Internet and other advanced networks.

This constant interchange of massive amounts of data, converging into speeding bitstreams on common pipes, is both a blessing and a curse for eavesdroppers.

It's easier than ever to access wholesale feeds of data. But such work is also more controversial than traditional wiretapping, as seen in objections to post-9/11 warrantless domestic surveillance and to regulatory moves to require networks to be tap-friendly.

Critics question whether safeguards put in place a quarter century ago following FBI wiretapping misconduct are strong enough to prevent abuse in the 21st century. Others fear the information superhighway is turning out to be a fast path to mass surveillance.

"The thing that really should worry people is that once the capability is there, people will abuse it," said Jennifer Granick, executive director of Stanford University's Center for Internet and Society. "The opportunity for abuse is so much greater, because so much more of our private information is transmitted over the network."

Always a hot topic, the debate over wiretapping is further fueled today not only by the knowledge of what's possible but also by a dearth of details of what's actually happening.

What makes the White House surveillance program _ acknowledged after The New York Times disclosed it in December _ a cause of such concern is that it skirts existing laws and employs techniques resembling a wide-mouthed vacuum before the fine-toothed combs can be wielded.

It's being performed by the ultra-secret National Security Agency, which is believed to have the most advanced information vacuuming technology available. The NSA did not return telephone calls seeking comment on its methods.

The agency's efforts are reported to enjoy the cooperation of telecommunications companies, which run the major backbones and junctions where data _ phone calls and Internet traffic _ is exchanged between carriers' networks. Those companies have refused to confirm or deny to The Associated Press whether they've cooperated with the program, which the White House says began in 2002 with the aim of preventing terrorist attacks.

But they could be helping in a number of ways to provide information on who's talking to whom, when, how long the communication lasts and, ultimately, the content itself. Under the laws bypassed by the Bush administration, warrants for wiretaps require some evidence of wrongdoing.

Given the huge amount of data that traverses networks, it's likely that one element of the program involves analyzing traffic to single out anyone who communicates with people in suspicious locations. Data accumulated for phone billing could be one of the sources.

Modern networks can yield such information not just for phone calls but also for any other type of communication that passes through. When the data is converted to packets, as in the Internet, each one contains a header with the origin and destination.

Even without support from a carrier, the NSA could be sniffing communication as it traverses the airwaves or passes through the millions of miles of fiber optic cable that are buried underground or beneath oceans.

The technical problem is in the fire hose of information involved, said Mark Rasch, a former Justice Department computer crimes prosecutor.

"The idea that the NSA could be sitting on every call going internationally, listening in on every possible language, for the words al-Qaida,' 'terrorist' or 'bombs' is just fallacy," he said. "Computers capable of doing that simply don't exist and hopefully never will."

But the technology does exist to quickly read just the destination or origin information.

That sort of monitoring, if done on a wide scale, creates thorny moral, ethical and legal problems because those channels are much more likely to contain the chatter of innocents than the machinations of terrorists. And it raises the question of how that traffic is used.

"The thing about traffic analysis is you can mine that to any depth you want," said Bruce Schneier, chief technology officer of Counterpane Internet Security Inc.

In domestic criminal cases, law enforcement officials who want simply to know who is talking to whom _ excluding content _ need only tell a court it's important to a case. But that low burden of proof was established with the belief that only one line would be monitored.

When such surveillance is done on all outbound international calls, the law is not clear.

"I would say the Fourth Amendment (guaranteeing protection against unreasonable searches) is the Fourth Amendment, and the fact that you're invading the privacy of millions as opposed to dozens should make it worse, not better," said Rasch, who is now chief security counsel at Solutionary Inc., a security risk management firm.

It's believed that once the traffic analysis identifies "people of interest," they are then targeted for further surveillance and, possibly, full-content monitoring. Then, the NSA could simply mirror the data going to or coming from a target. It could even set up a parallel phone company or its own Internet Service Provider that would be invisible to its targets, Rasch said.

Critics note that the White House could easily have used the secret court created by the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act to get approval for such wiretaps, but chose instead to bypass it.

As it is, the FISA court has been criticized for rubber stamping requests.

"During the Clinton years, we were fighting that kangaroo court _ they never said no," Schneier said. "Here we are now wishing for the little oversight that the court had."

The NSA surveillance also raises questions about wiretapping in investigations unrelated to national security.

Responding to complaints by law enforcers that such digital communications as Internet telephony can stymie their eavesdropping, the FCC decided last year decided that the 1994 Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act should be extended next year to apply to some broadband Internet access providers and Voice over Internet Protocol (VoIP) companies.

CALEA compels those companies to proactively build out that capability, and network equipment vendors are starting to building surveillance tools into their gear in anticipation of compliance.

Some companies, such as VeriSign Inc. and NeuStar Inc., offer an all-in-one service for carriers and service providers, which some federal agencies have argued will actually enhance privacy for people not under investigation.

But critics say that rather than laying the groundwork for privacy, new regulations will more likely enable greater misuse.

"There's no question in my mind that once we make the networks less secure because of CALEA, we will exploit that lack of security to intercept communications under every legal authority asserted by the government," Rasch said.

The President's End Run (WP)

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

THE MOST detailed legal justification to date for the National Security Agency's warrantless domestic surveillance has emerged from the Bush administration, but the 42-page version isn't any more convincing than its shorter predecessors. In some ways -- particularly in its broad conception of presidential power in wartime -- it is more disturbing.

As it had implied previously but never flatly stated, the administration asserted that the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) would be unconstitutional if it were read to prevent the president from engaging in the kind of warrantless surveillance that the administration has been conducting.

This interpretation, with its expansive view of the commander in chief's powers, would call into question Congress's ability to prevent the administration from engaging in torture or cruel and inhuman treatment or to establish rules for detainees and military tribunals -- exactly the areas in which we have been encouraging Congress to step up to the plate.

The administration, appropriately, would prefer to avoid the constitutional argument. Instead, it contends first that FISA's warrant requirements were superseded by the post-Sept. 11 congressional Authorization for the Use of Military Force (AUMF), which allows the president to "use all necessary and appropriate force" to prevent "any future acts of international terrorism against the United States."

The administration cites this sweeping language and the Supreme Court's ruling in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld , in which a plurality found that the AUMF allowed the president to detain U.S. citizens captured on the battlefield as enemy combatants. The administration says that reasoning applies equally to "all traditional and accepted incidents of force . . . including warrantless electronic surveillance to intercept enemy communications both at home and abroad."

A critical difference between detention and surveillance, however, is that Congress has already passed a law outlining detailed requirements for domestic surveillance -- even during wartime; FISA specifically provides a 15-day grace period for warrantless surveillance in time of war. The vague wording of the AUMF can't reasonably be read to implicitly trump FISA.

The administration goes on to say that if the AUMF doesn't provide such approval, and if FISA is interpreted to prohibit such wiretapping outside its procedures (the law says it is to be the "exclusive means" for authorizing foreign intelligence surveillance), the statute would be unconstitutional.

President Bush, the paper says, "determined that the speed and agility required to carry out the NSA activities successfully could not have been achieved under FISA." Because those activities "are necessary to the defense of the United States from a subsequent terrorist attack, FISA would impermissibly interfere with the President's most solemn constitutional obligation -- to defend the United States against foreign attack."

Before and since the 1978 passage of FISA, presidents have asserted that they also possess the inherent constitutional authority to authorize warrantless searches. Yet there is a major difference between claiming such inherent presidential power and stretching it -- too far in our view -- to conclude that, when Congress has spoken on an issue, the president is free to ignore that legislative action.

Especially without knowing the parameters of the surveillance, we hesitate to second-guess the president's argument that FISA's limits are unduly constraining. The surveillance may be critical for national security, and a law written in a different technological age may well need to be refurbished. But the proper way to handle that -- which the administration rejected -- would have been to seek changes in the law, not to do a stealthy end run around the legislative process. In such an amorphous, long-running conflict as the war against terrorism, it's critical to ensure that limits are in place to prevent the executive branch from overreaching.

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

Have you ever talked sexy to your wife or your girlfriend - or your husband or your boyfriend - on the telephone? Would you keep talking if you thought that one of Dick Cheney's operatives was listening in?

Talk about a chilling effect.

What if you were thinking of running for Congress and you tried to bolster your understanding of terrorism by speaking with knowledgeable but controversial figures in the Middle East? How would you feel if you knew - or even suspected - that government agents were monitoring your conversations? Would you be less likely to engage in those conversations? Would you begin to censor yourself? Would your contacts still be willing to speak freely if they thought the feds were listening in?

Freedom of speech in the United States covers matters trivial and profound. The corrosive damage that is being done to the First Amendment, that cornerstone of free speech, has been largely overlooked in the controversy over President Bush's decision to permit the government to eavesdrop without warrants on phone calls and e-mail messages inside the United States.

Most of the attention generated by this domestic spying program has understandably been focused on its affront to the Fourth Amendment, which prohibits unreasonable searches, and its brazen violation of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which established clear-cut rules for electronic surveillance in the U.S.

But there's an additional danger. When the government's spies are allowed to snoop willy-nilly on phone calls and e-mail in the United States, without the important legal constraint of having to seek a warrant, it means that the all-important First Amendment has developed a chill, symptomatic of a life-threatening illness.

The ostensible aim of the president's domestic surveillance program, conducted by the supersecret National Security Agency, is to home in on communications into and out of the United States that involve individuals or organizations suspected of some sort of terror connection. But, as The Times reported last week, F.B.I. officials have repeatedly complained that the N.S.A.

has bombarded them with thousands upon thousands of unsubstantiated tips - names, telephone numbers, e-mail addresses and so forth - that have either led nowhere, or to completely innocent individuals.

Whatever its stated goals, the N.S.A. seems to be operating the greatest fishing expedition in the history of the world.

The American Civil Liberties Union, in a lawsuit seeking a halt to the spying, warned that scholars, lawyers, journalists and others who communicate with people outside the U.S. are already experiencing a chilling effect. People who are doing nothing wrong, but who feel they may become targets of the program, for whatever reasons, are curtailing their conversations and censoring their correspondence, according to the suit.

Laurence Tribe, a professor of constitutional law at Harvard, noted that people who are aware of the surveillance program and who believe that their political views may be seen as hostile by the government, may also become less candid in their telephone conversations and e-mail. Others could unwittingly become the victim of contacts by individuals that the government may be interested in.

He gave an example:

"I recently got a series of e-mails from someone, quite without invitation, that got rather scary in the sense that they started saying positive things about Osama bin Laden. I asked the person in reply to stop e-mailing me, and I got an e-mail today saying, 'Your request is permanently granted.' But in the meantime, granted or not granted, that could easily put me on some kind of targeting list."

Speaking about the potential long-term effect of widespread domestic spying, Professor Tribe said:

"The more people grow accustomed to a listening environment in which the ear of Big Brother is assumed to be behind every wall, behind every e-mail, and invisibly present in every electronic communication, telephonic or otherwise - that is the kind of society, as people grow accustomed to it, in which you can end up being boiled to death without ever noticing that the water is getting hotter, degree by degree.

"The background assumptions of privacy will be gradually eroded to the point where we'll wake up one day, or our children will, and it will seem quaint that people at one time, long ago, thought that they could speak in candor."

Held In 9/11 Net, Muslims Return To Accuse U.S. (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

Hundreds of noncitizens were swept up on visa violations in the weeks after 9/11, held for months in a much-criticized federal detention center in Brooklyn as "persons of interest" to terror investigators, and then deported. This week, one of them is back in New York and another is due today - the first to return to the United States.

They are no longer the accused but the accusers, among six former detainees who are coming back to give depositions in their federal lawsuits against top government officials and detention guards, at a time when the constitutionality of part of the government's counterterrorism offensive is under new scrutiny.

As in the cases of all the Muslim immigrants rounded up in the New York area after the terror attacks, the six were never accused of a crime related to 9/11; officials eventually cleared all of them of links to terrorism. A report by the inspector general of the Justice Department found systemic problems with immigrant detentions and widespread abuse at the federal detention center where the six had been held; several guards have since been disciplined.

But as the six return to the city - four of them from Egypt, one from Pakistan, one from London - the conditions imposed by the United States government include the requirement that they be in the constant custody of federal marshals.

They are barred from calling anyone during their weeklong stays at an undisclosed New York hotel, where 12 days of closed depositions are to begin today. They can expect hours of questioning by lawyers representing at least 31 defendants in the lawsuits, including John Ashcroft, the former attorney general, and Robert S. Mueller III, the director of the F.B.I.

The first returning detainees, Yasser and Hany Ibrahim, who are brothers, say that putting themselves back in the hands of the government they are suing is an act of faith in America. In recent telephone interviews from Alexandria, Egypt, the two described themselves as frightened but resolute in pressing a 2002 class-action lawsuit charging that they were abused and deprived of due process because of their religion or national origin.

"I'm seeking justice," said Yasser, 33, who had a Web site design business in Brooklyn before he and Hany, 29, a deli worker, were delivered in shackles to the Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn 19 days after 9/11. "It's from the same system that did us injustice before. But I have faith in this system. I know what happened before was a mistake."

Charles S. Miller, a spokesman for the Justice Department, said officials would not comment on any aspect of the case, including the conditions of the men's return to the city and their allegations. But in court papers, the defendants deny wrongdoing, and department lawyers argue in part that the Sept. 11 attacks created "special factors" - including the need to detect and deter future terrorist attacks - that outweigh the plaintiffs' right to sue for damages for any constitutional violations.

The detainees' lawyers say that what happened at the Brooklyn detention center can be recognized four years later as the template for many of the counterterrorism measures now being fiercely challenged.

"The post-9/11 domestic immigration sweeps were the first example of the Bush administration's willingness to ignore the law and hold people outside the judicial system," said Rachel Meeropol, a lawyer for the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents the Ibrahim brothers. "The kind of torture, interrogation and arbitrary detention that we now associate with Guantánamo and secret C.I.A. facilities really started right here, in Brooklyn."

Richard Peter Caro, a lawyer for Stuart Pray, the lieutenant who oversaw the detainees' arrival at the detention center, said yesterday: "We're glad that they're coming in to be deposed so we can really get at the facts and finally see what the evidence shows. I'm confident that my client will be found to have committed no wrongdoing at all."

Last week, the center filed a class-action suit against President Bush and other administration officials over the National Security Agency's domestic eavesdropping without warrants. Ms. Meeropol is one of the plaintiffs, contending that her communications with clients like the Ibrahims may have been monitored illegally. The government says the surveillance program is a legal and valuable tool in the war on terror.

Illegal recording of lawyer-client conversations was one of the abuses documented at the Brooklyn detention center in a scathing 2003 report by the Justice Department's inspector general. The report also found a pattern of physical abuse, some of it caught on prison videotape, including beatings and sexual humiliations like those described by the Ibrahim brothers or other former detainees. The report said it was Mr. Ashcroft's policy to hold detainees on any legal pretext until the F.B.I. cleared them, even though such clearances took months and many detainees were immigrants picked up by chance.

At the time, Mr. Ashcroft said he made "no apologies" for finding every legal way possible to protect the American public. Nonetheless, officials pledged to work on getting kinks out of the system, and said abuses would be punished.

Critics charge that the authority that Mr. Ashcroft asserted after 9/11 - to detain any noncitizen considered a "person of interest" secretly and indefinitely - is unconstitutional. Government officials argue that secrecy is needed to keep terrorists in the dark.

Mr. Ashcroft has sought to have the two lawsuits brought by the detainees dismissed. But in a decision appealed by the government, a federal judge in Brooklyn ruled in September that he and other defendants would have to answer questions, at a later deposition, in one of the suits: a 2004 complaint by another two of the six returning detainees.

Those two men, in their late 30's, are Ehab Elmaghraby, an Egyptian immigrant who ran a restaurant near Times Square, and Javaid Iqbal, a Pakistani immigrant whose Long Island customers knew him as "the cable guy."

"I am not afraid," Mr. Iqbal wrote last week in an e-mail message about his return. "I am also sure that justice will be served because peoples of U.S.A. are justice-loving people regardless of race and religion."

The Ibrahim brothers are more fearful. They say that their parents begged them not to return to the country where they were held in maximum security without charges for eight months and, the brothers charge, beaten and tormented by guards. "Part of my motivation is to make sure that what happened to us doesn't happen to more people in the future," said Yasser, who was due to arrive in New York today, joining his brother, who came on Friday.

Both spoke with nostalgia of the three or four years they lived in New York, on and off, before 9/11. When they were not working, they said, they hung out together in Greenwich Village, browsed electronics stores near Times Square and took friends on the rides at Coney Island. Hany proudly recalled how he worked his way up from stock boy to grill man and then manager of a deli in Ocean Parkway, Brooklyn. "The best I lived in my life was in New York," he said.

Right after the World Trade Center attack, they said, their parents urged them to come home. "We assured them," Yasser recalled: " 'This is the United States. They don't arrest people for no charges. We didn't do anything, so nothing's going to happen to us.' "

But at 2 p.m. on Sept. 30, 2001, the lawsuit says, a dozen terrorism investigators from the F.B.I., the police and immigration services knocked at the door of the Ocean Parkway apartment that the brothers shared with several Egyptian and Moroccan friends. After questioning, the investigators took away Yasser, Hany and another man, all of whose tourist visas had expired.

Why investigators showed up is unclear, said their lawyer, Ms. Meeropol. But she noted that some interrogations were prompted by anonymous tips about "suspicious-looking" foreign men. Federal officials have contended that at a time when a second terror attack seemed imminent, all tips had to be checked. As a practical matter, once the brothers were labeled "of interest" to investigators, they were destined for the maximum-security unit of the Metropolitan Detention Center.

Physical abuse, the lawsuit says, began the moment they arrived, chained and shackled. As Yasser described it, guards supervised by Lieutenant Pray slammed his brother face-first into a wall where an American flag T-shirt had been taped, then did the same to him.

Pain became part of the brothers' daily routine, the lawsuit charges. Escort teams cursing them as Muslims and terrorists slammed them into every available wall when they were taken from their cells, twisted their wrists and fingers, and stepped on their leg chains so that they fell, their ankles bruised and bloody, according to the suit.

But worse than physical or verbal abuse, Yasser said, was "the feeling that we are being hidden from the outside world, and nobody knows in the outside world that we are arrested and in this place." Hany, who says he had a nervous breakdown when he returned to Egypt, recalled that guards and lieutenants terrified him by saying, "You're going to stay here the rest of your life."

At a closed immigration hearing on Nov. 20, three weeks after their arrest, the brothers agreed to immediate deportation. By Dec. 7, the lawsuit says, F.B.I. memos stated that clearance checks on the Ibrahims had shown no links to terrorism. But they were held six more months - Hany until May 29, 2002, and Yasser until June 6.

The suit asks the court to declare that all the detentions were unjustified and illegal, to award compensatory and punitive damages, and to order the government to return personal property it confiscated.

To prevent unnecessary detentions and abuses of noncitizens in the event of a new national emergency, the Justice Department's inspector general, Glenn A. Fine, in 2003 recommended changes in counterterrorism policy as well as disciplinary action against at least 10 guards and supervisors. In his last report to Congress, in August 2005, Mr. Fine said that many of his recommendations had been acted upon but that formal policy changes were still being negotiated.

The Federal Bureau of Prisons has fired two detention officers, suspended two for 30 days and demoted one in connection with the Brooklyn inquiry, said Traci Billingsley, a bureau spokeswoman.

The Ibrahim brothers say that when they finally reached home, they found that the presumption of guilt had followed them into an Egyptian secret service dossier that made them unemployable. Yasser, now married with a 2-year-old son, said he and Hany were eking out a living in a small jewelry business.

"It's going to be very difficult for me to go back for just a week and not to be able to see the places that I loved before," he said of his return. "America's the land of the free."

Senator 'Taz" Races to Help Iditarod Icon

It's no surprise that Sen. Ted Stevens, Alaska's big man in Washington, is a fan of the Iditarod Trail Sled Dog Race. "It's such a great sport," he says of the annual 1,150-mile Anchorage-to-Nome adventure set to run in March. "It epitomizes the Alaskan spirit."

But he's not just an observer: He's a husky dog guy, and, with his wife, Catherine, is mushing an effort to save the life of their old friend and four-time Iditarod winner Susan Butcher, the face of the event. "She's a great friend," says Stevens of Butcher, 51, who's battling leukemia and in need of a bone marrow donor. Stevens tells us that he es in Washington, one named Princess Keely after the daughter of pal Sen. Conrad Burns, the other "Taz" for the nickname Sen. Trent Lott has given Stevens:

"Tasmanian Devil." "But," he says, " they had no place to run." So he gave the dogs to the daughters of Butcher and husband David Monson, who says Stevens still visits the dogs at their Trail Breaker Kennel when he's in Fairbanks.

Well, those visits sadly turned serious last December when Butcher was diagnosed. The Stevenses and Monson, backed by others of Susan's friends, including Bill Gates, George Lucas, and Colin Powell, then embarked on a race to boost bone marrow donor typing in hopes a match will be found. "She's a fantastic competitor," says Stevens, "and that's why we hope she'll win this last battle."

Pro Bono for the Gitmo Gang

Legal and military sources tell us that some 57 American law firms are offering free legal advice to more than 150 "enemy combatants" held at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. A list provided to Whispers shows several prominent shops, many of which brag about their efforts on their websites. The pro bono service, organized by the Center for Constitutional Rights, is under the gun in conservative legal circles and some military offices that suggest it's bad form to help alleged terrorists while also working for clients involved in the war on terrorism like Boeing and General Dynamics. But don't hate lawyers just because they're helping accused terrorists. Thurston Moore, chairman of Hunton & Williams, says pro bono "is the right thing to do." Moore adds that firms like his aren't working a detainee's criminal case, only the legality of imprisonment at Guantanamo. "If good lawyers did not take on engagements fundamental to our constitutional rights, our rights would be meaningless," he says.

Where There's Smoke There's Bill

Bill Clinton still has great timing. On approach to Bangor, Maine, recently, the cockpit of his jet filled with smoke, forcing a long layover. While he was on the ground, a military jet packed with 300 troops returning from Iraq happened to land, and he bounded out to meet them. Once the jet was fixed, he got back on, but the smoke reappeared, and he jumped off just as a second troop transport arrived from Iraq. Yes, he shook all their hands, too. "He was actually glad he was grounded," says spokesman Jay Carson , who adds that Bubba has since written to some of those troops. Now Clinton's visit will even figure in a documentary on troop greeters. "It was coincidentally being shot," says Carson, "and they're going to make President Clinton a big part of that."

Predator And Prey (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh, Mark Hosenball And Sami Yousafzai

Newsweek, January 30, 2006

That familiar voice, at once menacing and gently lilting, was back. After more than a year in which some U.S. officials had speculated openly he might be dead, Osama bin Laden resurfaced in his usual way, unannounced, dressing up threats of death in reasonable tones. Holed up in some remote region believed to be along the Afghan-Pakistani border, the impresario of 9/11 seemed to be talking to his enemies more than his followers. And in his audiotape, recorded in recent weeks and secretly couriered as usual to an Al Jazeera bureau, there was also something new: an offer of an olive branch. In a cynical attempt to exploit American war-weariness, especially in Iraq, the terror leader noted that U.S. polls showed declining support for the war. For the first time, he proposed "a long-term truce on fair conditions" to the American people "so both sides can enjoy security and stability." Bin Laden, who once built his rep by pledging to destroy the "far enemy," now seemed to be trying to close the gap. All America had to do was withdraw from Arab lands.

The tape immediately touched off speculation as to its meaning. Vice President Dick Cheney, chronically skeptical of remorse from enemies, denounced the message as "a ploy." Other Bush administration officials suggested it was a sign of bin Laden's weakness and, perhaps, his own war-weariness. The tape surfaced at a time when the CIA and the Defense Department have stepped up missile strikes inside Pakistani tribal regions, where many experts believe bin Laden and his top deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, are hiding. Only days earlier, a CIA-guided Predator drone fired missiles at houses in the village of Damadola, aiming to kill Zawahiri. At least 18 people were obliterated, though probably not Zawahiri. U.S. officials remained confident that the dead included some senior Qaeda members, and Pakistani authorities maintained that four to five Qaeda operatives were killed in the missile attack. "We are still not sure who they were," said a senior official in Islamabad who spoke only on condition of anonymity. "We are still in the process of establishing their identity."

Among those thought to have been killed was Midhat Mursi al-Sayid Umar, an Egyptian explosives and poisons expert. It was Umar, also known as Abu Khabbab, who allegedly trained the suicide bombers who killed 17 U.S. sailors on the USS Cole in 2000. "If he was killed, then it's a big blow to bin Laden and Al Qaeda," says Sharif Mohammed, a Qaeda-linked Islamist in Pakistan. "He was responsible for running the Qaeda network in the West." (Umar may have also been researching germ and chemical warfare.) Another possible victim of the strike is Abu Obaidah al-Misri, Al Qaeda's chief of operations in Afghanistan's eastern Kunar province, where U.S. and Afghan forces regularly come under militant attack. Still, U.S. counterterrorism officials say they may never completely confirm the identities of terrorists who were blown up.

Civilians are another matter. The Predator killed several women and children, provoking demonstrations in the tribal region, many of them organized by the radical Pakistani Islamic alliance known as Muttehida Majlis Amal. The radicals hoped to use the attack to undermine support for Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf, America's close ally. Musharraf certainly is in a delicate position. He told visiting U.S. Under Secretary of State William Burns over the weekend that America needs to be more careful inside his borders.

Authority to fire Hellfire missiles from Predators has been delegated by the White House to the CIA, according to current and former counterterrorism officials who did not want to be named because the matter is classified. If officials conducting surveillance believe there is a strong chance of civilians' being killed in an attack, operatives are expected to consult higher-ranking agency officials before firing. In the case of the Damadola attack, according to a knowledgeable source who spoke on condition of anonymity because the subject was sensitive, CIA officials made the decision to launch the attack themselves. But they notified higher-ups in the administration, including White House officials, who had enough time to veto the strike if they wanted.

Despite the ethics—and public relations—issues, U.S. officials involved with the hunt for bin Laden and Zawahiri said they're quite sure that the benefits of the Predator campaign outweigh the costs. According to two former officials, several groups of missile-armed Predators—some of which are equipped with laser-guided gravity bombs—are based in the region. And a Pakistani official privy to intelligence says the January Predator strike was the fourth inside Pakistan's borders since May 2005 (two more than have been reported previously). Beginning earlier this month, the military and CIA have also begun to use the first production models of the Global Hawk unmanned recon aircraft, which can survey distances of more than 100 miles from 65,000 feet and direct the lower-flying Predator to precise targets.

The tribal region where Zawahiri was said to be has a long history of fierce resistance to central control, as both the British Raj and the Soviets who occupied neighboring Afghanistan found out. But none of those previous powers possessed similar technology to scour the countryside from the sky and to unleash remote-control missiles. The broad message of the Damadola strike, which flattened three houses and killed several families, is that tribesmen need to rethink their code. Those who are supposedly governed by the iron law of Pashtunwali—or automatic loyalty to fellow tribesmen or guests—now have to recalculate the cost of that, U.S. officials said. "The message to them is, 'You have to take a new measure now: your families are not safe if you protect the terrorists'," says one senior Pentagon official who would not speak about the attack on the record because the details are classified.

Although Zawahiri's wife is said to be a "Momand" Pashtun from that region—offering him considerable protection—the CIA has been having more success lately in developing sources in the area, with help from Pakistani intelligence. (According to several U.S. officials, the Pakistani intelligence service has allowed a large "liaison" team into the country, and has accepted a great deal of technical assistance.) Frank Anderson, a former CIA station chief in the region, says Pashtunwali goes only so far, especially with multimillion-dollar prices on the heads of top Qaeda suspects. "The noble savage whose word is his bond exists a lot more in literature than on the ground," he says archly.

U.S. officials also express confidence that, after years of infighting back in Washington, they are finally waging the global war on terror in a coherent way. Despite media coverage a year ago about a power struggle between the Pentagon and the CIA, the two agencies are working fairly well together now in the field, U.S. counterterrorism officials say. The CIA effectively has control inside Pakistan, where the U.S. military is not supposed to be operating (and the agency has "deniability" because it is engaged in covert operations that are never officially acknowledged). Indeed the Global Hawk and Predator systems are so sophisticated that live, high-resolution pictures are transmitted, via satellite links, to a large command post called the Global Response Center on the sixth floor of CIA headquarters in Langley, Va. There, officials can watch the satellite feeds in real time on large screens while other officials with headsets bark orders to operatives in the field.

Across the border in Afghanistan, meanwhile, U.S. Special Operations teams are operating day and night, battling Tali-ban insurgents who infiltrate from Pakistan. "It's quite a bloody little war down there," a U.S. military source said.

The upshot is that some U.S. officials said they would not be terribly surprised if bin Laden were suing for peace. Other terrorism analysts suggested that, at a time when bin Laden's rival and sometime partner in Iraq, Abu Mussab al-Zarqawi, has offended many Muslims with his ruthless tactics, the Qaeda chieftain's main message was "I'm still the main man." Bin Laden may have been trying to appear reasonable and merciful to his own followers by playing the peacemaker.

Still, the biggest challenge bin Laden had last week was getting the American people to take him seriously. For Americans, after four years of this kind of thing—and with the center of gravity now in Iraq—there seemed as much theater as threat to his latest missive. (Homeland Security Department officials languidly announced the threat level was unchanged, then fell silent.) The terror leader, who in the past has generally hewed to Qur'anic citations, referred to U.S. reports about abuse at Abu Ghraib and even quoted a left-wing U.S. author, William Blum, as saying that all the U.S. president has to do to get the terrorists off his back is announce "that American interference in the nations of the world has ended." The reference sent Blum's anti-imperialist treatise, "Rogue Nation," soaring from 200,000-plus in rankings on Amazon.com to 17. ("Oprah or Osama, it doesn't matter, as long as it begins with 'O'," Blum joked to NEWSWEEK.) Al Jazeera's Washington anchor, Hafez Al-Mirazi, later solicited Blum and Israeli author Natan Sharansky for his show "so we can have both Bush and bin Laden's favorite authors on."

In some respects bin Laden seemed to be playing, perhaps naively, into George W. Bush's hands. Nothing will do more to silence advocates of early withdrawal from Iraq than an endorsement from the chief author of the 9/11 attacks. But coming at a time when a new analysis suggests the war in Iraq could cost upwards of $2 trillion, and the U.S. economy is burdened with record budget deficits, the promise of an endless war could resonate with some Americans. "Don't let your strength and modern arms fool you," bin Laden said in his message. "We have nothing to lose. A swimmer in the ocean does not fear the rain." As he has so often, bin Laden closed by invoking his successful war against the Soviet Union in Afghanistan in the 1980s. "We bled their economy, and now they are nothing. In that there is a lesson for you." Perhaps there is. Americans just don't want to hear it from him.

Can Bin Laden Be Caught? (TIME)

By aparisim ghosh

Time, January 23, 2006

The voice was muffled, labored, weak--as you might expect from a man who has spent the past four years on the run. If it didn't belong to one of the world's most feared men, it would hardly scare a child. Having disappeared from view, sheltering in the mountains of Afghanistan and Pakistan, Osama bin Laden may have lost the ability to send a chill down the world's spine. Governments don't shut down airports or send security forces into red alert. Even when he makes the direst threats, we no longer feel compelled to slow down, much less stop, the course of our daily lives.

But bin Laden's re-emergence last Thursday was still a jolt, coming after a 13-month silence that raised questions about whether the al-Qaeda boss was incapacitated or even dead. The U.S. believes the 10-minute taped message, which aired on the Arab TV channel al-Jazeera, was probably recorded sometime since November, partly because of a reference to British newspaper reports from that time about a purported proposal by President Bush to bomb al-Jazeera. The tape suggested that bin Laden is alive, if not quite well. A longtime bin Laden watcher, French terrorism expert Roland Jacquard, speculates that the decision not to release a videotape may reflect a desire to conceal the deterioration of his physical condition. And if bin Laden's voice sounded more muted than in his last message, in December 2004, so did his rhetoric. He warned of forthcoming attacks on U.S. soil but didn't convey a sense of immediacy. "They are in the planning stages, and you will see them in the heart of your land as soon as the planning is complete," he said. He floated the idea of a cessation of hostilities with America if the U.S. withdraws troops from Iraq and Afghanistan. "We do not mind offering a long-term truce based on just conditions that we will stick to," bin Laden said. The White House didn't bite. "We do not negotiate with terrorists," spokesman Scott McClellan said. "We put them out of business."

That claim, of course, is undermined every day that bin Laden and his deputy and chief tactician, Ayman al-Zawahiri, remain on the loose. But bin Laden's resurfacing has come at a time when the leadership of al-Qaeda appears to be under as much strain as at any time since the fall of the Taliban in 2001. Antiterrorism experts say the Saudi-born terrorist is no longer in active contact with field commanders, and his ability to plan and direct specific operations is hampered by his isolation. In Iraq, scene of al-Qaeda's deadliest strikes since 9/11, the group's leader, Abu Mousab al-Zarqawi, is fighting battles with some Iraqi insurgent groups who want him dead almost as badly as the U.S. military does (see box). Meanwhile, an intensified U.S. push to hunt down al-Qaeda leaders has scored a series of apparent successes; just last week Pakistani intelligence officials claimed that a Jan. 13 U.S. air strike on the village of Damadola had killed as many as four senior operatives--although it may have missed its chief target, al-Zawahiri, whose voice was heard on an undated audiotape last Friday. Among some U.S. counterterrorism experts, there was speculation that the release of the bin Laden tape was al-Qaeda's attempt to boost the morale of its foot soldiers amid the run of bad p.r. Says an intelligence official: "The question is, Is this someone's way of changing the topic?"

It might be, but no one is confusing misdirection for surrender. While improved cooperation between the U.S. and Pakistan has apparently helped the U.S. zero in on bin Laden's lieutenants, credible intelligence on the main target's whereabouts is sketchy at best. Law-enforcement officials say that bin Laden's message aside, there are no signs of heightened al-Qaeda activity in the U.S., but they don't discount the possibility of a terrorist attack. "The threat's still real," says a U.S. intelligence official, "but because of this tape, does that make it any more real than it was before the tape? No." Today, the official says, al-Qaeda is not the same outfit it was on 9/11; it has morphed from a command-and-control organization into a philosophy that has "inspired cells around the world ... It's harder for them to coordinate, but it also makes them very dangerous."

Some terrorism experts believe that the perception that bin Laden is vulnerable may make jihadists more determined to carry out attacks. "I'd be worried over the next 60 to 90 days," says a former FBI counterterrorism official. "I believe if we don't hear from al-Qaeda in the near term, some will paint bin Laden as weakened and unable to deliver on his threat"--a possibility that may motivate terrorists to try to strike soon, to make good on the promises of their leader.

The reappearance of bin Laden came at a moment when U.S. intelligence officials felt pretty good about themselves. Even as the cassette tape was making its way out of bin Laden's secret lair, his pursuers were sending out signals across the borderlands between Pakistan and Afghanistan, where he may be hiding. In recent weeks U.S. and Pakistani intelligence agencies have stepped up their search for top al-Qaeda leaders, with the skies above the mountains buzzing with spy planes and unmanned Predator drones, and a network of local spies and informants has been scouring the landscape for information. A Pakistani security officer told TIME the CIA has installed sophisticated surveillance equipment in several offices of the ISI, Pakistan's spy agency, to monitor any radio and Internet communications between al-Qaeda and its sympathizers.

The objective is to tighten the net around bin Laden and his deputies. In December a U.S. guided-missile attack in North Waziristan, based on intelligence from agents on the ground, reportedly killed Hamza Rabia, an Egyptian believed to have been the latest occupant of al-Qaeda's No. 3 spot. Then, in early January, the U.S. and Pakistan seized on the chance to bag even bigger prey. Details of the Damadola operation are beginning to emerge, and they provide a tantalizing glimpse into the intensifying hunt for bin Laden. A Peshawar-based official told TIME that in the past month, Pakistani-intelligence field agents had been tracking two groups of men who had crossed the border from Afghanistan into Bajaur, a small, often restive tribal region that borders Afghanistan's Kunar province. In the days before the attack, the search zoomed in on the group headed for Damadola; counterterrorist officials believed that some top al-Qaeda figures, including possibly al-Zawahiri himself, might have been in that group. "We knew there were going to be some VIPs, and any of those were worthy" targets, says a U.S. official.

The infiltrators sheltered in a small compound of three houses just outside Damadola. Shortly after 3 a.m. on Jan. 13, locals say, several missiles fired from Predators crashed into the compound, practically obliterating the houses. According to news reports, Pakistani officials initially said it was possible that al-Zawahiri had been killed, then backed away from the claim. Villagers told journalists who arrived at the scene that 18 civilians had died (the number was later revised down to 13); they denied that any bodies had been removed or that any foreigners had been in the compound. But some Pakistani intelligence officials began telling media outlets last week they believe as many as four leading terrorists, including al-Zawahiri's son-in-law and Abu Khabab al-Masri, a top al-Qaeda bombmaker, died in the strike. The U.S. is still uncertain if DNA was recovered from the scene to allow experts to positively identify any terrorists killed there or how the IDs were made. Pakistani Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz told TIME late last week that so far investigators have recovered only bodies of civilians, "but our security forces are there in large numbers to get the facts. These things just cannot evaporate and disappear, if there is anything."

Although the missile strike provoked a round of protests in Pakistan's tribal areas that forced President Pervez Musharraf to distance his government from the operation, cooperation between the U.S. and Pakistan in the hunt for bin Laden has quietly deepened. A Peshawar-based Pakistani intelligence official speaking on condition of anonymity says Washington has an understanding with Islamabad that allows the U.S. to strike within Pakistan's border regions--providing the Americans have actionable intelligence and especially if the Pakistanis won't or can't take firm action. Pakistan's caveat is that it would formally protest such strikes to deflect domestic criticism. Some ranking Pakistani officials deny such an agreement exists.

The territory in which bin Laden may be hiding remains forbidding to outsiders. In pockets of Pakistan's borderlands, a resurgent Taliban has begun to impose its extreme brand of Islamic law, including a ban on music and the Internet, and the summary execution of criminals. Some counterterrorism experts, though, are cautiously optimistic that the turmoil in al-Qaeda's high command they hope was caused by the strike in Damadola may force its leaders to expose themselves. "You got to presume that all the al-Qaeda guys are asking each other who got smoked," says a former U.S. intelligence official. "When they stick their heads up to see who got whacked, it presents opportunities."

While the hope of finding al-Qaeda's bosses anytime soon remains just that--hope--the hunters have shown indications that they may be closer to picking up their targets' scent. A Pakistani intelligence official says Pakistani intelligence agents and CIA drones are searching the mountainsides for the second group that crossed from Afghanistan. In the message delivered last week, bin Laden signaled he would not allow himself to be captured alive. "I swore that I will not die except free, despite the bitter taste of death," he said. On that much, both bin Laden and his pursuers seem to agree: one way or another, his end will come.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

A Tangled Web Woven (USNEWS)

By David E. Kaplan

U.S. News and World Report, January 23, 2006

The CIA's Center for the Study of Intelligence is one of the agency's most open branches. The in-house think tank sponsors studies on how to improve intelligence collection and analysis and publishes a respected journal, Studies in Intelligence. But since 2003, at least three unclassified CSI reports--all critical of the agency--have been withheld from the CIA's website, U.S. News has learned. During that same time, the agency has placed online three other CSI reports, all of those relatively positive or neutral.

Among the documents withheld: a tough 69-page report, "Curing Analytic Pathologies."The study, published quietly in December, argues that reform efforts have centralized authority but failed to change the intelligence community's core problem--"dysfunctional behaviors and practices within the individual agencies." A second report, "Analytic Culture in the U.S. Intelligence Community," was published last May and found the nation's intelligence analysts isolated and lacking overseas experience and training in research techniques. A third report, "Intelligence for a New Era in American Foreign Policy," from 2004, is the record of an unclassified conference of intelligence veterans, several of whom made comments sharply critical of the intelligence community.

The three reports are available through the CIA's public-affairs office, but only by mail, and one must know to ask for them. The CIA declined to say why the reports are not posted online nor would it provide a full list of the center's unclassified publications. "I find it baffling and bizarre to suggest we are not disseminating reports," says CIA spokeswoman Michelle Neff, "when the CSI independently mails out the final version of every unclassified finished paper." But some experts say it is the agency's response that is baffling. "This does not inspire confidence," says Steven Aftergood of the Federation of American Scientists.

TSA: Program May Use Fliers' Financial Data (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, January 23, 2006

A new program to speed travelers through airport security may require passengers to agree to a check of their personal and financial records, the Transportation Security Administration said.

The TSA said it will require "in-depth security background checks" that may involve "using commercial data" for people applying to the Registered Traveler program that starts in June. The checks will help verify people's identities to prove they have no ties to terrorism.

Commercial databases hold personal information from credit reports, property records, shopping histories and other records. TSA chief Kip Hawley said such data can be useful in flagging terrorists, who often won't appear in most U.S. commercial lists.

Business Travel Coalition Chairman Kevin Mitchell said the databases "are notoriously inaccurate" and could mistakenly label someone a terrorist. "It raises a huge liability issue," said Mitchell, who supports Registered Traveler.

The program will create reserved lanes for people who pass the background check and pay an annual fee, expected to be $80 to $100. Security requirements such as removing jackets and shoes will be lifted as approved passengers go through metal detectors.

Bill Connors, executive director of the National Business Travel Association, said some travelers are concerned.

"If you start asking for too much personal information, it's not worth it to me anymore," said Connors, another supporter of Registered Traveler.

Congress barred the TSA from using commercial data on airline passengers after a government probe criticized the agency last year for improperly storing 100 million records on travelers when it said no data storage would occur.

The TSA says the ban does not apply to Registered Traveler because the program is voluntary and the background checks would be done by companies at an airport. It would be the company that determines whether applicants pose a terrorist threat, TSA spokeswoman Amy von Walter said.

The TSA would approve background-check programs. Hawley, the TSA chief, said a background check must give "a high degree of confidence that an individual is not a terrorist."

"Using commercial data is one avenue," Hawley added.

A company running the only Registered Traveler program — at Orlando International Airport — recently experimented with giving applicants quizzes generated by commercial data to authenticate their identity.

However, the quizzes asked questions that were either too difficult, such as the year someone received their Social Security number, or so easy that "a terrorist … could pass the quiz on behalf of any person," according to a report by the company, Verified Identity Pass.

CEO Steven Brill said the company had success using document scanners to authenticate applicants' driver's licenses and passports. "There are other things we can do beyond that quiz," Brill said.

Private Airports Balk At Security (WT/AP)

By Stephen Manning, Associated Press

The Washington Times, January 22, 2006

Potomac Airfield in Fort Washington is small as airports go -- just one 2,600-foot runway used by light single- or twin-engine private planes.

Many pilots using it are recreational fliers, or those who want to go to Washington a few miles to the north.

The airport, which can even accommodate small private jets, isn't big enough to worry federal officials who fret over the use of planes to attack the District, according to owner David Wartofsky.

He compares its size to "an aircraft carrier, parked in a forest, at the bottom of a ravine in the most restrictive airspace in the world."

DOJ_NMG_0009993

But Potomac Airfield is one of three private airports that sit within a tightly controlled zone of airspace around Washington. And the Transportation Security Administration (TSA), which regulates security at the airport, doesn't appear to agree with Mr. Wartofsky that it is innocuous.

Late last year the agency shut down Potomac for nearly a month because of security violations.

Even as the TSA and other federal agencies weigh whether to make the restricted airspace zones permanent, Mr. Wartofsky and other private airport operators in the Washington region are pushing for changes in rules that they say unfairly punish harmless private pilots in an overzealous effort to protect Washington.

"My objective is to preserve the freedom of people who are not a threat," he said.

The federal government established a restricted flight zone over the capital after hijacked passenger jets were used to attack Washington and New York on September 11, 2001.

Made up of three, 60-mile wide overlapping rings that resemble Mickey Mouse ears on a map, the zones are meant to warn of any hostile plane that might be bearing down on Washington.

Private pilots can fly in the zones, but only under certain conditions.

In the Air Defense Identification Zone, or ADIZ, which forms much of the restricted air space, pilots must file a flight plan with the Federal Aviation Administration and use a special transponder code that allows air traffic controllers to identify them.

Security is tighter in the inner 15-mile Flight Restricted Zone, or FRZ, which sits directly over Washington. Private pilots who wish to fly within those areas must get a background check, along with using the special code and filing a flight plan.

The measure was initially temporary, but the FAA is weighing whether to make it a permanent regulation and is taking public comment through Feb. 6.

Most private pilots, who could face fines or suspension of their licenses for violating the air space, don't want the zones to stay. The FAA has received more than 20,000 comments on the proposal.

At an FAA-sponsored public forum at Washington Dulles International Airport, Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association President Phil Boyer implored federal officials, urged the FAA "not to take a bad idea and make it permanent."

FAA spokeswoman Laura Brown said the agency will review the comments before making a decision on the restricted zones. She did not know when the FAA would act.

The airports with arguably the most at stake in the decision are the "D.C. Three," including Potomac Airfield, that sit inside the highly restrictive inner zone. The other two are College Park Airport and Washington Executive/Hyde Field.

Chertoff's Wake (LEGALT)

By Jason McLure, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 23, 2006

After a rocky year, things are looking brighter for some protégés of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

On Jan. 4, President George W. Bush granted a recess appointment to Julie Myers, making the 36-year-old former Chertoff chief of staff the head of Homeland Security's 15,000-employee Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Just a day earlier, Alice Fisher, Chertoff's former deputy at the Justice Department who now heads the DOJ's Criminal Division, had been on national television touting the guilty plea federal prosecutors had extracted from Jack Abramoff.

That guilty plea had been won by a team of career prosecutors supervised by Noel Hillman, the head of the DOJ's public integrity section who was first hired by Chertoff as a federal prosecutor during Chertoff's tenure as U.S. attorney in New Jersey.

On the surface it would seem that Myers, Fisher, and Hillman, among others, have basked in the reflected glory of Chertoff, who once enjoyed, by Washington standards, a stainless reputation as a straight-shooting, mob-busting, former prosecutor turned general in the war on terror.

But Hurricane Katrina dented Chertoff's armor, leading critics to call into question his leadership at the DHS. And criticism of the response to Katrina as well as terror policies promulgated under Chertoff during his time at Justice has also tarred his understudies — some of whom were forced to claim their positions through the back door of presidential recess appointments.

Their successes — and their travails — provide a window into how one lawyer's high-flying career in public service can both open doors for and complicate the lives of his loyal aides and assistants.

"When people get into positions of power, they tend to bring in people they know," says Michael Greenberger, a former Clinton-era DOJ official who now runs the Center for Health and Homeland Security at the University of Maryland. "The question is the competency of those people."

ALL IN THE FAMILY

The top rungs of Justice and the Department of Homeland Security are crowded with lawyers who've worked with Chertoff in a number of his previous jobs: as a federal prosecutor in New Jersey, as a partner at Latham & Watkins in New Jersey, as counsel to the Senate committee investigating the Clintons, and as the assistant attorney general overseeing the DOJ's Criminal Division.

Some have had an easier time in their roles than others. Myers perhaps suffered the most by her association with the post-Katrina Chertoff.

Myers and Chertoff both worked on the Whitewater investigation; Chertoff was special counsel to the Senate, and later Myers was a junior lawyer in independent counsel Kenneth Starr's office. After brief stints as an assistant U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of New York and at the Treasury Department, Myers became Chertoff's chief of staff in November 2002, during his tenure as assistant attorney general in charge of the DOJ's Criminal Division.

She then left the DOJ just 10 months later, after Chertoff won confirmation as a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 3rd Circuit, in the summer of 2003.

But when Chertoff returned to the Bush administration last year, he hadn't forgotten Myers, who had job-hopped from Justice to the Commerce Department to the White House's personnel office.

Her confirmation hearings couldn't have come at a tougher time. It was Sept. 15, 2005, and the political winds stirred up by Homeland Security's botched response to Hurricane Katrina were still blowing through Congress. Three days earlier, Michael Brown had resigned in disgrace as director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, and Congress and the media were on the hunt for underqualified Bush administration cronies.

Myers fit the bill. Nominated to become head of the federal government's second-largest investigative agency, Myers had virtually no experience in immigration policy and a thin record of management of any sort. (Myers was unavailable for an interview. A spokesman for her office issued a statement saying, "She has great respect for Michael Chertoff and is extremely proud of her work with him.") And it couldn't have helped that the other DHS nominee before the Senate committee was Stewart Baker, an older and deeply experienced Washington lawyer and policy-maker who is now assistant secretary for policy at the department.

"I think we ought to have a meeting with [DHS Secretary] Mike Chertoff, either privately or publicly, to ask him why he particularly . . . thinks you're qualified for the job," Sen. George Voinovich (R-Ohio) told Myers, with her parents, her fiancé, and her future in-laws looking on from the audience. "Because based on the résumé, I don't think you are."

But Voinovich had hit on Myers' ace in the hole. Chertoff would not only speak privately with Voinovich but, according to one of the senator's aides, would play a key role in persuading the senator to back her nomination. When Bush bypassed the Senate to give Myers a controversial recess appointment over the holidays, there was nary a protest from the normally independent-minded Voinovich. "He believes she has the potential to be a good manager," says Marcie Ridgway, Voinovich's press secretary.

If Myers' credentials aren't impeccable, her connections certainly are. She is the niece of Gen. Richard Myers, the former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Upon taking the helm at the DHS, Chertoff tapped her then-fiance (now husband), John Wood, who was once an aide to former Attorney General John Ashcroft, to be his chief of staff.

But Myers is far from the only government lawyer whose career has taken off after working for Chertoff. There's also Alice Fisher, who worked with Chertoff on the Whitewater investigation. After Fisher left the Senate committee, she joined Latham & Watkins, Chertoff's old firm. She became a partner at the firm in 2001, just as Chertoff tapped her to become one of five deputy assistants at the Criminal Division.

When Chertoff left to join the federal bench in 2003, Fisher returned to private practice at Latham. But when Chertoff returned to the administration last year, Fisher, 38, was nominated to take his old job leading DOJ's 500-lawyer Criminal Division. (Fisher declined an interview request for this article.) That nomination was both helped and hindered by her ties to Chertoff and his tenure at Justice.

Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), in his introduction of Fisher, went out of his way to point out that "Secretary Chertoff, who's worked closely with her over the years, has called her, quote, 'one of the best lawyers I've seen in my entire career.' "

But the Criminal Division's record under Chertoff and Fisher was far from flawless. After the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Justice was criticized for ordering the roundup and incarceration of hundreds of Muslims in the United States. The department was also embarrassed after it was forced to drop the much-touted 2003 convictions of members of an alleged Detroit terror cell amid allegations of prosecutorial misconduct.

And one of the Criminal Division's signature successes in the area of white-collar crime during Chertoff's tenure — the 2002 conviction of accounting firm Arthur Andersen for obstruction of justice — was later overturned by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Fisher and Chertoff's role in crafting some of the more controversial legal aspects of the Bush administration's war on terror also proved thorny. Ultimately, Fisher's confirmation was blocked in the Senate by Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), over questions about her connections to legal policies used to justify the harsh treatment of foreign detainees.

In response, Bush granted Fisher a recess appointment, using the same constitutional provision that allowed him to appoint Myers without Senate approval. And, as with Myers, Fisher's husband is no stranger to Chertoff. W. Clinton Fisher III is currently a senior adviser for aviation policy at the DHS' Transportation Security Administration.

Although Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) criticized Alice Fisher at the time of her nomination for having no prosecutorial experience and a thin trial record, her short tenure atop the Criminal Division has been marked by its success in winning guilty pleas from Abramoff and his former associate Michael Scanlon in the ongoing congressional corruption probe. One of the career DOJ attorneys supervising the 18-month investigation is Hillman, 49, the section chief of the public integrity division who followed Chertoff to Washington.

LENGTHY COATTAILS

Those close to Chertoff's inner circle are quick to credit the success of his protégés to their individual skills as much as to their relationship with the Cabinet secretary. "I think relatively talented people have gravitated to him over the years and want to learn at the knee of the master," says David Sandstedt, who worked under Chertoff at Justice and at Latham and is now a plaintiffs attorney in New York. "He takes his mentoring role very seriously and likes to see people learn and ultimately succeed."

Beyond Myers, Fisher, and Hillman, Chertoff's family tree within the federal government includes a number of other successful lawyers who regularly keep in contact, according to a number of lawyers who have worked with Chertoff. They include:

• Philip Perry: The career of the son-in-law of Vice President Dick Cheney has in many ways mirrored Chertoff's over the past decade. Also a former partner at Latham & Watkins, he worked on the Whitewater investigation with Chertoff and joined the DOJ after Bush's election in 2000. After stints at the Office of Management and Budget and back at Latham, Perry joined Chertoff at the DHS last year as the department's general counsel.

• John Elwood: First hired as a counsel to Chertoff in the Criminal Division, Elwood became an assistant solicitor general and argued several cases before the Supreme Court. He's now deputy assistant attorney general at Justice's Office of Legal Counsel, the office charged with providing the legal justification for the president's authorization of warrantless eavesdropping.

• Laura Parsky: She was brought to the Criminal Division by Chertoff and is now a deputy assistant attorney general overseeing computer crimes and child exploitation. Parsky is the daughter of high-flying investment banker Gerald Parsky, the California state chairman of the 2004 Bush-Cheney campaign who was once considered a candidate for Treasury secretary.

• David Nahmias: Hired for the DOJ by Chertoff, he became a deputy assistant attorney general under Chertoff's successor, Christopher Wray. He's now U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Georgia in Atlanta.

• Eric Jaso: A former Latham associate under Chertoff in New Jersey, he worked as a lawyer in Chertoff's office at the DOJ. Jaso is now an assistant U.S. attorney in New Jersey and is rumored to be in line for an appointment to the federal bench.

• Matthew Martens: Another former Latham associate who followed Chertoff to Washington, he is now a federal prosecutor in Charlotte, N.C., and remains close to Chertoff, having dined with him in Charlotte last summer.

• Scott Weber: A former partner at Latham, he is now a lawyer in Chertoff's office at the DHS.

• Sigal Mandelker: Though she turned down a summer associate offer from Latham (she chose Covington & Burling), Mandelker made her way into Chertoff's inner circle at Justice through the DOJ's honors program and is now a lawyer in Chertoff's DHS office.

Oklahoma City Moves Past Its Infamous Bombing (CSM)

By Kris Axtman

The Christian Science Monitor, January 23, 2006

HOUSTON - It's hard for many in Oklahoma City to remember a time when they didn't know the names Tim and Terry, the two angry men who killed 168 people - and changed the city's collective consciousness - by parking a two-ton bomb of farm fertilizer and fuel oil in front of the Alfred P. Murrah federal building in 1995.

But as time goes on, wounds heal, memories fade, and hearts soften. At some point in the past decade, Oklahoma City began to look forward instead of back.

That may be the reason why Michael Fortier's release from prison Friday after serving more than a decade for his role in the bombing sent relatively few ripples through the community.

While it's painful to learn of his freedom, some say, their lives no longer revolve around the details of that April day. Their city, in many ways, has been freed from its own prison - through prayer and urban renewal.

"Oklahoma City is a different city, completely, than it was in 1995," says Bob Spinks, president of United Way of Central Oklahoma in Oklahoma City. "There is a lot of urban revitalization going on that has created excitement, lots of new venues downtown, and the economy has been doing well here. So all of this mitigates the Fortier news a little bit."

Indeed, Oklahoma City has flourished since the bombing a decade ago. In addition to a new federal building, there are two sports stadiums, a performing-arts center, a central library, a "River Walk"- style canal in the hip Bricktown district, and a trolley linking everything.

Officials say the bombing - at the time, the worst terrorist attack in US history - galvanized residents and created a sense of pride about the city. That, in turn, fueled the urban progress.

"It has been over 10 years and a lot has happened since then," says John Call, a forensic psychologist and president of Crisis Management Consultants in Oklahoma City. The fact that Mr. Fortier's release got very little attention, says Dr. Call, proved to him that the city's residents are in the latter stages of healing - having moved beyond emotional acceptance to reconstruction of their lives. "It's not something that's talked about anymore," he says.

That's not to say that the attack has been forgotten.

Take Jim Denny, for instance. His two children were in the building's day-care center when the explosion occurred and they still suffer from injuries.

But he is unaffected by Fortier's release. "I have absolutely no problem with him getting out of jail. He was a key witness in both [the Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols] trials and, according to the juries, he was the one that basically sewed up their convictions. I say, he's served his time and he should be allowed to try to put his life back together."

The government will not confirm whether Fortier and his family will go into the federal Witness Protection Program, and survivors and relatives of the victims were provided few details when they were sent notices of his release last week. "They didn't give us a lot of advanced notice, and won't tell us what is going to happen to him," says Ken Thompson, who lost his mother in the bombing. "So it's a difficult time for us." But, he says, "most people understand that without its star witness, the government would not have gotten guilty verdicts. So to some degree, he has paid his debt to society."

Fortier received a 12-year sentence in exchange for testifying against Mr. McVeigh and Mr. Nichols, and has served 85 percent of it. He and his wife, Lori, had advance knowledge of the plot to bomb the federal building after McVeigh - an old Army buddy - stopped by their home in Kingman, Ariz., and told them about it, he testified in court.

He also helped McVeigh steal and transport weapons that helped finance the scheme and was shown the target. He has apologized repeatedly for not alerting authorities and said he did not think McVeigh would go ahead with the plot.

"I deeply regret not taking the information I had to the police," he said at the time of his sentencing. "I sometimes daydream that I did do this and became a hero, but the reality is that I am not."

That Fortier will have to live with what he did is of little comfort to those who don't want him out of prison.

"I thought I was about over my anger, and I found out Tuesday evening from the Bureau of Prisons that I have a long way to go," says Jannie Coverdale, whose two grandchildren died inside the federal building's day care. She was their primary caregiver. "I have tried so hard to get over this anger and now I find out that Fortier is going to be hugging his kids again - when he helped take ours away. How is that justice?"

Patients Needing Care Overwhelm New Orleans's Hospital System (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 18 - The emergency rooms of this bedraggled region are facing their own emergency. As thousands of residents have begun returning in the weeks since New Year's, there are far more sick people than there are doctors, nurses, beds and equipment to take care of them.

The slow repopulation of the city picked up speed after the holidays as more schools reopened and, in the words of one emergency room doctor, the sicker people began to return. But only seven of what had been 15 adult acute-care facilities in the city and three surrounding parishes are open, and only one-third of the acute-care beds.

Hundreds or perhaps thousands of doctors and nurses never returned to New Orleans after the flood; long-term and psychiatric hospitals, not to mention hospices and rehabilitation centers, are now almost nonexistent in and around the city.

As a result, the returning residents have filled the functioning hospitals in and immediately around the city to capacity and beyond. Waiting times in emergency rooms have extended to as much as six hours, medical personnel at three hospitals reported.

Early one recent morning, doctors and nurses at East Jefferson General Hospital in Metairie, just outside of New Orleans, were already caring for five seriously ill or injured patients in the emergency room - because the hospital had no more beds to admit them to - while still managing a full load of incoming emergency patients near the entrance. Then two trauma victims from a car accident were brought in, followed by someone showing signs of appendicitis.

The staff had to "play musical chairs" with the accident victims and remaining patients to find everyone a bed and care for them, said Cheryl Carter, the nurse who directs emergency care.

"That's pretty much every day, pretty much every hospital," Ms. Carter said. "The waiting rooms look like a war center or a MASH unit. We look for more and more different ways to manage emergencies."

The city's sickest residents were among the first to leave New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina and should be the last to return, but that is not happening, said Dr. John Wales, chairman of the department of emergency medicine at East Jefferson, which for days has had more patients than it has beds. "I think they're coming back and the doctors who took care of them are not around," he said.

The Touro Infirmary is the only full-service hospital now functioning within the New Orleans city limits, and the lack of beds in the city has pushed patients to suburban hospitals like East Jefferson and filled them up. (Children's Hospital is also open in the city.) The situation is likely to get worse as flu season, which usually begins around late January here, hits its stride.

The thought of next month's Mardi Gras festivities has local doctors so worried they have formed a committee just to plan for care during the first large-scale, signature event in the distorted post-hurricane world. Dr. Jullette Saussy, who runs the 911 emergency medical service for the City of New Orleans, said that during Mardi Gras, the number of ambulance calls typically tripled, from an average of 120 a day to 360.

"There's a resource problem right now," said Dr. Peter DeBlieux, who heads the emergency department of Charity Hospital, a venerable institution for the city's poor, which no longer has a building and is operating out of Air Force tents in a far corner of the convention center. Patients with broken arms, he said, have at times been referred to Houma and Baton Rouge, cities that are, respectively, 50 and 80 miles away.

Five hospitals in the city, severely damaged by the storm, have been unable to reopen, including the Medical Center of Louisiana, the only Level 1 trauma center on the Gulf Coast, which is a combination of Charity and nearby University Hospital.

Some hospitals have opened neighborhood clinics or parking-lot tents for walk-in care, but some may never reopen, or may take up to a year to find the money to rebuild. The state wants to replace Charity, and its planned renovations to University Hospital could take several months or up to a year.

The city's rebuilding commission said in a report this week that if 65 percent of the region's prestorm population returns by July 1 - as many experts have predicted - the city will need to triple the number of hospital beds available, which would require hiring 2,550 medical staff members in less than six months and an "extraordinary expense" in housing them and paying them enough to return.

Cynthia Matherne, the designated regional coordinator for emergency management in an area that includes New Orleans and the parishes of Jefferson, St. Bernard and Plaquemines, said the problem of limited medical resources put pressure on emergency rooms from all directions.

"The problems we have are multiple," she said. Ordinarily, patients who have been stabilized after an emergency episode are gradually moved out to long-term acute care, rehabilitation or psychiatric facilities.

"But these have not reopened," Ms. Matherne said. "So all the psych patients end up being held in the E.R.'s. And when you're trying to discharge patients, there's no long-term care to discharge them to. There's no discharge to hospice care because there's none available." Home health aides are virtually nonexistent, she added.

"Hospitals are confronted with the question: How you are going to discharge these people?" Ms. Matherne said.

Dr. Saussy, of the New Orleans medical emergency response office, described a parallel problem among the ambulance units in the city. Because only Touro, with 273 beds, and Children's Hospital, with 125 beds, are open, city ambulances must often go to the three hospitals in nearby Jefferson Parish - East Jefferson General (444 beds), West Jefferson Medical Center (330 beds) and Ochsner Clinic Foundation (350 beds, expanding soon to 484).

"We have to wait hours to offload a patient," Dr. Saussy said. "That means we're not going to have that unit available to answer the next 911 call."

Ms. Matherne said the number of acute-care beds in the four parishes before the storm was 5,063, with an average of 4,083 filled each day. "Right now we're right at about 1,750 beds," she added.

Charity Hospital, once a magnet for some of the most severe medical emergencies - and for patients least likely to have insurance - is shuttered, leaving a jury-rigged emergency room under tents within the convention center. Dr. DeBlieux said 100 to 200 patients a day arrived with complaints ranging from major trauma or strokes to breaks and sprains.

Psychiatric patients are now being sent to emergency rooms unused to them. "We are overwhelmed with urban psychiatric patients we wouldn't have seen," said Dr. Joseph S. Guarisco, the chairman of emergency medicine at Ochsner.

Charity's lease at the convention center runs out in a few weeks, and the hospital is making plans to move its emergency room to another hospital building in Jefferson Parish.

In the early weeks after Hurricane Katrina, military medical units from the Army, Navy and Air Force set up temporary medical facilities around the city and helped with everything from diabetes to births to immunizations, but most of these units are gone.

For patients, a medical emergency usually means a long wait, unless it is life-threatening. Ben Cohen, who is 28 and lives in the Midcity neighborhood, started to have intense abdominal pain on Jan. 15 and spent four hours in the Touro emergency room before he was admitted. While there, he watched the single doctor on duty cope with a shooting victim and two trauma cases from a car accident.

"To their credit," Mr. Cohen said, "they did as good a job as they could have."

Dr. Wales at East Jefferson, like other emergency room directors, is trying to get more staff members to come back, particularly nurses and technicians and orderlies. "The issues include getting your existing staff a place to live," he said. "But they can't come back because there is no place. They won't come back without their families."

DOJ_NMG_0009999

Dr. Wales added, "At many levels, the disaster continues to unfold."

Post-Katrina Inquiry Likely To Need New Expert Coroner Helping In Investigation Of La. Hospital Deaths Indicted (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, January 23, 2006

Louisiana authorities investigating whether patients were euthanized at New Orleans-area hospitals after Hurricane Katrina probably will appoint a new medical consultant because the Pennsylvania coroner assisting the inquiry was indicted on federal charges Friday.

Kris Wartelle, spokeswoman for Louisiana Attorney General Charles Foti, said the indictment of coroner Cyril Wecht will not slow the state inquiry into more than 200 deaths at hospitals and nursing homes after Katrina hit Aug. 29. However, the 84-count indictment that accuses Wecht of using his position as Allegheny County, Pa., coroner to support his consulting business probably will lead to the appointment of "another expert" to review toxicology reports in the Louisiana inquiry, Wartelle said.

The investigation is examining whether any of the 64 patients who died at Memorial and Lindy Boggs hospitals were euthanized to end their suffering, and whether dozens of residents who died at nursing homes were mistreated or neglected. Last month, Wecht gave Louisiana investigators an analysis of toxicology tests in the hospital deaths. He and Louisiana officials have declined to comment on the report. Foti has said his inquiry is nearing a conclusion.

The indictment against Wecht, who has been involved in several high-profile death investigations across the country, comes as New Orleans District Attorney Eddie Jordan prepares to impanel a grand jury that will launch its own review of the hospital deaths.

Jordan said he is moving forward with his investigation and that it is too early to assess the impact of Wecht's involvement in the Louisiana inquiry. "We don't know what his findings were, and we don't know what the attorney general has found," Jordan said.

Wecht's work in Louisiana was not addressed in the indictment, which among other things accuses him of trading unclaimed bodies at the Allegheny County morgue to a local university's research program in exchange for laboratory space to expand his consulting business.

Mary Beth Buchanan, the U.S. attorney in Pittsburgh, said in court papers that from 1997 to 2004, Wecht's business, Wecht Pathology, made nearly $9 million. Wecht's share of that was estimated at $4.6 million, the indictment says.

"Cyril Wecht abused the position, authority and resources of the Allegheny County Coroner's Office to obtain money, property, services and other items of value for his personal benefit," Buchanan said.

Wecht has resigned from his position with Allegheny County, said his attorney Mark Rush.

"I would hope that (the indictment) would not be an issue" in the Louisiana investigation, Rush said.

The Louisiana investigation is looking into whether staff members at Memorial and Lindy Boggs administered lethal doses of morphine or other drugs to alleviate the suffering of critically ill patients whose conditions deteriorated when floodwaters swamped the city and power failures shut down the hospitals.

Forty-five people died at Memorial Hospital; 19 died at Lindy Boggs. Tenet Healthcare, which operates both hospitals, has said there was no wrongdoing and that it is cooperating with the investigation. Tenet declined to comment on Wecht's role in the inquiry.

Hurricane Refugees Demand Better Schools, Strong Levees (WT)

The Washington Times, January 23, 2006

ATLANTA (AP) -- Hurricane refugees from Louisiana told federal and state officials at forums across the South yesterday that what they want most when their state is rebuilt is affordable housing, better schools and stronger levees.

Some refugees at the "Louisiana Speaks" forums also worried that officials have no real plans to restore certain areas, such as New Orleans' impoverished Lower 9th Ward.

"This (forum) is a good idea," Tereece Johnson, 40, said at the event in Atlanta. "But is it going to accomplish something? I can't say."

Most of the 30 forums -- sponsored by the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Louisiana Recovery Authority -- were held in Louisiana. Six were held in Atlanta, Houston and four other cities where tens of thousands of Louisiana residents fled. Input from the forums will be incorporated in a long-term regional plan for rebuilding South Louisiana after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

But some were not yet ready to talk about the future.

"You're talking about rebuilding?" said Denise Herbert, 47 at the forum in Atlanta. "I want somebody to tell me where my mother is now," referring to 82-year-old Ethel Anna Herbert, who went missing more than five months ago.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, who was at the Atlanta forum, talked to Miss Herbert and other refugees, who wanted help with immediate needs such as rental assistance and counseling.

"We have to do a combination of all of that," Mrs. Blanco said. "We have to take care of the immediate needs now, and we have to work for the future. And that has to be done simultaneously."

Many refugees said the availability of affordable housing will make or break their decision to return to New Orleans.

"I'd like to go back -- if I can get suitable housing," said Joseph Howard, 48, a hospital housekeeping worker who had to flee his rented house in midtown New Orleans.

Housing and transportation were major issues for two dozen refugees who attended the meeting held in Amite, La., a small community about 75 miles north of New Orleans.

"If we do decide to go back to New Orleans, will the rent go down?" said Sabrina Lee, a 25-year-old who can no longer afford the Uptown New Orleans place she rented before the storm.

However, the most pressing concern raised at the meetings in Louisiana involved flood control.

"Before we can make any decisions, we have to have answers on the levees," said Antoinette Harrell-Miller, who is unsure whether she'll return to the city.

In Houston, Gina Dupart said she was cautious about the value of yesterday's forum.

"We made a decision to come here to put our input in. We hope that it will be used to make [New Orleans] better in the rebuilding process. We didn't come here just to waste time," said Miss Dupart, 41.

WAR NEWS:

By Opting To Invade Iraq, George W. Bush Was Following In The Footsteps Of History (USNEWS)

By Michael Barone

U.S. News and World Report, January 23, 2006

America is attacked. The president addresses Congress in stirring terms. Senators and representatives, with a few eccentric exceptions, vote for a declaration of war, and the overwhelming majority of the people support the war effort without stint. The president appoints sterling generals and admirals and superintends massive war production. American troops surge to victory, and peace is made.

This is the picture we have of the way America, and American presidents, go to war. It comports with what we think happened in World War I and, especially, in World War II. In this view of U.S. history, American presidents lead the nation only into wars that are forced upon them.

There's only one problem. This picture is almost entirely contrary to the facts.

Critics of George W. Bush like to say that Iraq was a war of choice--a conflict that could have been avoided. But almost all American wars have been, to a greater or lesser degree, wars of choice. It is said that Bush went to war in Iraq without sufficient forces, without a game plan for the occupation, and without an exit strategy. Even if all those charges are true, then he has plenty of company in American history.

For generations, presidents have wrestled with the difficult decision to lead the nation into war. Woodrow Wilson chose to bring the United States into World War I when he could have acquiesced to Germany's demand that we stop trading with Britain and France. Franklin Roosevelt, beginning in 1939, took daring and controversial decisions--starting with his sending massive aid to Britain and the Soviet Union against Nazi Germany--knowing they raised a grave risk that Germany or Japan would attack.

Military success was rarely guaranteed. In the early 1800s,the American military was small, and usually outnumbered. So there were practical limits on the president's ability to exercise his powers. Spurred by young "war hawks"like Henry Clay and John C. Calhoun, James Madison asked Congress for 10,000 troops to fight the British in 1811. Then, a year later, he imposed an embargo on trade and got Congress to vote, far from unanimously, to go to war. Madison's ability to prosecute the War of 1812 was so limited he was unable to prevent the burning of the White House and the Capitol.

Pirates of the Barbary Coast. Both the president and the American people had to learn that, in wartime, patience is definitely a virtue. Typically, the field of battle was far from Washington, and until the telegraph allowed Abraham Lincoln to communicate in real time with his generals, presidents learned of the course of battle only weeks or months later. In 1801, Thomas Jefferson sent the Navy and the Marines to take on the Barbary pirates, who were enslaving American merchants and demanding tribute. His ships set sail for the Barbary Coast in June 1801 but didn't complete their mission until September 1805.

The rationale for a war, then as now, was not always clear-cut. In 1846, James K. Polk started the war with Mexico by claiming, with murky evidence at best, that Mexican forces had crossed the Nueces River and "shed American blood on American soil." The treaty ending that war gave us more than half of Mexico's territory, including Texas and California.

As for the Civil War, almost no one anticipated its outbreak, course, and outcome. Only a few thought it would be a long war, notably William Tecumseh Sherman. While teaching at a military college in Louisiana in 1859, he wrote, "All here talk as if a dissolution of the Union were not only a possibility but a probability of easy execution. If attempted we will have Civil War of the most horrible kind." Abraham Lincoln had no such foresight. In his second inaugural, in March 1865, he admitted, "Neither party expected for the war the magnitude or the duration which it has already attained."

Nor did Lincoln seem to have a clear military strategy when the war began. He walked over to the War Department every day to read the latest telegraph dispatches and went through one general after another until he settled on Sherman and Ulysses S. Grant. And he did meet with resistance: Lincoln's Democratic opponents called for a compromise peace with the South, retaining slavery, or even letting the Confederacy go. In the summer of 1864 Lincoln seemed sure to be defeated for re-election. But Grant's advance through Virginia and siege of Petersburg and Sherman's capture of Atlanta and March to the Sea across Georgia convinced northern voters that the Union was on the road to victory. Lincoln was re-elected by a 55 to 45 percent margin. What were his plans for rebuilding the Union? After his assassination (five days after Robert E. Lee's surrender), no one knew.

Post-Civil War, America's appetite for military action seemed sated. The Army policed much of the South during Reconstruction until 1877 and fought against the Plains Indians. The Navy was largely scrapped; in the 1880s it was ranked 12th in the world, behind Turkey's and Sweden's. But America ceased to look inward in 1890, when the Census Bureau declared that the frontier had been closed and when Navy Capt. Alfred Thayer Mahan's The Influence of Sea Power Upon History focused American leaders' attentions abroad.

Rough Riders. A young New York politician and author named Theodore Roosevelt was one who looked beyond America's borders. At 38, he wangled an appointment as assistant secretary of the Navy. President William McKinley, a Civil War veteran and canny politician, had no eagerness for war. Roosevelt did. When the battleship Maine blew up in Havana harbor in February 1898, there was an outcry for war with Spain, which had been brutally suppressing a colonial rebellion in Cuba. Ten days later, when Navy Secretary John Long left the office after lunch, Assistant Secretary Roosevelt did an end run: He wrote out orders positioning the American fleet for battle with Spanish forces in Cuba and its Pacific colony of the Philippines. Long was unnerved but didn't reverse the orders. So the Navy was ready to go on the attack in April, when McKinley sent a war message to Congress and war was declared. The Spanish fleet was defeated in Manila harbor on May 1; Cuba was blockaded, and America won land and sea battles July 3 at Santiago Harbor and San Juan Hill (where Roosevelt led his Rough Riders in a well-publicized charge). Puerto Rico was invaded on July 25. A peace protocol was signed on August 13.

In retrospect, the military course of this war seems the most predictable of all of America's major wars--the Spanish fleet was decrepit, the American fleet was well positioned to fight, and the major problem was logistical, getting the Army down to

Tampa and then to Cuba. Yet the war led to unpredicted and controversial military deployments. A major insurrection in the Philippines wasn't finally put down until 1902. A treaty giving the United States supervisory control over Cuba resulted in U.S. military occupation. And the country was not unanimously pro-war. Scholars, business moguls, and Democrats in the 1900 presidential campaign denounced American "imperialism."

The first three presidents to serve entirely in the 20th century--Theodore Roosevelt, William Howard Taft, and Woodrow Wilson--proclaimed that the United States had special responsibilities in the Western Hemisphere, and they dispatched troops accordingly. They saw the United States as a world power--with the world's largest economy, the largest population of any major power but Russia, and, by 1908, one of its largest navies. Which inevitably raised the question: When World War I broke out in Europe, in 1914, would the United States stand by or take part?

Wilson's instinct was to hold back. He sent his unofficial envoy, Col. Edward House, to Europe with proposals for peace. In a country reluctant to engage in a European caldron, Wilson ran for re-election in 1916 as "the man who has kept us out of war." But in January 1917 the Germans announced that their submarines would conduct unrestricted warfare against neutral, i.e., U.S., ships, and in February Wilson made public a telegram intercepted by British intelligence from the German foreign minister promising Mexico that it would get Arizona, New Mexico, and Texas if it entered the war against the United States. "It is a fearful thing to lead this great peaceful people into war," Wilson told Congress in April. But the stakes were great. "The world," Wilson intoned, "must be made safe for democracy."

Congress, with only minor dissent, agreed. The Senate voted 82 to 6 for war, the House 373 to 50. Still, large blocs of voters opposed the war--Progressives from the heavily German- and Scandinavian-American Upper Midwest, Socialists in New York and other big cities. Wilson responded with the sharpest suppression of free speech since the Civil War, and many critics of American involvement soon found themselves in jail. The railroads and shipping industry were also quickly nationalized--a degree of government control greater than in any later American war.

Unready, unset, go. The United States entered what was then called the Great War with military forces plainly insufficient for the struggle. It had virtually no air force. The Navy was far from combat readiness. An army of more than 1 million men was yet to be raised. It took time to assemble and transport the American expeditionary force, which did not come into play militarily until spring 1918, a year after the declaration of war. But under the leadership of Gen. John Pershing, U.S. troops performed well in key battles. By the fall of 1918, German forces were collapsing. An armistice was negotiated to take effect on 11:11 a.m. on November 11, the day we still celebrate as Veterans Day.

It was after the Great Depression and the election of Franklin Roosevelt, in 1932, that American policy entered its most isolationist phase. Roosevelt torpedoed the London financial conference in 1933, acquiesced in the passage of a Neutrality Act in 1935, and reduced military spending from the already low levels of the 1920s. But he also paid heed to what was happening in Europe. Roosevelt could understand German, and listening to Hitler's radio broadcasts, he developed at some point in the 1930s--by the time of the Munich agreement in September 1938 at the latest, his admiring biographer Conrad Black argues--the idea that the United States could not live with Nazi Germany.

Most Americans did not share that conviction; neither did some of Roosevelt's own appointees. That hardly deterred Roosevelt, however. Using his powers as chief executive, he increased military spending from hundreds of millions of dollars in 1938 to $6 billion in 1941. He instituted a military draft in an election year. He bypassed the Neutrality Act by providing destroyers to Britain in 1940. He declared the North Atlantic up to Iceland American territorial waters. He sped aid to the Soviet Union when Hitler's Germany attacked. And he cut off oil shipments to Japan. Tokyo responded by attacking Pearl Harbor on Dec.7, 1941. Four days later, Hitler declared war on the United States.

Roosevelt could say that World War II was not a war of choice. Yet the choices he made before Pearl Harbor certainly helped to provoke an attack, and they were choices that his political opponents bitterly condemned.

"Absolute victory." Despite Roosevelt's preparations, the United States entered this war, as it had most wars, without sufficient forces or even a coherent, workable military strategy. Nor was there a clear idea of what the endpoint would be--beyond Roosevelt's assurance in his speech to Congress on December 8 that "the American people, in their righteous might, will win through to absolute victory."

At that moment, it was far from clear how victory would be achieved. The Pacific Fleet was gravely injured (though the aircraft carriers, luckily, were safe at sea); the Philippines were indefensible (as Roosevelt admitted in a fireside chat in February 1942); the weak British and Dutch forces seemed unlikely to stop Japan from sweeping through East Asia and what now is Indonesia and establishing bases from which they could threaten, as they did, India and Australia; Hitler's Army was at the gates of Moscow and was sweeping into the oil fields of the Caucasus, while Nazi forces were poised to sweep across Egypt and occupy the oil fields of the Middle East.

The picture seemed dismal for the United States and its Allies. The U.S. military was still being expanded, and in initial battles, especially in North Africa, its forces proved poorly trained and commanded. War production had been vastly expanded since 1940, but Roosevelt's goals seemed wholly unrealistic to many, and the newspapers were full of stories of bottlenecks and snafus. Not until June 1942, at the Battle of Midway, did the United States win a significant military victory, and that was closely fought.

Roosevelt did a masterful job, however, better than any other president, far better than Lincoln, of selecting the right commanders for the right tasks early on--Gen. John Marshall for organizing the Army, Adm. Ernest King for directing the Navy, Gen. Douglas MacArthur for the Pacific Theater, Gen. Dwight Eisenhower for the European Theater, and Gen. Matthew Arnold for the Army Air Force. He also did a masterful job, though the work often seemed chaotic, of organizing war production and producing tanks, airplanes, and ships in numbers far greater than almost anyone thought possible.

But plans changed, operations took longer than expected, troops early on performed below expectations, and materiel and equipment were not always plentiful or optimally functional. In the European Theater, the great brunt of casualties was borne by the Soviet Union, and it was possible in 1941 and 1942 that it would collapse. Roosevelt and Winston Churchill feared until nearly the end that Stalin might make a separate peace with Hitler as he had in August 1939. In the Pacific Theater, the fierce resistance of Japanese troops and the kamikaze attacks of 1944-45 made forward progress exceedingly costly in casualties.

As late as the summer of 1945, some military leaders hesitated to recommend invasion of Japan's home islands because they expected the cost to be 1 million American lives. And even after the atomic bombs exploded at Hiroshima and Nagasaki in August 1945, Japan's emperor had to persuade the military to surrender.

Neither Roosevelt nor Truman in 1945 had plans for what turned out to be the Cold War. The United States was now the world's prime military power. But Truman swiftly demobilized the forces, as public opinion demanded, and the draft was dropped. By 1949, the Soviets had their own atomic bomb--which raised the specter of mutual assured destruction if both sides were to employ the weapons they brandished.

Cold conflict. Truman set the United States on the course it followed, with some deviations, for the 40-plus years of the Cold War. As the Soviets moved to undermine governments in Eastern Europe and replace them with Communist regimes, Truman in March 1947 urged Congress to aid Greece and Turkey to prevent Communist takeover. In the process, he set out an ambitious goal: "It must be the policy of the United States to support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressures."

Under the Truman Doctrine, the draft was reinstated and the armed forces built back up, but in choosing whether to wage war Truman and his successors were constrained by the threat of nuclear war between the two superpowers. Even so, when North Korean troops crossed the 38th parallel in June 1950, Harry Truman felt obliged to defend South Korea. American forces proved insufficient after the Chinese unexpectedly invaded in November 1950, and the United States and its Allies were thrown back into a southern perimeter around Pusan. General MacArthur responded with an audacious amphibious landing at Inchon. He wanted to go farther, to bomb and attack the Chinese beyond Korea's northern boundary. Truman, fearful of a nuclear confrontation, said no--and when MacArthur persisted, fired him in April 1951. "There is no substitute for victory," MacArthur proclaimed in a speech at West Point. Truman's popularity plunged to a record low.

Only after a new president, Dwight Eisenhower, clandestinely threatened nuclear retaliation did the Communists agree to a compromise peace--a tie at best, not a victory for the United States.

Eisenhower sought to discourage further Soviet aggression by maintaining U.S. forces in Europe and Asia, by constructing alliances in the underdeveloped world, and by threatening massive retaliation with nuclear weapons even up to what his secretary of state, John Foster Dulles, called "the brink of war." The Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev threatened to isolate U.S.

forces in conventionally indefensible Berlin in 1957, 1960, and 1961 and installed nuclear missiles in Cuba in 1962; Eisenhower and John F. Kennedy faced down the threats to Berlin, and Kennedy after tense negotiations persuaded the Soviets to withdraw the missiles, by secretly withdrawing missiles from Turkey and guaranteeing there would be no further attempts to overthrow the Castro regime. Khrushchev's successors never again made such threats, but they did encourage coups and guerrilla movements in the Third World, with varying success.

And nowhere more so than in Vietnam. Viet Cong insurgents had been operating in South Vietnam, aided by Communist North Vietnam, since the country was divided in 1954. The United States, in line with the Truman Doctrine, sent economic and military aid to South Vietnam. The critical moment of escalation came in August 1963, when Kennedy approved a coup against the South Vietnamese president, Ngo Dinh Diem; in November, Diem was killed. This effectively gave the responsibility for South Vietnam to the United States. Kennedy's successor, Lyndon Johnson, eventually sent 540,000 U.S. soldiers to Vietnam. But Gen. William Westmoreland's strategy of using intense firepower in the jungles and mountains resulted in heavy American casualties while failing to break the hold of the Viet Cong in densely populated areas. Johnson's refusal to threaten nuclear weapons and his unwillingness to attack North Vietnam, for fear of the kind of Chinese intervention that had nearly defeated the United States in Korea, meant the Communists had no reason to agree to a Korea-style peace. American opinion turned against the war, forcing Johnson to retire. Richard Nixon reduced troop levels, and Gen. Creighton Abrams adopted a strategy of protecting populated areas and building up South Vietnamese forces. A North Vietnamese invasion was repelled in 1972 and a peace agreement signed in December. But in 1975 the North Vietnamese attacked again in force, and a newly elected Democratic Congress denied the aid sought by Nixon's successor, Gerald Ford, for the South Vietnamese. Saigon fell in April 1975--a galling defeat for America and a disaster for millions of South Vietnamese.

The outcome in Vietnam would inhibit American presidents and the American military for years to come. Jimmy Carter responded to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan with an embargo on Soviet grain sales. When Iranian revolutionaries seized diplomats--an act of war under the laws of diplomacy--he responded with protracted negotiations and an eight-helicopter rescue mission that failed. Carter was defeated by Ronald Reagan in 1980; the hostages were released on Inauguration Day, immediately after the Gipper was sworn in. Reagan's vast defense buildup in the 1980s, and his endorsement of strategic missile defense, were one factor in convincing Soviet leaders that they could no longer match America.

Reluctant warrior. The success of Reagan's policies may now be fully measured. Ironically, he of all Cold War presidents was the most reluctant to use nuclear weapons; he was horrified at the destruction that would be caused by mutual assured destruction and initiated a strategic missile defense program, derided by his critics as "Star Wars," to make such mass annihilation impossible. During his presidency his defense secretary, Caspar Weinberger, and his national security adviser, Gen. Colin Powell, enunciated doctrines that, had they been applied retroactively, would have prevented almost every American president from going to war. America, they said, should do so only when it had overwhelming force, consensus support from the American people, and an endpoint or exit strategy clearly in hand.

Reagan actually used military force sparingly. In 1983, he withdrew forces from Lebanon, after 241 marines were killed by a massive truck bomb. But when a military coup in tiny Grenada took the life of the prime minister, a Marxist who nonetheless wanted to forge friendly ties with the United States, Reagan dispatched troops without hesitation.

The fall of the Berlin Wall and the end of the Cold War in 1989 freed presidents from the fear that military intervention would lead to nuclear war between the superpowers. But they still went to war only reluctantly. Saddam Hussein's occupation of Kuwait in 1990 presented George H.W. Bush with an occasion for war that met the standards set by Weinberger and Powell. The United States, still with a Cold War-size military and with plenty of allies, could deploy a sufficient military force (Bush asked his generals how many men they needed and doubled it), it had an easily realizable military strategy, and there was an obvious endpoint, the liberation of Kuwait. Even so, nearly half the U.S. Senate and a large minority in the House opposed military action. Ultimately, Bush rejected advice to continue on into Iraq, though that led to the massacre of many Kurds and Shiites, who had been encouraged to believe that they could count on American assistance.

Bill Clinton similarly seemed to follow the Weinberger-Powell prescription. When Army Rangers were killed in Somalia, Clinton quickly withdrew U.S. forces. He resisted intervention in Bosnia until it became clear that American forces would be called on to help Europeans withdraw, and force was used sparingly. The war in Kosovo was conducted entirely by air, to produce zero U.S. casualties. Actions against al Qaeda were limited to a few long-range airstrikes.

The way it was. The shock of September 11 set George W. Bush on a course closer to that which American presidents have followed in the past. He chose, with near unanimous support, to go to war in Afghanistan, even though it was not obvious that we had sufficient forces or a military strategy to ensure victory. The amazing capacities of the American military--with special forces on the ground directing precision bombing by B-2s flown in from Missouri--speedily ousted the Taliban regime. But Afghanistan is still a disorderly place, with a central government by no means wholly in control. Bush also chose to go to war in Iraq, this time against considerable opposition, with forces entirely capable of success in major military operations but not, or so critics have plausibly charged, sufficient to impose order in the months and years after. Nor is there a clear endpoint or exit strategy: Bush insists that American forces will leave when Iraqi forces can maintain order, but determining just when that might be will be a matter of fine and debatable judgment.

Bush's decision to go to war in Iraq has been attacked as a departure from the American tradition of war. But it is more of a return to the dominant tradition of our history. The United States has never been an isolationist nation; Americans and American military forces have been roaming the globe since the Revolutionary War. Until the 20th century, the oceans seemed to protect the American homeland from attack, but not always. The White House and the Capitol were burned in 1814, and James K. Polk went to war in 1846 after charging that American forces had been attacked on American soil. In any case, the oceans protect us no more and have not for many years.

Wars are chancy things. The friction of war, as the Prussian military philosopher Carl von Clausewitz wrote, is inevitable and its effects unpredictable. The responsibility for sending men to their deaths has weighed heavily on our commanders in chief. Photographs of Abraham Lincoln and Franklin Roosevelt show how the weight of making such awesome decisions aged these vigorous leaders, just as it has visibly aged George W. Bush over the past five years.

Our system of government gives millions of voters and members of the armed services and thousands of public officials in the legislative and executive branches a role in fighting America's wars. But the most difficult decisions, and the greatest burden of responsibility, have rested on America's presidents, who, relying on imperfect information, must make, and have often made, life-and-death decisions without being able to know for certain what effects they will have.

Not Like His Father (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, January 30, 2006

On New Year's Day, President George W. Bush was visiting wounded soldiers at San Antonio's Brooke Army Medical Center. He found himself by the bed of a badly burned soldier, swathed in bandages. He was told she might not pull through. Surrounded by her family, he couldn't summon words to express his feelings. "I sat there and wept with them," he recalled later. "I didn't know what else to do."

Fifteen years ago, President George H. W. Bush experienced his own emotional moments with the troops. On a Thanksgiving visit to Saudi Arabia amid a huge U.S. buildup in the Persian Gulf region, he grew flustered when a young lieutenant thanked him for being there. Tearing up, the president was momentarily speechless, then blurted out, "That's what Woody Allen said: 'Ninety percent of life is showing up.'"

It is a familiar scene for the father and son: those awkward meetings with soldiers in wartime, punctuated by the fact that neither is a man of natural eloquence.

The two Bush men are bound together in other ways. They are only the second father and son to become president (John Adams and John Quincy Adams were the first). And each launched a war against the same tyrant in the same country.

Yet curiously, there are more differences than similarities in their role as commander in chief. The 41st president was a coalition builder and a diplomat. The 43rd president was willing to go it alone and ignore international opprobrium. The first Bush had a sense of limits about American power. His son believes the military is his best tool for working his will abroad.

The two men made the case for war in different fashion as well. It is true the father's job was easier than his son's. Saddam Hussein had invaded Kuwait and was an unmistakable threat. Nonetheless, George Herbert Walker Bush tried to build consensus at home and abroad before starting the Gulf War.

George W. Bush made his case in a more controversial way, arguing for a pre-emptive strike to depose Saddam. He spoke of how the Iraqi dictator might use weapons of mass destruction and of his ties to terrorists. Those claims have never been proved.

It is striking that the son rarely cites his father as his role model as commander in chief. George W. Bush says the world has changed dramatically since his father's tenure, largely because of 9/11 and the threat posed by terrorists. The challenges he faces, he says, are unique. As Vice President Dick Cheney told U.S. News in January, "We're talking about the possibility of a handful of terrorists--a relatively few individuals--able to get their hands on, say, a biological agent or a nuclear weapon and do enormous harm inside the United States. That's sort of the ultimate threat we face today. And it's a different kind of threat than we've ever faced before .... It forces us to think in new ways about how we defend the nation."

Grounded. This gospel of singularity informs Bush's role as commander in chief. It has led him to expand the authority and reach the presidency into areas his father never entered: domestic spying without warrants; detaining suspected terrorists without trial; conducting a vast, pre-emptive war against terrorists. "It requires certain qualities," says a senior White House official, "such as an unshakable will--and, particularly during a time of war--passion. Feelings are going to run higher than normal, and you have to be grounded, in the sense of knowing what you're doing and believing what you're doing is right."

Bush has said the terrorist attacks of 9/11 gave him his mission as president--to protect the nation from what he sees as a global network of "evildoers." The day after 9/11, he called advisers to the White House residence and urged them to prepare for a long struggle. Communicating the facts about the war would be difficult, the president said, partly because it might be impossible to reveal successes, lest such announcements expose U.S. counterterrorism methods and endanger American operatives. One of the biggest challenges, he cautioned, would be to stay the course. "The further we get from this day," he warned, "people are going to forget." He promised never to do that.

Bush believes he must keep up his campaign to convince the nation that the war is going well. "People see so much of the war on cable TV that the president needs to provide context,"says a senior administration official. That means countering news of casualties and war costs by emphasizing that America cannot abandon its new client state.

Bush's father, by contrast, saw the 1991 war with Iraq as a conventional conflict to be won by conventional means. And he had a strong sense of limits. George Herbert Walker Bush called off the ground battle after only 100 hours because Saddam's forces had been crushed. His refusal to take over Iraq and occupy Baghdad was widely criticized, but Bush argued that the United Nations never approved an occupation. He also insisted that occupying Iraq would have been vastly expensive in lives and money. His predictions have proved true--on his son's watch.

George H. W. Bush felt another constraint--what historians call "Vietnam syndrome," a reluctance by Americans to commit troops to potentially lengthy wars without a guarantee of success and a certainty of moral justification. "After the mess in Vietnam, many Americans didn't trust their leaders to send troops anywhere," says a former adviser. "So we developed a vast public outreach program." At one point, Bush even gave a speech justifying the coming conflict in theological terms, using the philosophies of Aquinas and Augustine to define what was a "just war."

Self-reliant. The senior Bush felt equipped--from his experience as vice president, former director of central intelligence, and U.S. envoy to the United Nations and to China--to challenge both the military and his advisers. George W. Bush seems more accepting of the advice of his in-house "experts." He went along with recommendations of Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld to minimize the number of troops needed in Iraq, which some military analysts and many Democrats have branded a mistake. Bush also accepted his advisers' claims that the occupation would be relatively easy and that the Iraqis would welcome U.S. soldiers as liberators. "We built a policy based on practicalities," says a former national security adviser to the father. "They built a policy based on assumptions."

In running the war, the elder Bush didn't micromanage the Pentagon, but he did pay close attention to certain tactics. He reviewed plans for bombing areas where civilian casualties were likely, for instance, and tried to select targets and ways of attack to minimize harm to noncombatants. If his son pays heed to such details, he has not disclosed it. In fact, he says he almost always leaves operational details to the military.

The father, a former Navy pilot shot down over the Pacific in World War II, knew all too well the perils of war. Perhaps that's why he seemed more troubled by the consequences than his son. On Dec. 31, 1990, as war approached, the elder Bush wrote a moving letter to his five children about how much he enjoyed their time at Camp David over Christmas. "I guess what I want you to know as a father is this: Every human life is precious," he wrote. "When the question is asked, 'How many lives are you willing to sacrifice?'--it tears at my heart. The answer, of course, is none--none at all." But Bush added: "I look at today's crisis as 'good'vs. 'evil'--Yes, it is that clear. ... Sometimes in life you have to act as you think best--you can't compromise, you can't give in--even if your critics are loud and numerous."

And what does the father think of the son's choices? He isn't privy to the high-level intelligence his son receives, so he defers to the judgment of his first-born. Besides, one of the traits the father shares with his son is loyalty, so he will let history judge both men by their deeds and their times.

Imbalance Of Power (USNEWS)

By Jay Tolson

U.S. News and World Report, January 23, 2006

During the Civil War, Abraham Lincoln got away with suspending habeas corpus and subjecting citizens to military law. Even more famously, he defied the law of the land by freeing enslaved Americans. During World War II, Franklin D. Roosevelt ordered the internment of Japanese-American citizens and received the Supreme Court's subsequent approval. Yet when Harry S. Truman ordered the Commerce Department to take over 87 steel plants crippled by striking workers during the Korean War, the high court ruled that he had pushed executive prerogative beyond acceptable bounds.

So just how imperial can the American president be? And more specifically, how, when, and how far can the powers that the Constitution invested in the commander in chief be extended?

Disclosures about George W. Bush's support for a National Security Agency-run domestic-spying program have pushed those questions to the fore once again. The headlines have fueled charges that his administration has, in post-9/11 measures ranging from indefinite detention of terrorism suspects (including two U.S. citizens) to torture and abuse of detainees around the world, taken presidential discretion to new, possibly illegal extremes. Joining a host of liberal voices, former Vice President Al Gore has decried a "truly breathtaking expansion of executive power" by the Bush administration.

Bush, so far, has gotten a broad pass on his amplification of the commander in chief's prerogatives, which many Americans view as justified in the name of the war on terrorism. But there are growing signs of resistance. Congressional hearings in February will examine the president's rationale for ignoring procedures instituted in the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, namely the requirement that intelligence agencies secure a warrant from a special court before eavesdropping on U.S. citizens. Another congressional committee says it will oversee implementation of a new ban on the use of torture, which the president, even while signing the bill into law, suggested he would ignore when necessary. For its part, the Supreme Court is mulling over the possibility of hearings on detainee cases, although the Justice Department's solicitor general has argued that the court has no jurisdiction over them.

Whatever the solicitor general argues, cases involving possible executive overreach are almost certain to reach the high court. The American Civil Liberties Union and the Center for Constitutional Rights have filed separate suits to challenge the legality of warrantless domestic spying and to determine whether the NSA monitored lawyers, journalists, and academics involved with the Middle East. One plaintiff in the ACLU suit, journalist Christopher Hitchens, a prominent backer of Bush's war on terrorism and the war in Iraq, says that if the administration wants to engage in domestic spying, it "must ask Congress to change FISA, not ignore it."

Powering up. This in some ways goes to the nub of the historical and theoretical debate about executive authority: How does the commander in chief exercise extraordinary powers within the legal framework of the republic, including the constitutionally ordained separation of powers?

Arguments for and against strong executive authority--"energy in the executive," as Alexander Hamilton phrased it--have been put forth by both sides of the conservative-liberal divide, depending largely on who is in the White House. From the 1950s through the '70s, liberal scholars and pundits were among the aggressive supporters of a stronger executive. Historians Henry Steele Commager and Arthur Schlesinger Jr. both took on critics who attacked Truman for not securing congressional authority when he sent troops to Korea. Richard Neustadt's 1960 study, Presidential Power, exalted FDR's strong leadership and lamented Dwight Eisenhower's allegedly listless presidency. But after both John F. Kennedy and Lyndon Johnson tried, with mixed results, to bring greater elan to the White House, Neustadt grew uneasy that his ideas were seen as providing a warrant for the Vietnam War debacle and Nixon administration abuses, including ille-gal wiretapping of political foes and antiwar activists. Schlesinger also changed his tune in his book The Imperial Presidency . But as liberals began deploring a lack of balance among government branches, conservative (and particularly neoconservative) thinkers supportive of Ronald Reagan's "morning in America" began to trot out the oldest justifications of a strong executive. "When you own the presidency," acknowledges Harvard political scientist Harvey Mansfield, a leading conservative defender of executive prerogative, "it looks like a far more valuable possession."

How Clinton Coped (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, January 23, 2006

Former President Bill Clinton didn't wage a full-fledged war during the eight years he was in office. But he did order American troops into harm's way on several occasions. From his home in Chappaqua, N.Y., Clinton offered his views, in an E-mail conversation with U.S. News 's Chief White House Correspondent Kenneth T. Walsh, on what it takes to lead during times of conflict and at times of peace. Excerpts:

On the most difficult decisions he faced regarding use of military force during his presidency. When we used the military in Bosnia, Kosovo, and Haiti, most Americans, most Republicans in Congress, and many Democrats were initially opposed to it.

On directly supervising the military and the issue of "micromanagement" during a crisis. Generally, it is best not to micromanage military operations, though in some cases it is unavoidable. For example, after the accidental bombing of the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade because of outdated maps, I had daily meetings to go over the proposed targets for the next day. On a few occasions, I disagreed with the military's choices, but wherever possible I tried to set policy and let them decide how best to carry it out.

On the challenges of being commander in chief in today's world. In the modern era, leadership involves dealing with the 24-hour news cycle and responding to the concerns of allies, international organizations, [and] at least the neutral countries that are well disposed to America. It's important to respond as quickly as possible to events and legitimate questions but not to be stampeded into actions or words that will compound events or create new problems.

The toughest part of the job as commander in chief. The hardest thing is knowing young Americans and innocent civilians in the theater of conflict might be killed or badly injured.

On whether presidential leadership is different in times of war and times of peace. In a military conflict, successful leadership requires clear objectives, a strategy to achieve them, a clear understanding with the military of the tactics to be used, and an ability to explain the decision to use force in terms of our interests and our values to people at home and around the world. These skills are also significant in pursuing proactive objectives. But during a conflict, clarity, consistency, concentration, and a willingness to evaluate and, if necessary, alter tactics are even more essential.

On how much he relied on his senior military advisers. I relied heavily on my military advisers for tactical advice. On the question of whether to use force, I sought their advice but made the final decisions myself, sometimes disagreeing with them, as in Kosovo and Haiti.

On the concerns of Pentagon planners. Our military leaders did not voice concerns about public opinion but did want a clear definition of military success including an exit strategy.

An example of contingency planning inside his government. In Kosovo, my senior advisers believed, as I did, that our air power would prevail but also had plans to introduce ground troops in the event it did not.

DOJ_NMG_0010009

On his feelings about sending troops into harm's way. In making life or death decisions, I leaned on the power of prayer, the example of my predecessors, the support of my cabinet and staff, the vice president, and, of course, Hillary.

Iraq Sunnis Commit To Coalition Talks (REU)

BAGHDAD (Reuters) - Iraq's biggest Sunni political bloc committed itself on Sunday to talks with Shi'ites and Kurds to form a government of national unity, but said its key demands, including changes to the constitution, must be met.

The United States, keen to drive the political process toward a stable consensus, wants the Kurds and majority Shi'ites, who dominated last month's elections, to form a government that includes minority Sunnis. It hopes an inclusive coalition will undermine the raging Sunni Arab insurgency.

Four policemen were killed and nine wounded by a roadside bomb in Baquba, 65 km (40 miles) north of Baghdad. Thirteen other people were killed in attacks across Iraq, including a policeman's four nephews who died when a rocket hit his home.

The Iraqi Accordance Front, which comprises three mainly Islamist Sunni Arab groups, said it would appeal against the results of an election it believes was rigged but would still take part in talks on a new coalition government.

"It will be active in talks with other political blocs to form a unity government," said Tareq al-Hashemi, whose moderate Iraqi Islamic Party is the biggest member of the Front.

Hashemi said the election results did "not reflect the political and population weight" of the Front, which believes it should have won 11 more seats. The Sunni coalition would seek key ministries in the new government as compensation, he said.

The Front also intends to hold Shi'ites and Kurds to a promise, extracted under U.S. pressure, of reviewing the constitution approved in a referendum last October.

CONSTITUTION

Many Sunnis fear the constitution's provisions for regional autonomy will give Kurds and Shi'ites control over Iraq's vast oil reserves and eventually break the country apart.

"We ask the blocs not to put obstacles in the way of making some changes to the constitution," Hashemi told a news briefing.

After boycotting parliament last year, Sunni leaders had hoped a big turnout in the December 15 election would put them in a strong position to press for amendments, particularly on a new federal state structure, which they fear could give control of oil to Kurdish and Shi'ite regions in the north and south.

They had also hoped that other Shi'ite and secular groups opposed to decentralization would undermine the dominance of the main Shi'ite bloc, the Islamist Alliance, whose most powerful leaders are strongly in favor of federal autonomy.

But the success of the Alliance in coming close to retaining its majority may dampen Sunni hopes of securing amendments with the help of anti-federalist Shi'ites in parliament.

A Western diplomat closely involved in Iraq's political process said Sunni ambitions may have to focus now more on influencing legislation to be enacted that will spell out exactly how autonomous regions can be established and operate.

HOSTAGE

As U.S. and Iraqi forces hunted for kidnapped American reporter Jill Carroll, Iraq's Justice Ministry said six women prisoners held by U.S. forces would be released within a week.

Carroll's abductors threatened to kill her if all women prisoners in Iraq were not freed.

A joint Iraqi-U.S. review board approved the release of the women on January 17, before the kidnappers made their demand, but U.S. officials then apparently delayed freeing them so that it did not look like they were giving in to the hostage-takers.

"They delayed their release because of the connection with the kidnapping of the American journalist," a Justice Ministry spokesman said.

Iraqi military officials said they had intelligence indicating Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the militant leader behind some of the bloodiest attacks, is in Diyala province near Baghdad.

It is not the first time Iraqi officials have said they have closed in on the elusive Zarqawi, leader of al Qaeda in Iraq.

Army posts have been notified of Zarqawi's presence in Diyala, northeast of Baghdad, where there has been a surge in violence in the past few months, the officials said. It was not known exactly where in the province he was, one official said.

Saddam Hussein may be confronted from the witness stand by former associates when his trial resumes this week but defense counsel will call for a halt after the chief judge resigned complaining of government interference.

"There will be former regime members" among witnesses appearing on several days of hearings starting on Tuesday and lasting up to three weeks, a Western diplomat closely involved in the U.S.-sponsored trial told reporters on Sunday.

Sunnis Must Have Security, Leader Says (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2006

BAGHDAD — A leader of Iraq's largest Sunni Arab political bloc said Sunday that he would shun any government that included officials responsible for police brutality against his minority sect, a stand aimed at removing the powerful Shiite interior minister.

Tariq Hashimi of the Iraqi Accordance Front spelled out its conditions for entering a "national unity" administration after most Iraqi leaders called for such an outcome in order to quell the Sunni Muslim-led insurgency.

Sunni participation in Iraq's first full-term government since the 2003 ouster of Saddam Hussein is the top U.S. diplomatic priority here. Excluding the Sunnis could doom efforts to end the fighting through political means and to reduce the number U.S. forces in Iraq.

At least 17 Iraqis died in weekend fighting, and authorities Sunday found the bodies of 29 men apparently seized by insurgents last week after they had volunteered to join the police.

Two U.S. airmen were killed and another was wounded Sunday by a roadside bomb north of Baghdad, the military announced today.

The names of the airmen, assigned to the 586th Expeditionary Mission Support Group, were being withheld pending notification of next of kin.

Talks on forming a government have intensified since Friday's release of complete but uncertified returns from the Dec. 15 parliamentary election and are expected to last at least six weeks.

The Shiite Muslim and Kurdish blocs leading the transitional government are expected to join forces in a new ruling alliance. They won 181 seats in parliament, three short of the two-thirds majority required to form a new government, but could pick up the needed seats by making deals with smaller Shiite and Kurdish groups.

Most Shiite and Kurdish leaders have endorsed the U.S. goal of broadening the government to include Sunnis, whose two main blocs got 55 seats in parliament. Such an achievement, however, would require hard compromises among Shiites, Kurds and Sunni Arabs.

"There is no preordained outcome that we're going to get a deal involving all three of these groups," said a Western diplomat monitoring the talks. "They're all saying they are willing to explore it, but success is by no means assured."

At a news conference Sunday, Hashimi said his Sunni bloc's first condition for entering the government was a guarantee of personal security for Sunnis, who he said had suffered abuse by the transitional regime's Interior Ministry police.

"We have red lines against some figures who have harmed our people," he said without naming names. "We will not allow anyone who participated in human rights violations to take any ministerial posts."

The remark was clearly aimed at Bayan Jabr, whose reputation as interior minister has been stained by allegations of torture and killings of Sunni prisoners held by the predominantly Shiite police. Jabr, a powerful figure in the ruling Shiite alliance, has denied involvement in the alleged abuses.

Hashimi did not say who should run the Interior Ministry, nor did he insist that a Sunni get the job. That left open the possibility that the Shiite alliance, which has insisted on keeping control of the ministry, could find a candidate acceptable to the Sunnis.

The Sunni leader set other terms: He demanded an end to official corruption, a "charter of honor" that renounces sectarian and ethnic strife, an agreement to set a timetable for withdrawal of U.S. forces, and a promise "not to hamper" constitutional changes demanded by Sunnis to prevent the Shiite and Kurdish regions from dominating Iraq's oil wealth.

The latter demand could be the most difficult to resolve. Abdelaziz Hakim, a powerful Shiite politician, opposes significant changes in the constitution, as do most of the Shiites elected to parliament.

Hashimi is expected to be a key player in negotiations over the coming weeks, along with President Jalal Talabani and Massoud Barzani, both Kurds, and either Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari or Vice President Adel Abdul Mehdi — whoever is chosen the Shiite alliance's candidate to lead the new government.

Before the talks can advance, officials must resolve challenges by Shiite, Kurdish and Sunni parties to the precise seat allocations announced Friday, a process that will take 10 days.

Police said the 29 bodies found Sunday were apparently those of men who had traveled in a larger group from the city of Samarra to Baghdad to join the police force. Dozens in the group were rejected, and many were abducted at insurgent roadblocks while returning home last week. Ten other bodies were found Saturday in the same area of Salahuddin province, about 40 miles north of Baghdad.

In Sunday's deadliest incident, assailants fired rocket-propelled grenades into the home of a Shiite policeman in Balad Ruz, 45 miles northeast of Baghdad, killing his brother and four of his brother's children, ages 6 to 13.

Meanwhile, the two parties of the Kurdish bloc signed an accord to create a single Kurdish government in three northern provinces, formally ending years of division and animosity that erupted in violence in the mid-1990s. The unification was aimed at bolstering the region's relative autonomy from Iraq's central government.

The accord will put Barzani's Kurdistan Democratic Party, which runs Irbil and Dahuk provinces, in charge of Sulaymaniya province as well. A representative of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan will be named to head the region's militia, and Cabinet posts will be divided.

Amid Sunni Suspicions, Iraq's Leaders Try To Find Officials Not Tied To Militias (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, January 23, 2006

BAGHDAD — As Iraq's political leaders start forming a coalition government, the naming of its interior and defense chiefs will be a key issue, a former U.S. official and an Iraqi adviser say.

The United States wants to ensure that the figures running Iraq's two main security ministries are free of ties to ethnic and religious militias, such as the Shiite Badr Brigade or Kurdish peshmerga, says Matt Sherman, former U.S. deputy chief adviser to the Interior Ministry.

“The trick will be finding an individual (without militia ties) … who has enough political influence to be effective,” Sherman says.

Iraqi election officials announced Friday that the Shiite and Kurdish coalitions won a combined 181 of the 275 seats in parliament, three shy of the two-thirds majority needed to name a new government for the next four years.

The two major Sunni blocs, the Iraqi Accordance Front and the Iraqi Front for National Dialogue, won a combined 55 seats.

Last year, the Shiite-controlled Interior Ministry was hit by allegations of torture. Bodies of prisoners, mostly Sunni, were found with their hands and legs bound, shot through the head, after having been picked up by gunmen in police uniforms. U.S. forces discovered two groups of Interior Ministry prison cells where prisoners showed signs of maltreatment.

Shiites and Kurds absorbed the brunt of repression under the rule of Saddam Hussein's Sunni government. They are wary of handing over control of the police forces, run by the Interior Ministry, says Basam Ridha, an adviser to transitional Prime Minster Ibrahim al-Jaafari, who is aligned with the largest Shiite bloc.

“There will always be accusations, especially from Sunnis,” of ties to militias, Ridha says. “There's a great deal of negotiations going on. Obviously, we'll have a say in the matter.”

Sunni leader Tariq al-Hashimi warns that Sunni Arabs will reject any minister involved in violence against Sunnis. Bayan Jabr, Interior minister under the transitional government, has denied that his forces abused Sunni prisoners or targeted influential Sunnis for assassinations.

Militias are outlawed under an Iraqi law crafted under U.S. guidance in 2003. Many members of the armed groups, including some who fought against Saddam, have joined Iraq's uniformed government security forces but retain loyalty to their religious or ethnic sects.

Finding a leader without some connection to former militias may be a daunting task, Sherman says. "Those individuals are very limited," he says. "There's a fine line to toe there. You don't just want a figurehead in that position."

In Iraq on Sunday:

•Insurgents attacked the home of an Iraqi policeman with rocket-propelled grenades in Balad Ruz, 45 miles northeast of Baghdad, the Iraqi police Joint Coordination Center told the Associated Press. The officer's four children, ages 6 to 11, and their uncle were killed, the center said. The officer was unharmed.

•Police found the bullet-riddled bodies of 23 men kidnapped Wednesday after being rejected entry into a police training academy. The bodies were found partially buried in the village of Nibaei, near Dujail, about 50 miles north of Baghdad, Interior Ministry police Lt. Thair Mahmoud said.

•There was no word on the fate of American journalist Jill Carroll, kidnapped in Baghdad on Jan. 7 and last seen in a video released Jan. 17. Her kidnappers threatened to kill the 28-year-old in 72 hours unless all Iraqi female prisoners in U.S. custody were released.

Iraq's Next Big Hurdle: Unity Government (CSM)

By Charles Levinson, Correspondent Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, January 23, 2006

BAGHDAD - When Iraq's election results were released Friday, it was no surprise that religious Shiites dominated the polls.

But the hard numbers have given new steam to Iraq's politicians, who are wheeling and dealing to find enough common ground on which to build the country's first freely elected four-year government.

In a process that could stretch into April, Iraq's factions will decide on a governing program, agree on whether the new Constitution can be changed, and haggle over the crucial positions of president, prime minister, and cabinet ministers.

The Shiite alliance, with 128 of 275 seats, will dominate the talks, but its members must reach out to others to find the two-thirds majority needed to form a government. Whom they tap as allies or exclude may affect stability for years to come, experts say.

All of Iraq's politicians are touting national unity and the need for Sunni Arab participation in the government. It is widely believed to be a necessary step toward taking the steam out of a relentless insurgency.

But those politicians have very different ideas of what national unity and Sunni participation actually entails..

"There is no preordained outcome that we are actually going to get a deal involving all three of these groups," says one Western diplomat in Baghdad. "I can only tell you that they are all saying they are willing to explore it."

Shiites are insisting that the election results dictate the distribution of the spoils, meaning they should be given the majority of the cabinet posts. The Sunni Arabs are pushing for a piece of the pie that may not be justified by vote tallies alone. They hold a powerful bargaining chip: sway with the Sunni-led insurgency.

"If the country is going to be unified, then you have to take into account the armed resistance, which continues to show that it is capable of baring its teeth," says Wamidh Nadhmi, a professor of political science at Baghdad University. "Dealing with the resistance means making the Sunni politicians happy."

It's a reality that infuriates Shiites, who feel the threat of violence is compelling them to relinquish power they won fairly. If violence works for Sunni Arabs, they wonder aloud, then why should Shiites continue to show restraint?

"They can't do both at the same time, resistance and violence on one side, and playing politics on the other side. This is unacceptable," says Adel Abdel Mahdi, a powerful Shiite and a frontrunner to replace Ibrahim Jaafari as prime minister.

If current rhetoric is more than just political brinkmanship and tough talk, then Iraq's Sunni Arab and Shiite parties have seemingly irreconcilable differences on issues such as security policy, the exclusion of former Baathists from government, and amending the Constitution.

Among the principal stumbling blocks in negotiations is control of the ministries of Interior and Defense. The current minister of Interior, Bayan Jabr, essentially the country's chief law enforcement officer, is loyal to Badr, the Shiite militia aligned with the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI), the core of the Shiite political alliance.

Critics say Mr. Jabr has turned the Iraqi police force into a glorified Shiite militia that indiscriminately targets Sunni Arab neighborhoods and cities in an attempt to quash the insurgency.

"We must have the Defense and the Interior to ensure the security of our cities, and to stop the terrorizing of our supporters," says Salman al-Jumayli, a spokesperson for the Sunni Accordance Front, which has 44 seats in the coming parliament.

For Shiites such concessions are unlikely. After decades of suffering under the old regime, the recently empowered Shiites are not about to relinquish control of the ministries that were responsible for much of that oppression. "We won the elections and these ministries are our right," says Jawad al-Malaki, a leading member of the Shiite Dawa Party.

The issue of de- Baathification - a ban on former Baath Party members in government - will also figure prominently in the dealmaking. Shiites call many of the Sunni Arabs who have risen to the fore in recent months Saddamists, Baathists, and outright terrorists.

"The Shiites have turned de-Baathification into de-Sunnification," says Mr. Jumayli. "They're only targeting Sunnis and they've turned it into a weapon to get rid of all their political opponents."

Shiite unwillingness to negotiate on the issue has added to the Sunni Arabs' sense of exclusion and marginalization. It has also meant that even those posts that have gone to Sunni Arabs, such as the outgoing Ministry of Defense, have gone to Sunnis handpicked by Shiites, who are largely out of step with the majority of the country's Sunni Arabs.

What to do with the country's infant Constitution is another issue negotiators will have to address.

The drafting process and referendum on the historic charter last fall signaled a turning point in Sunni Arab willingness to engage with the political process. Their reluctant endorsement, however, came with a condition: The document could be amended at a later date to strengthen language aimed at preventing the breakup of Iraq. Earlier this month, some Shiite leaders seemed to be reneging on that agreement, calling any substantial changes to the Constitution unacceptable.

With such significant differences to overcome, many worry the Shiites will decide that a true national unity government is more trouble than it's worth, and team up with the Kurds as they did in the last government.

But even if Iraq's disparate factions find a way to put aside their differences to form an inclusive government, true national unity remains elusive, says Mohammed al-Sheikhly, president of the Center for Transitional Justice in Iraq.

"We got rid of Saddam Hussein, but now we have 40 Saddam Husseins, a bunch of political leaders with a power complex, who only want to rule. They are all hypocrites whose programs talk about national unity, and a united Iraq, but whose actions say the opposite."

At Least 23 Iraqis Die In Weekend Attacks (AP)

By Sameer N. Yacoub

The Associated Press, January 23, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Insurgents fired rocket-propelled grenades at a policeman's home northeast of Baghdad on Sunday, killing his four children and his brother and raising to at least 23 the number of Iraqis killed in attacks this weekend.

Also Sunday, police found the bullet-riddled bodies of nearly two dozen men abducted last week north of Baghdad after being rejected entry into a police academy, officials said.

The U.S. military announced Monday that a roadside bomb blast killed two U.S. airmen and wounded another Sunday near Taji, 12 miles north of Baghdad. At least 2,226 U.S. military personnel have been killed since the Iraq war began in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

DOJ_NMG_0010014

The violence continued as Iraq's political parties began gearing up for talks on a new coalition government that U.S. officials hope will win the confidence of disaffected Sunni Arabs and undermine support for the insurgency. That would hasten the time when U.S. and other foreign troops can go home.

There was still no word on the fate of kidnapped American journalist Jill Carroll two days after a deadline set by her captors. They had threatened to kill the 28-year-old freelancer for The Christian Science Monitor unless all Iraqi women detainees were freed.

Iraqi officials have said they expect the Americans to free six of the nine women they are holding this week. U.S. authorities have not confirmed the claim.

The attack on the policeman's home occurred in Balad Ruz, 45 miles northeast of Baghdad, according to the Iraqi police Joint Coordination Center. The officer's four children, ages 6 to 11, and his brother were killed, the center said. The officer was unharmed, but his wife was wounded.

Sunni-led insurgents often target police as part of their campaign to try to undermine support for the U.S.-backed government.

Four policemen were killed and nine were wounded Sunday when a roadside bomb exploded near their patrol in the tense city of Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, police said. Police also said a man was gunned down at a west Baghdad gas station and another was slain in a market in the capital's Amil district.

The bodies of the 23 men were found partially buried near Dujail, about 50 miles north of Baghdad, said Interior Ministry police Lt. Thair Mahmoud. They had been abducted Wednesday while traveling from Baghdad to their homes in Samarra after failing to be accepted at a police recruit center.

Elsewhere, the bodies of prominent Sunni Arab tribal leader, Sayid Ibrahim Ali, 75, and his 28-year-old son, Ayad, were found in a field near Hawija, 150 miles north of Baghdad, police said. They were shot as they left a funeral Saturday.

In the central city of Mashru, police found the bodies of two blindfolded men who had been shot in the head and chest.

U.S. soldiers, meanwhile, killed three gunmen firing from several cars north of Beiji, 155 miles north of Baghdad, on Saturday, the military said Sunday. Six Iraqis were detained and soldiers destroyed four cars after one was found rigged for use as a car bomb. Twelve other people were reported killed in sporadic violence on Saturday.

Nevertheless, U.S. Brig. Gen. Don Alston said insurgent attacks nationwide fell 40 percent during the week ending Saturday, compared with the previous week. Attacks in Baghdad fell 80 percent for the same period, he told reporters.

The reduction in attacks occurred as security was stepped up in Baghdad and other insurgent hotspots ahead of the announcement last Friday of the results of the Dec. 15 national elections for a new parliament. An alliance of Shiite religious parties won the biggest bloc of seats but not enough to govern without partners.

U.S. officials hope the Shiite alliance, which won 128 of the 275 seats, will include a significant number of Sunni Arabs in the new coalition. Contacts are under way among the nation's Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish politicians but the negotiations could take weeks.

Shiite leaders have said they would include Sunni Arabs if they are willing to work actively to lure fellow Sunnis away from the insurgency. Two Sunni coalitions won a total of 55 seats, far more than the 17 held by Sunnis in the outgoing parliament.

On Sunday, however, leading Sunni Arab politicians made clear they have conditions of their own, including moves away from sectarian divisions and curbs on Shiite-led government security services.

"We have `red lines' on some figures who harmed our people, and we will not allow anyone who participated in human rights violation to take any ministerial posts," Sunni politician Tariq al-Hashimi told reporters.

He appeared to be referring to Interior Minister Bayan Jabr, who is responsible for paramilitary police units accused of assassinating Sunni clerics and civilians as part of the battle against insurgents. Jabr has denied targeting innocent civilians.

Al-Hashimi said the new government must address Sunni Arab opposition to the new constitution, including provisions transforming Iraq into a federal state and purging members of Saddam Hussein's Baath party from government jobs.

But Iraq's most powerful Shiite politician, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, has said the Shiites would oppose major concessions on some key Sunni demands.

DOJ_NMG_0010015

Also Sunday, a U.S. official said members of Saddam's ousted regime, including some in custody, may testify when the trial against the ex-leader and seven other defendants resumes Tuesday. The official did not identify the expected witnesses and briefed reporters on condition of anonymity due to security measures surrounding the trial.

Saddam and the others are charged in the 1982 massacre of more than 140 Shiites in Dujail following an assassination attempt against the former Iraqi leader. The official said the next session is expected to last three days.

Attacks In Iraq Jumped In 2005 Insurgents Widen Aim To Iraqi Forces (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, January 23, 2006

BAGHDAD — The number of attacks against coalition troops, Iraqi security forces and civilians increased 29% last year, and insurgents are increasingly targeting Iraqis, the U.S. military says.

Insurgents launched 34,131 attacks last year, up from 26,496 the year before, according to U.S. military figures released Sunday.

Insurgents are widening their attacks to include the expanding Iraqi forces engaged in the fighting, said Brig. Gen. Donald Alston, a coalition spokesman.

He added, "It tells me the coalition and the Iraqi forces have been very aggressive in taking the fight to the enemy."

The number of trained and equipped Iraqi security forces has grown to 227,000. They outnumber U.S. forces in Iraq. They are often more exposed and are taking a more visible role in fighting the insurgency.

"They're easier targets," said Andrew Krepinevich, a counterinsurgency expert at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, a Washington-based defense think tank.

In 2005, 2,713 Iraqi police and military were killed, according to the Brookings Institute, a Washington-based think tank. Similar numbers for 2004 were not available, and Iraq's government has not released comprehensive casualty numbers for Iraqi security forces. Thousands of Iraqi civilians have also been killed, but no precise tally is available.

U.S. forces have become more effective at protecting against attacks. In 2004, 714 U.S. troops were killed in action and 673 last year, despite the increase in attacks. The number of wounded dropped 26%, from 7,990 to 5,939 during the same period.

The U.S. military attributes that to an increase in effectiveness in protecting its forces against roadside bombs and other attacks. Maj. Gen. William Webster said recently that 10% of the attacks against U.S. forces cause casualties, down from about 25%-30% a year ago.

The new statistics show:

•The number of car bombs more than doubled to 873 last year from 420 the year before. The number of suicide car bombs went to 411 from 133.

• Sixty-seven attackers wore suicide vests last year, up from seven in 2004. Suicide and car bombs are often targeted at Iraqis, causing high casualties.

•Roadside bombs, or improvised explosive devices, as the military calls them, continue to be the most common weapon. Roadside bombs increased to 10,953 in 2005 from 5,607 the year before. Those numbers include roadside bombs that are discovered and defused. These bombs account for nearly one-third of all insurgent attacks.

Professionals Fleeing Iraq As Violence, Threats Persist (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The office of Iraq's most eminent cardiologist is padlocked. A handwritten sign is taped on his wooden door in the private clinic in Baghdad: Patients of Dr. Omar Kubasi should call him in Amman, Jordan.

There, Kubasi, 63, spends his days sitting at a cafe with other physicians and professionals from Iraq. Frustrated, he watches from afar as the medical education system he helped set up during his 36-year career slowly disintegrates. His teaching doctors are fleeing the country in fear. Younger physicians are looking for other countries to train in. Even patients are leaving, no longer confident in the care they can get in Iraq.

"I think it's part of the plan for the country's destruction," Kubasi said by telephone. "The situation in the last six months has gotten so bad, we couldn't continue."

Kubasi left Baghdad in May after he and nine other doctors received letters, written in a childish hand, telling them they would be killed if they did not stop working in their native Iraq. He and his colleagues had been the objects of threats before, but the last carried a foreboding urgency, he said.

Iraq's top professionals -- doctors, lawyers, professors -- and businessmen have been targeted by shadowy political groups for kidnapping and ransom, as well as murder, some of them say. So many have fled the country that Iraq is in danger of losing the core of skilled people it needs most just as it is trying to build a newly independent society.

"It's creating a brain drain," said Amer Hassan Fayed, assistant dean of political science at Baghdad University. "We could end up with a society without knowledge. How can such a society make progress?"

Professionals and businessmen with the means to escape are going to Jordan, Syria, Egypt or, if they have visas, to Western countries. Those left behind say they feel abandoned.

Ahmed Meer Ali, a 27-year-old resident doctor, is left alone to man the private hospital where Kubasi's office is locked and shuttered. Most of the specialists who worked there, providing care to patients and guidance to Ali, have left.

"They are the ones with specialties from England or the U.S.A. They were the ones teaching me," he said. "Now, some patients even go to Iran to get care. In the past, no one in Iraq would go to Iran."

And many educated young Iraqis are hoping to follow.

"Of course I would leave if I could," said Ihana Nabil, 22, who will soon graduate from Baghdad University with a degree in political science. "There's no peace, no stability and no jobs here," she said. Other students at the campus, a temporary oasis in a violent city, agreed.

Exodus is not new to the country. Iraqis who could flee Saddam Hussein's repressive rule did: Poor Shiite Muslims sneaked across the border into Iran, and Sunni Arabs crossed the mountains into Syria or the desert to Jordan. People often waited years for permission to attend a seminar or do business in another country and then would disappear there. Hussein began holding such people's families hostage to guarantee their return.

Many of those émigrés flooded back into Iraq when Hussein fell. But the country's instability and daily regimen of violence have made some reconsider their return. Others who stayed throughout Hussein's rule are finally saying goodbye to their homeland now.

Numbers are impossible to document, partly because those who leave often tell passport officials they are going out of the country for a short visit. Often without telling friends or neighbors, they take a few things from their homes, lock the doors and vanish.

An official at the Interior Ministry's statistics office said the number of Iraqis traveling overland to Jordan held steady at about 200 to 250 a day from July 2004 to June 2005. Since last July, however, the number crossing the border -- excluding truckers and traders -- has ballooned to 1,100 a day, according to the official.

"They may come back if it's safe," Fayed said.

Or they may not. Since the fall of Hussein, kidnapping has mushroomed into a lucrative business. Even children are snatched, to be ransomed the same day for a few hundred dollars from their distraught parents.

Anyone displaying signs of wealth, often professionals and businessmen, are particular targets of kidnappers in search of high ransoms. However, payment is no guarantee a hostage will not simply be killed and dumped; some authorities claim dozens of bodies are found every day but never reported.

That danger is overlaid by the activities of an insurgency that aims to terrify the society by means of bombings, murder and abduction -- or threats. In addition, the death toll from sectarian violence among Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds has climbed steadily.

"Professors have been threatened. Doctors have been killed in their clinics. Killing has become common," Fayed said. "Some people believe this is intentional, to try to empty Iraq of its elite."

Kubasi, the former head of Iraq's military medical corps, believes that. In late April, his secretary handed him a letter written in what he called "bad Arabic" giving them all by May 6 -- 10 days -- to leave the country. He showed the letter to authorities, who suggested he had faked it. By May 8, Kubasi was in Jordan.

His three sons and his daughter are all physicians. They could not risk staying, he said.

"Every day, we sit here, 10 or 12 of us, senior professionals, just discussing the situation," Kubasi said from Amman. "It's mental death to sit here. But even my patients say I should not come back. Really, really, I could not pay for a kidnapper's ransom. And in that case, you would be killed."

It frustrates him to watch the medical training system he helped create fall apart. "The circuit of teaching, training and care is being broken. It may not be recovered," he said.

"Our medical schools and doctors are known all over the Arab world. The teaching care was excellent, based on the British system. We were successful under Saddam Hussein to start our own postgraduate studies, including many medical specialties. Now they are ridding the country of all of this."

Um Mustafa and her husband, a businessman, had hoped to stay. But they abandoned that goal when thieves burst into their bedroom, held their young son in a headlock, with a gun to his head, and demanded that his parents hand over all their gold and jewelry.

"We didn't want to leave," said Um Mustafa, 27, who still fears attack and asked not to be fully identified. "We were a very happy family. Wealthy. My husband had a good job. We had money, a house, car and servants."

The men terrorized the family for more than two hours, threatening to kill or kidnap their 6-year-old son, while their 2-year-old cried. They beat Um Mustafa's husband, finally leaving when they were satisfied they had found all the jewelry, guns and money in the house. They left the couple bound with plastic handcuffs and locked in a room, saying they would burn the house as they left.

"Maybe God wanted to give us a new life," Um Mustafa said. "They didn't kill us."

She and her husband decided to move to Jordan. But they heard that Jordanian authorities, worried about the influx, were making life more difficult for Iraqis there. So they have bought tickets to Cairo instead.

"We don't know how we will live there. My husband will have to find a new job. I will go to work," she said. "Leaving the country was not an easy decision. Any time you start a new life, it's very difficult. But it will be better than staying here in a country were there is no safety anymore.

"I've been through four wars. I never, never felt like leaving before," Um Mustafa said. "Now, life in Iraq has become unsafe. I don't feel safe in my own bedroom -- or in the whole country."

Contractors Leaving Iraq (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, January 23, 2006

U.S. private contractors, until now the biggest private-sector employers in Iraq, are preparing to leave as U.S. money runs out and Iraqi ministries take charge of the reconstruction effort.

"We are drawing down," said Ken Oscar, Fluor Corp.'s vice president for strategy. "We are not done by any stretch of the imagination, but we are drawing down."

The engineering and construction giant at one time had 250 to 300 people from the United States in Iraq, and employed roughly 20,000 Iraqis.

Now, as the U.S.-funded part of the reconstruction effort comes to a close, Fluor has, perhaps, 100 Americans left in the country and is phasing out the Iraqi jobs.

"The net [result] is a lot less employment for Iraqis," Mr. Oscar said, even though much work remains to be done.

Most U.S.-funded projects are scheduled to be completed by the end of this year, and it is unlikely that any significant new U.S. funds will be forthcoming. Iraqi government ministries, which will be taking over responsibility for the reconstruction effort, tend to issue much smaller contracts that do not interest large U.S. companies.

"Congress has made it clear that it will not provide any more money," said retired Col. Paul Hughes of the United States Institute of Peace. "Those [companies] with existing contracts will fulfill those, while hoping for new funding sources from the international community."

The World Bank said in 2003 that it would take $56 billion to rebuild Iraq's infrastructure. The United States appropriated $18.7 billion toward the effort, much of which has been allotted to specific projects.

The non-U.S. donor community pledged $13.5 billion to help restore Iraq, but few countries are willing to fulfill their pledges amid a raging insurgency and perceived political instability. About $1 billion of that money has been disbursed.

"It takes time to do these things," Mr. Oscar said. "We got rid of their bad government, put them on their way to democracy and jump-started their infrastructure. Can [the Iraqis] pick it up from there? I don't know."

About 3,500 megawatts of electricity have been put online at a cost of $4 billion, Mr. Oscar said, but much of the work has been stopgap, such as refurbishing older plants rather than building modern ones.

"When summer comes, there may be serious power shortages," he said.

Fluor's experience is typical of the large U.S. contractors in the country. They did as much as they could given the security situation -- which absorbed 20 percent of the $18.7 billion -- and the time has come to leave.

"We are not here to rebuild the country," said Brig. Gen. William McCoy, the Army Corps of Engineers commander overseeing the work. "We are here to give Iraq a jump-start."

Some contractors say privately that they do not want to deal with the Iraqi government and that, without the protection and support of the U.S. military, it is simply not safe to work in Iraq.

"The only ones left are the ones who want to work for the [Iraqi] ministries, and there are not many of those because they are so corrupt," said Charles D. Hartman, chairman of the construction and energy committee of the Turkish-U.S. Business Council.

"None of my people are there," said Mr. Hartman, who also consults for a large Turkish company. "None of the big construction groups are down there."

Just last week, fatal attacks were launched against U.S. and Iraqi personal security details in Baghdad and in the southern city of Basra.

Nine bodyguards escorting an engineer working for the Orascom cell-phone company were killed in an ambush in Baghdad on Wednesday, unable to protect their client, who was kidnapped, a physician at the scene told The Washington Times.

The same day, a convoy carrying U.S. civilian security personnel in Basra was hit by a roadside bomb, killing two passengers and seriously wounding a third, the U.S. Embassy reported.

Former Abu Ghraib Guard Calls Top Brass Culpable For Abuse (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

Stepping into the Abu Ghraib prison for the first time, Megan Ambuhl was stunned. There were naked men in dusty cells, male prisoners wearing women's underwear, others hooded and shackled in contorted positions to metal railings.

An enlisted officer giving her a tour of the U.S. facility in October 2003 pointed to a group of detainees chained to a cell. He said the bars had often "been decorated like a Christmas tree," with prisoners as ornaments.

"He explained it was a military intelligence tactic," Ambuhl said in a recent interview, speaking publicly for the first time since the Abu Ghraib prison abuse was disclosed nearly two years ago. "He said it was to break the detainees that were being interrogated. It was clear it was a military intelligence facility. As I saw it, I thought that if they were doing it, it must be all right for them to be doing it."

One of the original seven military police soldiers singled out by the Pentagon for their roles in abusive techniques, Ambuhl is speaking out because she believes the truth has been obscured by high-ranking officials intent on covering up a policy of abuse. Though her defense differs little from the arguments made previously by the defendants' attorneys, Ambuhl's first-person description of the macabre world of Abu Ghraib provides a vivid perspective on how things went out of control at the prison outside of Baghdad, a place where there were few rules and little guidance. Her account also shows that some of the abusive tactics were in place when the MPs arrived at the prison.

Ambuhl has since married one of her fellow MPs -- Charles A. Graner Jr., the man the military has labeled the ringleader of the abusers -- and is on a mission to secure his release from prison.

Now out of the Army, punished with a reduction in rank and a fine for dereliction of duty but no prison time, Ambuhl says the military's top brass have dodged responsibility for what was going on at the prison by scapegoating her and other low-ranking soldiers.

By the time of her tour in 2003, Ambuhl had been in the Army reserves for about a year. She realized she was walking into something she clearly did not understand. Her unit, the 372nd Military Police Company, had been trained to do combat support jobs, not detention. She was ordered to work the night shift and said she asked few questions because she did not know what questions to ask.

Ambuhl says she and other MPs used aggressive techniques against detainees because that is what military intelligence soldiers and civilian interrogators told her to do.

She described a "roster board" that included which military intelligence "treatment" to give to certain detainees and said trainers from the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, taught the MPs how to put detainees in "stress positions." She said military intelligence officials told them to keep detainees naked, embarrass them or make them exercise until they reached exhaustion.

"We were told to handcuff people in uncomfortable positions, to put people on [Meals Ready to Eat] boxes, to pour cold water on them, to make them do physical training," said Ambuhl, who worked the night shift on Tier 1B. "We did what we were told to do."

That defense has not worked well for several of the MPs charged with abuse, most notably Graner, who worked the night shift on Tier 1A, alongside Ambuhl. Graner is serving a 10-year sentence at Fort Leavenworth, Kan.

Ambuhl married Graner last April after his conviction, sending marriage documents to him to sign in prison. The Army has prevented them from meeting or even speaking, alleging that they are co-conspirators.

Ambuhl knows that many people consider him a monster but says that is because the military has done an effective job of painting him as a ringleader and because people do not know him.

"I love being around him," said Ambuhl, 31, of Centreville, who has taken Graner's last name. Their relationship developed while the two were marooned for months at a base in Baghdad after the abuse was discovered and after Graner's relationship with Lynndie R. England, another MP serving a prison sentence for abuse, had ended. "We understand each other. I put my life in his hands day in and day out, and there isn't anyone I'd rather trust with my life, knowing everything I know."

Now back in her job as a histology lab technician, Ambuhl is determined to tell the public her version of events to free Graner. She has built a Web site, which includes documents and discussion, at http://www.supportmpscapegoats.com , where she also has a petition on Graner's behalf.

Military officials "have been trying to conceal that it was a policy that spiraled out of control," Ambuhl said, a rare moment of anger rising in her voice. "They made us out to be the cause of every ill in Iraq."

Paul Boyce, an Army spokesman, said there have been more than 500 investigations into allegations of detainee mistreatment and that the Army is taking each allegation seriously.

"Thus far, allegations against more than 251 military members have been addressed in courts-martial, non-judicial punishment and other adverse administrative actions," Boyce said.

It was in early October 2003 that Ambuhl's unit made its way to Abu Ghraib from an assignment in Hilla, Iraq , where it conducted neighborhood searches for insurgents in what the military calls "law-and-order missions." Ambuhl, a Humvee driver in Hilla, said she received no training in dealing with enemy prisoners of war, was never specifically instructed about the Geneva Conventions and was presented with no standard operating procedures for the prison. In the middle of a war, a world away from Northern Virginia, Ambuhl did not question her superiors.

Ivan L. "Chip" Frederick II, who worked in the prison's higher security facility -- called the "hard site" -- and was also convicted of abusing prisoners, told investigators after his conviction that he, too, was shown the aggressive tactics on his first tour of the prison.

"He didn't say anything about the detainees, how to treat them, etc., but when we went in 1A, I did see detainees handcuffed to the bars and naked," according to Frederick's sworn statement. "I asked him about it and he told me MI ran the section, they didn't want the detainees talking to one another and that was their punishment."

Ambuhl's unit arrived just weeks after Maj. Gen. Geoffrey D. Miller, then Guantanamo Bay's commander, made a visit to Iraq to help set up the Abu Ghraib operation. She said some of the tactics her unit employed -- such as stress positions, the use of dogs, and nudity -- came from teams Miller later sent over. Pentagon investigations have shown that such tactics were in use on high-value detainees held in Cuba almost a year earlier, but also determined that there was no policy of abuse.

Pentagon and Army officials have argued that the abuse at Abu Ghraib was isolated to a few individuals who decided to break the rules.

Ambuhl said some of the images seen in the photos depicted events that occurred every day.

"At the very least, there were a whole slew of people who knew about it," Ambuhl said. "These pictures were in no way hidden. We didn't sneak around pretending this wasn't going on."

Members of Other Government Agencies (OGA) -- a euphemism for the CIA -- were all over the hard site, keeping as many as 100 detainees there for interrogations. Once, two men with OGA had finished interrogating a detainee in a shower room and asked her to go get him.

"They said it would be funny if I burned him with my cigarette," Ambuhl said, adding that she tossed her cigarette before releasing the detainee, who was shackled to a window.

She said in hindsight she should have intervened.

"None of us were in the right frame of mind to get help for this situation," she said. "This was the norm. We didn't know any different. Maybe that's why they sent a combat support unit to do it. We wouldn't know how it was supposed to work, and we wouldn't question it.

"I wish I had done more to stop it," she said.

A Rebel Crack-Up? (TIME)

By tim mcGirk

Even by the standards of al-Qaeda in Iraq, the suicide bombing in Ramadi on Jan. 5 was stunning for its audacity. The bomber had blended into the ranks of Iraqi police recruits outside the Ramadi Glass and Ceramics Works before blowing up his explosive vest, loaded with ball bearings for maximum devastation. The blast killed two U.S. service members and more than 70 Iraqi police recruits--but it also turned out to be a deadly miscalculation by the jihadis and their leader, Abu Mousab al-Zarqawi. Most of the victims were local Sunnis, and they were joining the police force under the protection of tribal chieftains who, with the U.S. military's approval, are trying to impose order over their violent swath of Iraq. After the Jan. 5 blast, according to insurgents, tribal chiefs in Ramadi notified al-Qaeda that they were withdrawing protection in the city for the group's fighters. The jihadis responded by gunning down several prominent Sunni clerics and tribal leaders. Now al-Qaeda fighters who once swaggered through Ramadi are marked men. "It's war," says an Iraqi intelligence officer with contacts among the insurgents.

For months, U.S. officials in Iraq have tried to exploit growing differences over tactics and aims among factions of the insurgency, a push first detailed by TIME in December. Although reports of clashes between Iraqi nationalist groups and religious extremists linked to al-Qaeda remain difficult to quantify, there are signs that at least in some parts of Iraq, the tension is boiling over. Iraqi security sources with contacts in the insurgency told TIME that fighting has erupted in several cities that have long been bastions of the resistance, including Fallujah, Samarra, Latifiya and Mahmoudiya. In one recent incident, according to an Iraqi security source, insurgents wounded a Palestinian member of al-Qaeda, tracked him to a Baghdad hospital and then kidnapped him from his bed and handed him over to U.S. forces. Some Pentagon decision makers believe that the feuding within the insurgency may help U.S. and Iraqi troops quell the terrorist attacks that have made parts of the country ungovernable. "We're starting to see a little bit more every day," says Army Lieut. General Ray Odierno, assistant to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. In places like Ramadi and Fallujah, Odierno says, "we've had some Iraqi insurgents' groups actually put up defenses to protect their people against al-Qaeda forces."

What's behind the rift? Even though some Iraqi insurgent groups have cooperated with jihadist fighters to battle U.S. troops, insurgent leaders say they have grown sick of al-Qaeda's killing innocent Iraqi Shi'ites, whom al-Zarqawi considers infidels. Cracks in al-Qaeda's alliance with the Iraqi groups became more pronounced after the Dec. 15 election. Al-Zarqawi saw the poll as a detour from his goal of turning Iraq into a base from which al-Qaeda could spread terrorism throughout the Middle East and Europe. Many Sunni resistance groups have a narrower focus: ridding Iraq of all occupation forces--U.S. troops and the pro-Iranian militias that slipped across the border. Sunni politicians managed to convince some key rebel groups that unless the Sunni minority voted, the elections would enhance the power of Kurdish and religious Shi'ite parties, some of which have ties to Iran. (Election results released last week showed that Sunni Arab parties will hold 55 seats in the new parliament, up from 17 in the previous one.) Abu Noor al-Iraqi, a leader of the Unified Leadership of Mujahedin, a new amalgam of four nationalist guerrilla outfits, tells TIME that "when al-Zarqawi's group threatened to attack the polling centers, we stood against them."

Since then, the fissures between the nationalists and al-Zarqawi have widened. U.S. political and military officers persuaded some Sunni tribal chiefs to send their youths into the security forces to ensure that Sunnisnot Shi'ite outsiders--would command their cities' police. But in recent meetings with various insurgent groups, says a nationalist field commander near Ramadi, al-Zarqawi's lieutenants made it clear that any Iraqi who joined the security forces was considered the enemy, thus drawing a battle line between the jihadis and their former comrades. In Latifiya, outside Baghdad, al-Zarqawi's fighters pressed Sunnis to desert a mixed Sunni-Shi'ite battalion under U.S. command. When the Sunnis refused, al-Qaeda shelled the camp with mortars. Local insurgents responded by hunting down al-Qaeda's chief for southern Baghdad and killing him and four Syrian fighters.

Al-Zarqawi's men, though, have shown few signs of backing down. In Latifiya last week, al-Qaeda fighters captured and murdered five members of the nationalist Islamic Army in Iraq and assassinated a Sunni colonel. After the backlash in Ramadi, al-Zarqawi's men supposedly retreated into the rocky western deserts but have continued to target local leaders. A senior security officer says jihadist fighters followed a Ramadi chieftain from the powerful Dulaimi tribe into Baghdad on Wednesday; handcuffed him, a nephew and a senior security officer for the western provinces; and executed each of them with a bullet through the head. In Samarra members of the Alboubaz tribe killed four foreign fighters and drove out 11 others after the assassination of a local police chief. After the tribesmen urged Sunni youths to join the local police, al-Zarqawi got his revenge. The instructors weren't going to make the same mistake they had made in Ramadi by allowing recruits to become an easy target for a suicide bomber, so they had them sign up in Baghdad. But al-Zarqawi's men were tipped off. Al-Qaeda ambushed the Sunnis' bus on the road and kidnapped the recruits. Their bodies have yet to be found.

Such clashes don't spell the end of the insurgency. U.S. officials believe that even if terrorist attacks subsided, many Sunni insurgents would continue attacking U.S. and Iraqi forces if they felt their interests were being shortchanged by a Shi'ite-led government in Baghdad. U.S. Senator Jack Reed, who was briefed on the insurgency during a visit to Iraq earlier this month, cautions against giddiness at reports of a backlash against al-Qaeda. "The center of mass of the insurgency is not the foreign terrorists," the Rhode Island Democrat told TIME. "They're a small band able to create spectacular attacks. But the real long-term danger is the Sunnis continuing to fight." The U.S. is still a long way from persuading them to stop.

Baghdad's Big Oil Bust (NSWK)

By Scott Johnson And Michael Hastings

Newsweek, January 23, 2006

Guarding the Fatah oil refinery used to be a pretty straightforward job for Saif Mohammed. Insurgents hit only sporadically, and usually missed important targets. But by early last year, attackers were using rocket-propelled grenades, mortars and heavy machine guns in brazen daylight assaults. They seemed to know about everything and everybody in the refinery. Ambushes were common. "We were afraid to even take vacation and go home," says 26-year-old Mohammed. "The people who worked with us used to tip off the fighters. They wanted to play both sides—to keep their jobs and be informants for the terrorists."

When insurgents killed the man Mohammed shared guard duty with last April, then threatened Mohammed with the same, he quit. In the past year, there have been close to 20 large-scale assaults on Fatah, part of Iraq's largest oil-production complex in Bayji. Last month the Bayji site shut down completely for two weeks. It re-opened with the New Year, but three days later insurgents pinned down a 60-truck fuel convoy in an hourlong gun battle. Across the country, there's a major attack on oil facilities about once every three days. December was the third month in a row that Iraqi oil production went down, and it marked the lowest level of exports since the invasion. At a time when global supplies are stretched to their limits, the Iraqi oil bust helps keep world prices near record highs. But most of all, it's a disaster for efforts to get the country back on its feet.

Only three years ago, before the United States led the invasion of Iraq, the Bush administration dreamed of liberating the country on the cheap. Billions in untapped oil reserves were going to pay for reconstruction and nation-building. But hundreds of billions of American tax dollars later, Iraq's oil still isn't flowing at prewar levels. And in a country where 90 percent of the government's $35 billon in revenues comes from petroleum, the old promise has come to seem a curse. "Some people wish we didn't have all this oil," says National Assembly Speaker Hajim al-Hassani, "because it has brought us all these problems."

What happened? There's certainly no question that the Bush administration, heavily peopled with veterans of the oil industry, focused on the importance of petroleum to Iraq's economy. Even as the rest of Baghdad was opened up to looters in April 2003, the Ministry of Oil was secured by U.S. troops. But no force was put in place to protect the pumps and pipes. In August 2003, the Americans awarded $40 million to a private security firm for the training of 5,500 Iraqis. But the program was quickly terminated as too expensive, say U.S. officials. Then the American military took responsibility for the Oil Protection Force, but guards were never deployed to cover 4,350 miles of pipeline. Finally, last summer, a new 4,000-man unit called the Strategic Infrastructure Battalions started training. But the SIBs quickly fell into bureaucratic cracks. "The ministers have had the hardest time figuring out who the SIBs even work for," says Brig. Gen. William H. McCoy, commander of the Army Corps of Engineers in Baghdad.

Washington has allocated $1.7 billion to finance oil projects across the country, but only $77 million worth of reconstruction has been completed. Oil Minister Ibrahim Mohammed Bahar al-Aloum says U.S confusion and incompetence has kept the work tangled in red tape. "Most of these projects were supposed to be done last year," Bahar al-Aloum told NEWSWEEK. "If U.S. money had been made available, Iraqis could have done the job faster." Yet the United States has signaled it no longer wants to be the principal donor. Other foreign investors are biding their time, hoping some sort of peace can be restored. For workers worried about ambushes, such notions seem lost in a distant future.

U.S. Army Officer Convicted In Death Of Iraqi Detainee (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

An Army interrogator who stuffed an uncooperative Iraqi general into a sleeping bag during questioning in northern Iraq in 2003 was convicted of negligent homicide and negligent dereliction of duty late Saturday after a military jury in Colorado decided the general's death was not murder.

Chief Warrant Officer Lewis E. Welshofer Jr., 43, was on trial for allegedly killing Iraqi Maj. Gen. Abed Hamed Mowhoush, a high-ranking Saddam Hussein loyalist who was believed to have been fueling the Iraqi insurgency in the Qaim area near the Syrian border. Mowhoush died while bound in the Army sleeping bag, which was part of an aggressive interrogation tactic aimed at getting the general to talk.

During his week-long court-martial in Colorado Springs, Welshofer testified that he used the sleeping bag after other attempts to elicit information from Mowhoush failed, and that he believed the "claustrophobic" technique had been approved by his commanders as a "stress position," according to reports by the Associated Press and trial observers with Human Rights First.

Welshofer's supervisor, Army Maj. Jessica Voss, testified that she approved the use of the sleeping bag but was unaware that Welshofer would bind the general with a cord or straddle his chest while questioning him.

Mowhoush, who the Army believed had met with Hussein after the United States invaded Iraq and who had allegedly financed insurgent attacks, was a huge catch for U.S. troops in November 2003. But he proved to be very stubborn, and several attempts over two weeks of interrogations at a facility known as the "Blacksmith Hotel" yielded little information.

According to court testimony and classified accounts of his treatment obtained by The Washington Post, Mowhoush was subjected to harsh beatings by a secret group of Iraqi paramilitaries, code-named Scorpions, who worked with the CIA. One witness who testified behind a curtain during Welshofer's trial was accidentally identified as having worked with the CIA, and witnesses also described how Mowhoush was beaten so badly by the Iraqi natives that he had a hard time breathing and could not walk on his own.

The case not only exposed the secret CIA group but also revealed how U.S. officials were giving unclear guidance regarding interrogation methods during a frustrating part of the war, including at least one message from Baghdad telling interrogators that the "gloves are coming off" and asking for interrogation-technique wish lists. The sleeping-bag technique was one Welshofer wanted to use and for which he sought approval.

"What he was doing he was doing in the open, and he was doing it because he believed the information in fact would save lives," said Frank Spinner, Welshofer's civilian defense attorney, according to the AP. Spinner added that he was disappointed with the verdict. "The verdict recognizes the context in which these events took place. It was a very difficult time in Iraq. There was confusion, and they were not getting clear guidance from headquarters."

David Danzig, manager of Human Rights First's "End Torture Now" campaign and a trial observer, wrote in a daily court-martial blog that Welshofer was trying to sort out guidance from superiors in Baghdad while coming up with interrogation tactics that went beyond outdated Cold War thinking.

"They recognized that what we practiced in the schoolhouse was not working," Danzig quoted Welshofer's testimony. "They were looking for ideas outside the box."

That Welshofer was spared a murder conviction -- and a potential life sentence -- indicates that the jury believed Welshofer did not try kill Mowhoush, but that he should have known the tactic he used could lead to death. Mowhoush stopped breathing during the interrogation, and attempts to revive him failed. The negligent-homicide conviction could result in a maximum three-year prison sentence, and the negligent-dereliction-of-duty conviction an additional three months. Sentencing hearings are to begin today.

Maj. Tiernan Dolan, who prosecuted the case, said that the treatment Welshofer imposed on Mowhoush "could fairly be described as torture" and that he "treated that general worse than you would treat a dog," knowing that he had an obligation to treat the detainee humanely, the AP reported.

Chief Warrant Officer Jefferson L. Williams, an intelligence analyst, and Spec. Jerry L. Loper, a guard, had murder charges against them dropped and received immunity to testify against Welshofer. A fourth soldier, Sgt. 1st Class William Sommer, also had a murder charge dropped and faces possible administrative punishment. All three were present during the interrogation that led to Mowhoush's death.

Interrogator Convicted In Iraqi's Death (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 22, 2006

FT. CARSON, Colo. — A military jury late Saturday convicted an Army interrogator of negligent homicide in the death of an Iraqi general who had been stuffed face-first into a sleeping bag.

After seven hours of deliberations, the six-officer panel found Chief Warrant Officer Lewis E. Welshofer Jr. guilty of the charge, which carries a maximum sentence of three years in military prison. Had he been convicted of murder, he could have been given a life sentence.

The panel also found Welshofer guilty of dereliction of duty.

Welshofer, 43, is the highest-ranking officer tried on murder charges in a case of detainee abuse in the Bush administration's war on terrorism, human rights monitors say.

Welshofer stood mute in his dark-green uniform as he listened to the verdict, swallowing silently.

Prosecutors left the courtroom without commenting, forbidden from talking to reporters by their superiors. Defense attorney Frank Spinner said: "I think the verdict recognizes the context in which these events took place. It was a very difficult time in Iraq."

The verdict in the court-martial came hours after Spinner contended that the interrogator had been heeding an August 2003 e-mail from the office of the U.S. commander in Iraq.

The e-mail cited by the defense, from Capt. William Ponce, said: "The gloves are coming off, gentlemen…. We want these individuals broken. Casualties are mounting."

In a reply to the e-mail, Welshofer wrote that the military needed to loosen its standards, which he said were more useful during World War II. "Today's enemies, especially in southwest Asia, understand force, not … mind games."

Welshofer was rebuked for suggesting violations of the Geneva Convention. But two weeks later, a Sept. 10 memo from the top commander in Iraq authorized several new interrogation techniques, including one that Welshofer says gave him permission to stuff Maj. Gen. Abed Hamed Mowhoush into the sleeping bag, bind him with an electrical cord, straddle his chest and occasionally cover his mouth.

Mowhoush, 57, who had been brutally beaten two days earlier — allegedly by CIA contractors — died in the bag, in a prison in the Iraqi border town of Qaim. The prosecution contended he suffocated; the defense argued he died of a heart attack.

"An interrogator's job, when you're told to take the gloves off and you have techniques called 'Fear Up, Harsh' … is to make the detainee uncomfortable," said Spinner, referring to techniques detailed in the Sept. 10 memo. "Your job is to put [the detainee] under stress."

That does not mean jettisoning decades of standards, countered the lead prosecutor, Maj. Tiernan Dolan. "This case … has been about our officer corps' need to maintain the high ground, especially in a country like Iraq, where our presence may be resented," he told the military panel. "If we can't set an example under harsh circumstances, we'll no longer be who we are."

Saturday's closing arguments encapsulated a debate since the Sept. 11 attacks over how to treat an enemy that does not follow the regular rules of war.

Mowhoush, once a confidant of Saddam Hussein, allegedly was leading the growing insurgency in western Iraq when he surrendered to U.S. forces in November 2003.

Shadowing the closing arguments was the CIA's role in Mowhoush's interrogations.

Welshofer had interrogated the general several times, once slapping him in the chest, before the interviews turned markedly more violent, according to witnesses at the trial. Iraqi nationals apparently in the employ of the CIA entered the interrogation room Nov. 24 and beat Mowhoush for 30 minutes with rubber hoses and insulation.

Welshofer said he did not control that session, but other witnesses testified that he seemed to be directing the questioning. Mowhoush had to be carried back to his cell.

The next day, Welshofer's team took Mowhoush to the prison roof and pinned him down while the lead interrogator poured water on his face, according to multiple witnesses. Welshofer and another interrogator also repeatedly hit the general's elbows — an action Welshofer has characterized as more like tapping, saying it was intended to be an annoyance.

That night, according to a witness who testified from behind a green tarp, Welshofer talked about the latest regulations from Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez, then U.S. commander in Baghdad. The witness, whom an attorney inadvertently implied worked for the CIA, said that Welshofer said "he was pretty sure they were breaking those rules every day."

The next morning, Mowhoush was stuffed into the sleeping bag, and soon died.

Though court rules forbade anyone from naming the CIA during the trial, Spinner questioned why "civilian interrogators" who presided over a beating were not being prosecuted. "How is it that this … witness is so concerned about the Army applying their rules when we know his own organization was so flagrantly violating the rules?" Spinner said.

Spinner also scoffed at criticism of his client's tactics.

"We're putting interrogators on the front line, and even as people are dying, we are saying, 'Get that info,' " Spinner said, but " 'if there are gray areas, back off; take the easy right [action].' And so what if a few more U.S. soldiers die?"

Dolan replied that the urgency of the situation in Iraq did not give Welshofer permission to violate the law. "Because the need for intelligence was so great and soldiers are dying, we should abandon our values?" he asked rhetorically. "That ain't the law and that isn't what makes us what we are. We're a nation of laws."

The sleeping-bag technique had been approved by Welshofer's supervisor, but he said he had not told her that he sat on detainees' chests or occasionally covered their mouths to prevent them from talking over his questions.

He said he'd used the technique a dozen to two dozen times in Iraq.

Dolan said the fact that Welshofer had not told his supervisor all of the details of the sleeping-bag technique showed he had been trying to conceal illegal behavior. The prosecutor called the method "the most dangerous technique in [Welshofer's] bag of unauthorized tricks and techniques."

Dolan emphasized the testimony of two witnesses that the general had stilled for several minutes with Welshofer straddling him, and that Welshofer then stood. The witnesses said that the general gasped as if he had been drowning and that Welshofer expressed relief that he had not died, then flipped him over and sat on his back.

Welshofer denied their account.

The judge, Col. Mark Toole, instructed the jury that even if Welshofer believed the sleeping-bag technique was permitted, that did not clear him of criminal responsibility.

"Authority to use certain interrogation techniques does not justify or make lawful a death," he said. "The killing of a detainee during interrogation is never justified."

David Danziger of Human Rights First, a New York-based group that observed the trial, said the case demonstrated broader problems. "I think it's shocking what Chief Welshofer did, and I think it's shocking what was authorized," he said. "The Army, Sanchez and others opened the door to these abuses by putting out guidance that changed a lot, was unclear and didn't serve the soldiers in the field."

Welshofer's sentencing is expected Monday.

Army Interrogator Is Convicted Of Negligent Homicide (NYT)

By Eric Schmitt

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 - A senior Army interrogator was convicted late Saturday of negligent homicide in the death of an Iraqi general after he shoved the general head-first into a sleeping bag, sat on his chest and put his hands over his mouth.

A six-officer jury at Fort Carson, Colo., found the interrogator, Chief Warrant Officer Lewis E. Welshofer Jr., guilty of the charge, which carries a maximum sentence of three years in a military prison. He was also found guilty of negligent dereliction of duty. He was acquitted of murder and assault charges. Sentencing is scheduled for Monday.

Army prosecutors contended that Mr. Welshofer, 43, a chief interrogator with the Third Armored Cavalry Regiment in Qaim, Iraq, suffocated Maj. Gen. Abed Hamed Mowhoush after wrapping him in the sleeping bag and sitting on him during an interrogation session on Nov. 26, 2003. Prosecutors said Mr. Welshofer knew his interrogation techniques were potentially lethal and against Army standards.

Defense lawyers countered that Mr. Welshofer, a 19-year Army veteran, did nothing illegal and was using a technique that his commander had approved for use on uncooperative prisoners. They also said that General Mowhoush, 57, whom the lawyers said weighed more than 250 pounds, died from an irregular heart rhythm caused by heart disease and stress.

The widely publicized incident has drawn attention from human rights groups as one of the worst instances of abuse against detainees in American custody in Iraq, and because General Mowhoush had been beaten shortly before his death by a team that included one or more C.I.A. contract workers.

The case also underscores the confusion among military interrogators and their superiors over the use of aggressive interrogation techniques in the summer and fall of 2003, when the insurgency in Iraq was rapidly gaining momentum and ferocity, and top Pentagon officials and commanders in Iraq were demanding better intelligence with which to attack the militants.

Testimony at Mr. Welshofer's court-martial last week confirmed that a team of Iraqis had beaten the general two days before he died, but the C.I.A.'s involvement remained largely unaddressed.

At one point, a defense lawyer, Frank Spinner, questioned a witness whose identity was so secret that he was shielded from reporters and others in the courtroom by a green tarp suspended from the ceiling, The Associated Press reported. The witness said that when he spoke to Mr. Welshofer on the day before General Mowhoush died, he was alarmed when Mr. Welshofer told him he thought the Army's interrogation guidelines were being broken every day.

"And you didn't report it to the C.I.A.?" Mr. Spinner asked. He then stopped himself and quickly apologized to the judge.

Mr. Welshofer and his lawyers argued that the Army had provided no guidance for authorized and unauthorized techniques. "It was not clear on what we were to do," Mr. Welshofer testified last Thursday, The Rocky Mountain News reported.

Mr. Welshofer said he received an e-mail message from his unit's commanders saying that there were no rules for interrogations yet, and that top officers were "tired of taking casualties and that the gloves were coming off." He said he never received memorandums from Sept. 14 and Oct. 12, which first authorized the use of "stress positions" but called for the prior approval of Lt. Gen. Ricardo S. Sanchez, the top general in Iraq at the time.

As a result, Mr. Welshofer said he escalated his tactics over the course of several interviews to frighten the general, who was providing little useful information. Mr. Welshofer and another interrogator designed the sleeping bag technique as a last resort, believing it would create a claustrophobic effect on a prisoner, Mr. Spinner said in a telephone interview on Sunday. A small hole was cut in the bottom of the sleeping bag to allow the detainee to breathe.

General Mowhoush was considered a prized intelligence prospect. He had been commander of air defenses in western Iraq under Saddam Hussein, and military intelligence officials believed he was a suspected leader and financier of the insurgency there, providing money and housing for fighters coming in from Syria. General Mowhoush had surrendered to military authorities two weeks before his death, saying he wanted to secure the release of his four sons in American custody.

But the military prosecutor, Maj. Tiernan Dolan, said Mr. Welshofer abused General Mowhoush, treating him "worse than you would treat a dog," The A.P. reported.

An Army spokesman, Paul Boyce, said in an e-mail message on Sunday that more than 500 investigations had examined allegations of detainee mistreatment. Thus far, he said, allegations against at least 251 military members have been addressed in courts-martial, nonjudicial punishment and other administrative penalties.

Workers Allege Halliburton Knew Their Water Was Foul (WP)

By Larry Margasak

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

Troops and civilians at a U.S. military base in Iraq were exposed to contaminated water last year, and employees for the responsible contractor, Halliburton Co., could not get their company to inform camp residents, according to interviews and internal company documents.

Halliburton, the company formerly headed by Vice President Cheney, disputes the allegations about water problems at Camp Junction City, in Ramadi, even though they were made by its own employees and documented in company e-mails.

"We exposed a base camp population (military and civilian) to a water source that was not treated," said a July 15, 2005, memo written by William Granger, the official for Halliburton's KBR subsidiary who was in charge of water quality in Iraq and Kuwait.

"The level of contamination was roughly 2x the normal contamination of untreated water from the Euphrates River," Granger wrote in one of several documents. The Associated Press obtained the documents from Senate Democrats who are holding a public inquiry into the allegations today.

Sen. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.), who is scheduled to chair the session, held a number of similar inquiries last year on contracting abuses in Iraq. He said Democrats were acting on their own because they had not been able to persuade Republican committee chairmen to investigate.

Ben Carter, Halliburton's former water-treatment expert at Camp Junction City, said he discovered the problem last March, a statement confirmed by his e-mail the day after he tested the water. Though bottled water was available for drinking, the contaminated water was used for virtually everything else, including handwashing, laundry, bathing and making coffee, Carter said.

Another former Halliburton employee who worked at the base, Ken May of Louisville, said there were numerous instances of diarrhea and stomach cramps.

A spokeswoman for Halliburton said its own inspection found neither contaminated water nor medical evidence to substantiate reports of illnesses at the base.

The company now operates its own water-treatment plant there, spokeswoman Melissa Norcross said.

DOJ_NMG_0010027

A military medical unit that visited Camp Ramadi in mid-April found nothing out of the ordinary in terms of water quality, said Marine Corps Maj. Tim Keefe, a military spokesman. Water-quality testing records from May 23 show the water within normal parameters, he said. "The allegations appear not to have merit," Keefe said.

Granger's July 15 memo said the exposure had gone on for "possibly a year" and added, "I am not sure if any attempt to notify the exposed population was ever made."

The first memo on the problem -- written by Carter to Halliburton officials on March 24, 2005 -- was an "incident report" from tests Carter performed the previous day.

"It is my opinion that the water source is without question contaminated with numerous micro-organisms, including Coliform bacteria," Carter wrote. "There is little doubt that raw sewage is routinely dumped upstream of intake much less than the required 2 mile distance.

"Therefore, it is my conclusion that chlorination of our water tanks while certainly beneficial is not sufficient protection from parasitic exposure."

Carter said he resigned in early April after Halliburton officials did not take any action to inform the camp population.

The water expert said he told company officials at the base that they would have to notify the military. "They told me it was none of my concern and to keep my mouth shut," he said.

On at least one occasion, Carter said, he spoke to the chief military surgeon at the base, asking him whether he was aware of stomach problems afflicting people. He said the surgeon told him he would look into it.

"They brushed it under the carpet," Carter said. "I told everyone, 'Don't take showers; use bottled water.' "

A July 14, 2005, memo showed that Halliburton's public relations department knew of the problem.

"I don't want to turn it into a big issue right now," staff member Jennifer Dellinger wrote in the memo, "but if we end up getting some media calls I want to make sure we have all the facts so we are ready to respond."

Hussein's Trial Is Set To Resume, But Who Will Preside? (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Jan. 22 - Two days before the trial of Saddam Hussein is set to resume after a month's recess, confusion surrounds the tribunal that is trying him, with the identity of the judge who will preside in court still uncertain.

The judge who has become the trial's most public face, Rizgar Muhammad Amin, submitted a letter of resignation this month, saying he was fed up with criticism by high-ranking Iraqi officials who wanted him to be tougher with Mr. Hussein. A colleague on the five-judge panel, Said al-Hammash, is prepared to replace Judge Amin if he does not return Tuesday.

But in recent days President Jalal Talabani and other Iraqi leaders, apparently eager to dispel the widespread impression that Judge Amin was forced off the case through political pressure, have urged him to stay on. The tribunal has not accepted Judge Amin's resignation. An American official who is close to the tribunal said Sunday that he did not know which judge would be presiding.

"We'll know for sure on Tuesday morning at about 10 o'clock," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity in an effort to avoid the appearance of interfering in the tribunal's decisions.

Judge Amin's potential successor is facing troubles of his own. Last week, a senior Iraqi official petitioned the court to bar Judge Hammash from presiding at the trial, saying the judge was a former member of Mr. Hussein's Baath Party. The official, Ali Feisal al-Lami, is a director of the de-Baathification commission, set up to purge former high-level Baathists from public office. Judge Hammash has denied that he was a Baathist.

The office of Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari has told the tribunal to ignore Mr. Lami's petition, saying he has no authority over the judges. But one tribunal official said he believed that to avoid controversy, the body might choose to pass over Judge Hammash even if Judge Amin resigns. The official spoke on condition of anonymity, saying he was not authorized to speak publicly.

The judicial disputes have threatened to bring further disarray to a trial that has already seen its share of chaos. Some judges on the tribunal say they fear that Mr. Hussein and his fellow defendants, who have unleashed repeated broadsides against the tribunal, will pick up on the questions surrounding Judge Amin's resignation and stir further conflict.

The trial, which started on Oct. 19, will resume with more testimony from witnesses to the massacre of 148 men and boys in the Shiite town of Dujail, north of Baghdad, in 1982 after an assassination attempt there against Mr. Hussein. Former members of Mr. Hussein's government could be among those who are called to testify in the next two weeks, the American official said.

The current phase of the trial, the first of several expected cases against Mr. Hussein and other top officials in his government, is likely to last at least until the end of May, the official said.

As Iraqi parties positioned themselves on Sunday after the release of election results, Tariq al-Hashemi, a leader of Iraq's largest Sunni Arab political coalition, said Sunni Arabs would not accept the inclusion in a new government of any official who was involved in violence against Sunnis by the Shiite-led security forces. The warning appeared to be aimed at Bayan Jabr, the current interior minister, who is widely believed by Sunnis to have orchestrated death squads that have carried out killings.

Mr. Hashemi's coalition, the Iraqi Consensus Front, won 44 of the new Parliament's 275 seats in the December elections, and is expected to be part of a government with the Shiite and Kurdish alliances. But at a news conference on Sunday, Mr. Hashemi also said the group's leaders would consult with party members before deciding whether to be part of a government or the opposition.

Insurgent violence left at least a dozen people dead across Iraq on Sunday. In Baquba, the bodies of five policemen, some mutilated, were left outside a hospital, police officials said. In Balad Ruz, northeast of Baghdad, insurgents fired rocket-propelled grenades at the home of a police officer, killing five of his relatives but leaving the officer unharmed, the police said.

North of Baghdad in Hawija, the bodies of a prominent Sunni Arab tribal leader and his son were found shot to death with their hands bound. The leader, Ibrahim Ali al-Neami, 75, and his 28 year-old son, Ziad, were last seen Saturday leaving their home south of Kirkuk for a funeral in Hawija, the police said.

The last of three Reuters journalists who had been detained by the American military in Iraq was freed Sunday after nearly eight months without being charged, the agency reported. Samir Muhammad Noor, a 30 year-old cameraman, was arrested in June. Two other Reuters journalists, also Iraqis, were released Jan. 15, also without being charged.

After Bode Miller's Downhill Turn, Two Weeks On The Lift (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

Bad-boy behavior pays off, big time.

Skiing star Bode Miller goes on "60 Minutes," shoots off his mouth about getting drunk before a big competition, rips the CBS program for airing his remarks, holds a news conference to apologize and winds up on the cover of Time and Newsweek. Not exactly a downhill trajectory.

Journalists can't resist a troublemaking athlete who produces a blizzard of controversy instead of the usual sports cliches. And in the media world, doing bad things only fuels your celebrity, as Martha Stewart's post-jail television and radio gigs make clear.

"Skiing's Wild Child," declared Time. "Fast, loose and seemingly out of control," with "a smirking disrespect for the media," gushed Newsweek. In the run-up to the Olympics, it was Miller Time.

The storm began days before the Jan. 8 edition of "60 Minutes," with a CBS press release headlined "Bode Miller on Skiing Drunk." Miller told Bob Simon about his Saturday night drinking, saying: "There's been times when I've been in really tough shape at the top of the course" and that it's hard to ski "when you're wasted." It was presented as a light moment, but there was no missing the potential for a media avalanche.

While some sportswriters dismissed this as less than shocking, Ron Judd wrote in the Seattle Times: "Miller's confession to skiing drunk was highly uncouth, and it makes you want to slap the guy upside the head." Ray Grass wondered in Salt Lake City's Deseret Morning News: "Tell me, please, why anyone would go before millions of viewers and brag about being 'wasted' in the starting gate?"

Maybe because all publicity is good publicity?

Miller's agent, Lowell Taub, complained about an "out-of-context and salacious headline involving drunkenness." Miller, in his Denver Post blog, called "60 Minutes" "probably the most reputable and prestigious news program in the U.S., and I told them the story to test their integrity. . . . If they were interested in doing the right thing, or doing what they should be doing in terms of painting a role model for kids, they would have left that stuff out."

Say wha' ? Miller says on camera that he skis impaired to see whether television's oldest newsmagazine would protect him by cutting it out?

In any event, the head of U.S. skiing was not amused, calling Miller's comments "unacceptable" and "irresponsible." Under pressure, Miller summoned journalists in Switzerland and apologized to his friends, family and supporters.

"I don't need the media," Miller boasted to Newsweek, but he's too smart to believe that he could have amassed millions of dollars without all the journalistic adulation.

There was a time when an athlete's reputation might have been marred by such frank talk about drinking and hangovers, but that now seems very 20th century. Miller already has a Sirius satellite radio show and the kind of swaggering image that money can't buy. If he misbehaves at the Olympics, he'll probably get his own cable show.Thumbs Down

Fred Barnes, executive editor of the Weekly Standard, is pretty conservative. And his forthcoming book, "Rebel-in-Chief: Inside the Bold and Controversial Presidency of George W. Bush," sounds like it would appeal to the right. But the Conservative Book Club has not only declined to offer the Barnes volume, it has also attacked the book.

"Rebel-in-Chief" is filled with "empty puffery," writes book club Editor-in-Chief Jeffrey Rubin. Barnes is too favorable toward "all those things that Bush does to drive traditional conservatives to despair" in a way that "call[s] into question his own understanding of conservatism. . . . Fred Barnes isn't doing the president -- or the country -- any favors by celebrating his worst political tendencies."

Barnes says he doesn't believe that an unsuccessful bid for his book by Regnery Publishing, owned by the book club's parent company, was a factor in the slam. "I guess they don't like Bush, or me, either," he says of the club. "But going out of the way to say 'don't read this book' is a bit unusual."Explosive Story

In reporting last week that the FBI was making progress in identifying the origins of homemade bombs used against Americans in Iraq, CBS News agreed to withhold some details at the bureau's request.

Rome Hartman, executive producer of the "CBS Evening News," says CBS News President Sean McManus and correspondent Jim Stewart spoke with FBI officials who "made the case that putting in certain details might in their view jeopardize American lives. They felt very strongly about it."

During a "very spirited" internal debate, Hartman says, the FBI's case "felt to me, and to Sean and Jim in the end, to be a pretty persuasive argument. You ought to err on the side of discretion and caution." Stewart's report mentioned that CBS was withholding part of the story.Blogging Manifestos

The lightning-quick online pundits known as bloggers are turning to a far older and slower technology: book publishing.

In his forthcoming "An Army of Davids," Instapundit's Glenn Reynolds casts bloggers as an increasingly influential check on the mainstream media: "Where before journalists and pundits could bloviate at leisure, offering illogical analysis or citing 'facts' that were in fact false, now the Sunday morning op-eds have already been dissected on Saturday night, within hours of their appearing on newspapers' Web sites." He also predicts a backlash from "Old Media guys" who resent the scrutiny.

Reynolds praises "flash media" -- bloggers who spontaneously organize around a sudden event -- and says that "even when Big Media snubs such coverage, bloggers let hundreds of thousands of people read about, see and sometimes even experience via video a story that they would otherwise miss."

Daily Kos founder Markos Moulitsas, who speaks regularly with Democratic leaders, will soon publish "Crashing the Gate," his indictment of "a progressive movement that is failing to keep up with the times," including "issue groups that don't realize it's no longer 1975 or even 1995" and "an incestuous relationship between the party committees and consultants that serve themselves more than our candidates."

Urging people to pre-order the book online, Moulitsas writes: "Help us debut on the best seller list. Wingers like [Ann] Coulter get an automatic berth on the best seller list thanks to TWO conservative book clubs (our first doesn't launch until March or so) and bulk purchases from organizations. We don't have those advantages. But we've got you guys."

Andrew Sullivan, one of the blogging pioneers, is finishing "The Conservative Soul: How We Lost It; How to Get It Back." He calls it "an attempt to grapple with the way in which American conservatism has shifted in recent years from an emphasis on small government, individual freedom and a 'leave-us-alone' coalition into a big-spending, big-government force for correcting human immorality and delivering us from foreign evil."

Why do folks with instant access to an audience labor over manuscripts? Sullivan puts it this way: "The blog is a short form. It's provisional and meandering. A book is a longer project, it requires sustained concentration on one line of argument or one central topic. I find it really hard to flip from one mode of writing to another. . . . So right now, I try not to blog at all until I have spent a few hours on the book."If Only the Democrats Had Known

The Exponent, the student paper at Purdue University, carried a routine wire-service item that began: "Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito told senators Monday that good judges don't have an agenda." The final sentence said: "His motive for shooting John Paul in the abdomen on May 13, 1981, remains unclear."

A subsequent correction, as noted by the Web site Regret the Error, said nothing about the charge of attempted assassination. The item, the paper said, merely "contained a sentence that was not intended to be part of the brief."

Jill Carroll: Chorus Of Support From Muslim Leaders (CSM)

The Christian Science Monitor, January 23, 2006

A delegation from the Council on American-Islamic Relations arrived in Baghdad Saturday, adding its voice to what is described as an unprecedented outpouring of Muslim support for the release of American reporter Jill Carroll.

"The kidnapping of Jill Carroll does not benefit the kidnappers," said Nihad Awad, executive director of the Washington-based group that represents US mosques and Islamic associations. "She has been friendly and respectful of the Iraqi people, not an enemy," he added.

At press time Sunday, David Cook, the Monitor's Washington bureau chief, said that there has been no new information about Ms. Carroll. "We are continuing to watch developments in Iraq and doing all we can to speed Jill's release, unharmed, to her family."

Also joining the Muslim voices calling for Carroll's release was Yasser al-Sirri, director of the London-based Islamic Observation Centre. He called on the "Brigades of Vengeance" - the group that is demanding Iraqi women prisoners be let out - to release Carroll rather than tarnish the image of Islam.

A spokesman in Iraq's Justice Ministry said Sunday that it still expects US forces to release six of nine Iraqi women prisoners this week, despite US comments to the contrary.

"The Iraqi detainees will be released within a week from today," the Justice Ministry spokesman told Reuters. A US military spokesman declined comment.

US troops have raided homes in several areas of Baghdad in recent days. "All of a sudden we heard an explosion. They blew open the front door and fired stun grenades into the living room. They rounded us up and threw me on the floor and a soldier put me on the floor and kept his boot on my back," Hamdiya Sabri told Reuters.

The US soldiers asked if the family members knew anything about the neighbors and then they asked about Carroll. "They told us that they had a tip that the American journalist was being held in this area and asked me what I thought of her," said Thamir Nazih. "I said I was sympathetic about Jill Carroll and that she is innocent. Then they asked me if I knew any terrorists - this only after they stormed the house and humiliated my family."

After the search, a US soldier promised $300 compensation and apologized. The soldiers took away Jassim, the youngest son of the family, saying he would be questioned and freed in a day or two.

On Friday, Adnan al-Dulaimi of the Sunni Iraqi Accordance Front, a leading Sunni political group, held a press conference to denounce the kidnapping. "I am asking you to release this woman. By kidnapping her, you are insulting me. You're insulting the work that I've been doing for Iraq. To the men who are kidnapping her: You know that the woman has a special status in our religion, our culture, and our principles. I'm asking those men who have kidnapped her to release her unconditionally.... I have worked hard in the past to secure the release of Iraqi prisoners. The arrest of this noble journalist will complicate my efforts to release Iraqi prisoners."

Abduction Of U.S. Reporter Underscores Risks In Iraq (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Jan. 22 - The tools of her trade were a notebook, pen, Islamic head covering and Arabic name to pass unnoticed through Iraqi streets.

Together with an interpreter and a driver, Jill Carroll, a 28-year-old American journalist, was able to slip quietly inside Iraqi society, telling stories about the lives of the Iraqis she met.

But on the morning of Jan. 7, Ms. Carroll was kidnapped, seized by gunmen in Baghdad who blocked her car and killed her interpreter as he tried to call for help.

Now her threadbare room in an inexpensive hotel here is the command center that other reporters are using to try to secure her release.

The seizure of Ms. Carroll, whose image from a video with armed men at her side is now familiar in many American households, has underscored the risks to foreigners of working here, particularly freelance journalists, who operate with little or no protection.

When Ms. Carroll arrived in 2003 - fresh from Arabic lessons and a job at an English-language newspaper in Jordan - Iraq was wide open. Journalists drove around in their own cars, talking to Iraqis as they emerged in a daze from cramped lives under Saddam Hussein.

"You were eating at restaurants," said Ashraf Khalil, a reporter for The Los Angeles Times who was working in Iraq as a freelancer at the time and knows Ms. Carroll. "You were hailing cabs at night. You were speaking English on the street."

Freelancing was not easy. Mr. Khalil described how Ms. Carroll and he discovered a $5 special of Middle Eastern salad and a hard boiled egg with beef at a nearby hotel. Her hotel, the Musafir, was one of the cheapest frequented by Western reporters: two-room suites were shared for $30 per person per night.

But Ms. Carroll, who graduated from the University of Massachusetts in 1999 with a bachelor's degree in journalism, was glad for the chance to work on such a big story.

She described the motivation in an article for The American Journalism Review published last year. "The cubicle walls are closing in," she wrote. "You'd rather jump off a cliff than cover one more zoning board meeting and just when one of the biggest stories in years is developing in Iraq, those foreign correspondent aspirations seem ever further out of reach."

"There's only one way out," Ms. Carroll wrote. "Pull up stakes, clean out that savings account and get on a plane to Baghdad."

As a woman, Ms. Carroll had a special advantage. She could dress in the Islamic head covering, a hijab, and the long black cloak, the abaya, and move around Baghdad's streets relatively unnoticed. Women who were reporters often saw themselves as less vulnerable to kidnappings than their male colleagues, partly because of the disguise afforded by Iraqi dress.

"We can put on our scarves and abayas," said Jackie Spinner, a reporter for The Washington Post. "She felt that it was an extra security blanket. I definitely felt that way."

Ms. Carroll got to know the story well. She went into Iraqi homes. She shopped for clothes in Baghdad. She used her Arabic and went by the name Zaineb.

As the months passed, Baghdad became increasingly dangerous, and news organizations began to require reporters to travel with two cars - a passenger car and a backup or "chase" car - and armed guards. In September 2004, two American engineers and a Briton were kidnapped and beheaded. A month later, a British-Iraqi aid official and longtime Baghdad resident, Margaret Hassan, was kidnapped and later killed.

But Ms. Carroll, who had begun to write regularly for The Christian Science Monitor, continued to work with her small team. She wrote in her Journalism Review article that it seemed safer that way.

It is still unclear precisely what happened on Jan. 7. At least one witness said the kidnappers mistakenly drove down a dead-end street, suggesting that the seizure was not well planned and that another car could have helped stop them.

In Iraq, danger presents itself on a daily basis, and the taking of Ms. Carroll, who was described by her colleagues as cautious, probably had as much to do with circumstance as anything else.

The Monitor was one of the few American news organizations with a bureau in Baghdad that did not use a Western security adviser. The paper's Washington bureau chief, David Cook, said by telephone on Sunday that the paper left decisions of whether to use guards or a chase car up to the reporters, and that Ms. Carroll, as a freelance reporter, had the same access to these things as did staff employees.

Still, Ms. Carroll talked to the paper's foreign editor about security issues on more than one occasion, Mr. Cook said. She is covered under a life insurance policy paid for by the paper while she is on assignment, he said.

Freelance writers who have worked in Baghdad expressed concerns about returning solo. Kimberly Johnson, who worked here this summer, said she had been told by one large American news organization that it could not accept her articles because it could not pay for adequate security. David Enders, a freelance writer based in New York, said an assignment with an American magazine had fallen through, apparently because of security concerns.

"You can go days and weeks and there's no significant event," Ms. Spinner said. "Then something happens and you are reminded again that you are in the most dangerous place the press has ever known."

In Iraq, Specter Of Kidnapping Keeps Journalists On Edge (USAT)

USA Today, January 23, 2006

In September 2004, Wall Street Journal reporter Farnaz Fassihi wrote in an e-mail to friends that reporting from Baghdad "was like being under virtual house arrest."

The threat of bombings and kidnappings, she said, precluded her from living anything close to a normal personal or professional life.

"My most pressing concern every day is not to write a (great) story but to stay alive and make sure our Iraqi employees stay alive," she wrote in her e-mail, which got national attention after it was posted on websites. "In Baghdad I am a security personnel first, a reporter second."

On Sunday, kidnapped freelance reporter Jill Carroll began her third week of captivity in Iraq with no further word on her status after Tuesday's video in which her captors threatened to kill her in 72 hours unless the U.S. military released female Iraqi prisoners.

And Fassihi says that although the threat level for reporters in Iraq has ebbed and flowed, not much had changed. Iraq, she says, is a dangerous place, especially for American journalists.

"I'm terrified for Jill. I'm terrified for everyone I know in Baghdad," Fassihi says from New York, where she is awaiting a new assignment in Beirut after three years in Baghdad. She left there last month.

Carroll is the 36th reporter to be kidnapped since April 2004, according to the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists. Six of them have been killed. Her abduction has resonated with the tightknit press corps in Baghdad, where she is well-known.

Her kidnapping has prompted media outlets to revisit security precautions and share information with each other, just as network and cable news outlets do in set weekly meeting, says Chuck Lustig, who directs ABC's foreign coverage.

News outlets know "that at any time you could get a phone call saying something has happened," Lustig says. "Every time something like this happens, you review your security procedures to make sure you are doing everything you can to make your people safe."

NBC News correspondent Richard Engel, who has spent three years in Iraq, says reporters there go through stages about the possibility of being kidnapped. "The first is, 'It'll never happen to me.' The next is, 'It might happen.' The third is, 'I've been here long enough it's probably going to happen.' And the fourth is, 'I've got to get out of here.' "

Engel describes himself as being between “two and three.” He says, “I don't think anyone who is there is under the impression that it couldn't be them.”

CBS News correspondent Lara Logan, who has traveled back and forth to Iraq frequently in recent years, says, “Your whole ability to function is affected by the possibility of being kidnapped, and you trying to limit the possibility of anything like that happening to you.”

Logan, who reported on Carroll's abduction on Friday's CBS Evening News, says she looks at Carroll's case “as a story, but also, ‘What did she do that I cannot do the next time I'm there?' ”

Though print reporters, by wearing local clothes and keeping a low profile, can often do their work without attracting attention, TV correspondents and photojournalists have a harder time, because “when you pull out the camera, the game is over,” Logan says.

No reporter — print or electronic — is safe in Iraq, Engel says. “In Iraq you can't do anything privately. You can't move around the country and not have people know where you are going. People talk; you can't keep secrets very well.”

But, notes Cox Newspapers correspondent Larry Kaplow, “the situation is still much worse for Iraqis than for us. There are about 10 to 30 kidnappings of Iraqis daily, according to officials. It's dangerous for everyone, and you can get in trouble even if you do everything right.”

History Lessons (WT)

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, Dec. 16, 1998:

As a member of the House Intelligence Committee, I am keenly aware that the proliferation of chemical and biological weapons is an issue of grave importance to all nations. Saddam Hussein has been engaged in the development of weapons of mass destruction technology which is a threat to countries in the region and he has made a mockery of the weapons inspection process. The responsibility of the United States in this conflict is to eliminate weapons of mass destruction, to minimize the danger to our troops and to diminish the suffering of the Iraqi people... I believe in negotiated solutions to international conflict. This is, unfortunately, not going to be the case in this situation where Saddam Hussein has been a repeat offender, ignoring the international community's requirement that he come clean with his weapons program.

Pentagon Hails Military Meeting (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 23, 2006

Pentagon officials say this month's closed-door conference of the military's top field commanders was gratifying, describing it as an uninhibited exchange of ideas rather than a fixed-agenda meeting monopolized by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Officials said Mr. Rumsfeld, four-star generals and admirals, and top civilians brainstormed over two main topics: how to fight the war on Islamic terrorists and how to reconfigure the military for future threats.

"Four years ago, we could not have had a discussion like this without people getting into parochial interests," said a senior defense official. "Rumsfeld didn't steer the discussion. They all went at it."

The Pentagon conference room was full of top brass Mr. Rumsfeld handpicked during the past five years in a search for out-of-the-box thinkers who would "lean forward" in a war against Islamic terrorists.

It is clearly Mr. Rumsfeld's Pentagon today, but it was not always that way. Mr. Rumsfeld inherited Joint Chiefs and four-star combatant commanders, in this case ones promoted by President Clinton. "Rummy would have to drive the discussion at earlier commanders' conferences," said the defense official.

In those days, Mr. Rumsfeld did not always share his thinking with them, and in some cases had outright clashes, such as with Gen. Eric Shinseki, the former Army Chief of Staff. Mr. Rumsfeld solved his Army problem by picking Mr. Shinseki's successor from the ranks of the retired. The new chief, Gen. Peter Schoomaker, had worked closely with Mr. Rumsfeld on transforming U.S. Special Operations Command.

At the Jan. 9-11 biannual commanders' conference, around-the-table discussions kicked off once the Joint Staff -- the planning and operations arm of the Joint Chiefs of Staff -- presented a slide show on a particular topic. There were candid back-and-forths about both successes and failures.

One failure, two defense officials said, is that Mr. Rumsfeld still does not think the Pentagon is doing a good job of destroying al Qaeda cells planning attacks on Americans. He has come to call the problem "find, fix and finish -- in other words finding their general location, getting an exact fix on their whereabouts, and finishing them by killing or capturing them.

"It's got to get a lot better," said a second senior defense official. "The conference got very passionate. It's passion with a purpose."

Asked which general talked the most about the need for intelligence, the source declined to name names, but said it was "the commander where most of the action is right now." That would be Gen. John Abizaid, who heads U.S. Central Command. He is overseeing wars in Afghanistan and Iraq and is in charge of the military's hunt for Osama bin Laden.

Sources said Mr. Rumsfeld already has improved Pentagon intelligence collection by beefing up the Defense Intelligence Agency and giving its agents more power; naming an undersecretary of defense for intelligence; empowering special operations forces to spy; and embedding intelligence officers in newly configured Army combat brigades.

The conference was composed of the most powerful military men in the world. Besides Mr. Rumsfeld, there were the nine combatant commanders from Europe, the Middle East, Asia and other commands; the four service chiefs; the Joint Chiefs chairman and vice chairman; defense undersecretaries and assistant secretaries; and the services' civilian secretaries.

All of them were picked by Mr. Rumsfeld, some after closely working with the secretary in other roles. Gen. Abizaid, for example, had directed the Joint Staff, putting him in frequent contact with the chief.

The conference typically convened at 8 a.m. and lasted until the late afternoon.

Mr. Rumsfeld's spokesman, Larry Di Rita, said of the conference, "It's freewheeling, but it's not unstructured. When this group gets together, it's not like some off-site corporate retreat. It is people focusing on real problems and working off an agreed set of assumptions."

Fighting Ourselves In Falluja (NYT)

By Bing West

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

Newport, R.I.

THE persistence of the insurgency in Iraq has divided America in a way not seen since Vietnam. Now the blame game among the principals has begun. The former presidential envoy to Iraq, L. Paul Bremer III, has written in his new memoir that he informed President Bush that the military did not have "a strategy to win."

Quite. The lesson the Pentagon should learn from Iraq is to avoid another L. Paul Bremer. This is less a reflection on Mr. Bremer, who accurately described himself as "the American viceroy" in Iraq and "the president's man," than on the position he and the American military commanders in Iraq were placed in by the White House's failure to put one person in charge.

In 1967, when confusion among military and civilian officials in Vietnam was undermining the war effort, President Lyndon B. Johnson placed all civilian reconstruction and security functions under the top general, William Westmoreland, insuring unity of command under Westmoreland's successor Creighton Abrams. Confronting similar confusion in Iraq, President Bush unfortunately assigned to the military the responsibility for security but gave Mr. Bremer the authority to shape, recruit, train and finance the Iraqi military and police.

Mr. Bremer writes that he believed the Iraqi military should not "have internal security duties" and that the police should be trained by American civilians. But not enough civilians ever arrived to do the job. Mr. Bremer was unable to design a strategy for building up the Iraqi military and police. This failure extended the period in which the American military had to do the fighting while also taking over the training of both Mr. Bremer's new army and the police.

This disunity of command reached its tragic apex in the spring of 2004, during what Mr. Bremer calls "the most critical crisis of the occupation." When four American contractors were killed and their bodies mutilated in Falluja on March 31, Mr.

Bremer joined with Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and Gen. John Abizaid, the commander of American forces, in ordering the fractious city seized.

Five days later, however, Mr. Bremer changed his mind after Sunni members of the Iraqi Governing Council threatened to quit in protest. He prevailed on General Abizaid to order the Marine battalions that were advancing through Falluja to halt. Mr. Bremer acknowledged that this "temporary cessation of offensive action" would be "rough on the military."

Secretary Rumsfeld, for his part, disagreed with the halt and urged General Abizaid to finish the attack. But as the military prepared to end things quickly, Mr. Bremer changed his mind about the "temporary" cessation. He told President Bush that the assault would "collapse the entire political process"; the president sided with his viceroy and told General Abizaid "to let the political situation there develop."

Develop it did. The insurgents' morale soared and their defenses toughened. According to Pentagon reports, 21 marines were killed around the city in April, and 25 were killed over the next six months as Falluja degenerated into Taliban-style rule and became the lair of the terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. And then 70 American soldiers and marines were killed in the main assault on Falluja that eventually took place in November. The cost of dithering: 116 American lives. Because of the stop-and-start decision-making, Falluja developed into the fiercest battle yet of the Iraqi war.

The lines of authority, responsibility and communications to the president were fatally tangled. The establishment of two independent chains of command in the midst of war guaranteed error and human loss. The result was indeed "rough on the military." Ask the soldiers and marines who fought at Falluja.

The singular lesson in war is to put either the civilian viceroy or (better) the general in charge, but not both.

Iraq's Power Vacuum (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

In the State of the Union address, President Bush will surely assert, to choreographed applause, that he has a strategy for victory in Iraq. I don't believe him. In fact, I believe that three years into the conflict his administration refuses to admit defeat but has given up even trying to win.

To explain myself, let me tell you some stories about electricity.

Power shortages are a crucial issue for ordinary Iraqis, and for the credibility of their government. As Muhsin Shlash, Iraq's electricity minister, said last week, "When you lose electricity the country is destroyed, nothing works, all industry is down and terrorist activity is increased."

Mr. Shlash has reason to be strident. In today's Iraq, blackouts are the rule rather than the exception. According to Agence France-Presse, Baghdad and "much of the central regions" - in other words, the areas where the insurgency is most active and dangerous - currently get only between two and six hours of power a day.

Lack of electricity isn't just an inconvenience. It prevents businesses from operating, destroys jobs and generates a sense of demoralization and rage that feeds the insurgency.

So why is power scarcer than ever, almost three years after Saddam's fall? Sabotage by insurgents is one factor. But as an analysis of Iraq's electricity shortage in The Los Angeles Times last month showed, the blackouts are also the result of some incredible missteps by U.S. officials.

Most notably, during the period when Iraq was run by U.S. officials, they decided to base their electricity plan on natural gas: in order to boost electrical output, American companies were hired to install gas-fired generators in power plants across Iraq. But, as The Los Angeles Times explains, "pipelines needed to transport the gas" - that is, to supply gas to the new generators - "weren't built because Iraq's Oil Ministry, with U.S. encouragement, concentrated instead on boosting oil production." Whoops.

Meanwhile, in the early days of the occupation U.S. officials chose not to raise the prices of electricity and fuel, which had been kept artificially cheap under Saddam, for fear of creating unrest. But as a first step toward their dream of turning Iraq into a free-market utopia, they removed tariffs and other restrictions on the purchase of imported consumer goods.

The result was that wealthy and middle-class Iraqis rushed to buy imported refrigerators, heaters and other power-hungry products, and the demand for electricity surged - with no capacity available to meet that surge in demand. This caused even more blackouts.

In short, U.S. officials thoroughly botched their handling of Iraq's electricity sector. They did much the same in the oil sector. But the Bush administration is determined to achieve victory in Iraq, so it must have a plan to rectify its errors, right?

Um, no. Although there has been no formal declaration, all indications are that the Bush administration, which once made grand promises about a program to rebuild Iraq comparable to the Marshall Plan, doesn't plan to ask for any more money for Iraqi reconstruction.

Another Los Angeles Times report on Iraq reconstruction contains some jaw-dropping quotes from U.S. officials, who now seem to be lecturing the Iraqis on self-reliance. "The world is a competitive place," declared the economics counselor at the U.S. embassy. "No pain, no gain," said another official. "We were never intending to rebuild Iraq," said a third. We came, we saw, we conquered, we messed up your infrastructure, we're outta here.

Mr. Shlash certainly sounds as if he's given up expecting more American help. "The American donation is almost finished," he said, "and it was not that effective." Yet he also emphasized the obvious: partly because of the similar failure of reconstruction in the oil sector, Iraq's government doesn't have the funds to do much power plant construction. In fact, it will be hard pressed to maintain the capacity it has, and protect that capacity from insurgent attacks.

And if reconstruction stalls, as seems inevitable, it's hard to see how anything else in Iraq can go right.

So what does it mean that the Bush administration is apparently walking away from responsibility for Iraq's reconstruction? It means that the administration doesn't have a plan; it's entirely focused on short-term political gain. Mr. Bush is just getting by from sound bite to sound bite, while Iraq and America sink ever deeper into the quagmire.

Pakistan Says U.S. Should Communicate Before Airstrikes (AP)

Associated Press

AP, January 23, 2006

Pakistan's prime minister yesterday condemned an American airstrike on a remote Pakistani village, saying such attacks should be cleared with Islamabad first.

Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz said no understanding exists between U.S. and Pakistani officials that allows American military forces to attack alleged terrorists in Pakistan without first consulting the government.

"The understanding is that we will work together," Aziz said. "We will work in collaboration with each other."

Aziz said Pakistani officials were given no notice before the Jan. 13 attack that killed at least 13. The attack was apparently aimed at al Qaeda's No. 2 leader, Ayman Zawahiri, who was not there.

Pakistan, Aziz said, "has regretted and condemned the incident and said that such incidents should not reoccur. We need to work together. There is no difference in the objectives of the two countries, so there is no reason why we shouldn't communicate."

Pakistan is a key U.S. ally, but it has strongly protested the airstrike, which has angered many in the Muslim nation of 150 million and sparked friction between Islamabad and Washington.

Aziz is to meet this week with President Bush and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Attacks Strain Efforts On Terror (WP)

By Griff Witte And Kamran Khan

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Jan. 22 -- Events along the ever-volatile Afghanistan-Pakistan border this month have exposed deep fault lines in the anti-terrorism alliance among the United States, Afghanistan and Pakistan, and officials on all sides say their joint efforts against militants in the region are now highly precarious.

The heightened tension comes as militant extremists and the United States have both become more aggressive in their tactics, with the Pakistani government caught in between.

Two incidents in particular, which each killed more than a dozen people, have revealed just how tenuous relations among the countries have become.

In the first, U.S. missiles struck a house in the Pakistani village of Damadola where Ayman Zawahiri, the deputy leader of al Qaeda, was thought to be having dinner. In the second, three days later in the Afghan town of Spin Boldak, a man drove a motorbike into a crowd gathered to watch a wrestling match and blew himself up.

Because the incidents took place on opposite sides of the border, they elicited responses with vastly different focuses. After the U.S. missile strike, thousands of Pakistanis took to the streets to condemn the United States. After the suicide bombing, thousands of Afghans took to the streets to condemn Pakistan.

The United States -- long frustrated because its soldiers are in Afghanistan while most of the militants they are hunting are believed to be in Pakistan -- has begun using unmanned aircraft known as Predators armed with Hellfire missiles to reach across the border. Pakistani officials are apparently notified in advance of such missions, and assist with intelligence. But the angry public response there to this month's attack raised questions about whether the government of Gen. Pervez Musharraf -- which has sought to cultivate ties to the West without alienating radical Islamic groups at home -- can handle the domestic political fallout.

Afghanistan, for its part, has applauded the more aggressive U.S. stance. Afghan officials say they want the United States to go even further to stop Pakistan-based militants, who are hitting hard at a time when international commitments to securing Afghanistan have come into doubt.

Meanwhile, along the border, tensions continue to rise.

"We have a lot of grief in our hearts," said Abdul Hakim Jan, an Afghan tribal leader who helped organize a protest beside a border crossing Wednesday following the deadliest suicide bombing in Afghanistan in the four years since the fall of Taliban rule. "All the terrorists and the enemies of Afghanistan are because of Pakistan. They are receiving their training there and they are being sent to Afghanistan for attacks."

Pakistani tribal leaders, for their part, look a few miles west for the source of their troubles: the American military presence in Afghanistan. Throughout the past week and continuing Sunday, tens of thousands of Pakistanis have participated in boisterous rallies at which protesters burned effigies of President Bush, chanted "Long live Osama!" and denounced the Pakistani government for cooperating with the United States.

"People are so angry that this could become a major movement against the American slaves who are ruling Pakistan these days," said Liaquat Baluch, a leader of Jamaat-e-Islami, the country's largest Islamic party.

Volatility in the border region is nothing new. For centuries, the rugged, mountainous area has been largely beyond the control of any government. Both sides of the border are populated by religiously conservative Pashtuns, who in recent decades have freely transported money, drugs and weapons back and forth across the porous boundary.

But since the United States invaded Afghanistan and toppled the Taliban after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the border has taken on special significance. On the Afghan side, the United States has 19,000 troops who provide crucial support for the government and who enjoy a relative degree of popularity. On the Pakistani side, U.S. troops are officially forbidden from pursuing terrorists. As a consequence, many Islamic militants who found sanctuary in Afghanistan before Sept. 11 reportedly have taken refuge in the semiautonomous tribal areas where sympathies for al Qaeda and its leader, Osama bin Laden, run high.

Until recently, the United States had been dependent on raids by Pakistani security forces to catch the fugitives, with mixed results. But in the predawn hours of Jan. 13, the United States used a different tactic, firing Hellfire missiles from drones in a bid to kill Zawahiri. Pakistani and U.S. intelligence sources have said they expected him to show up for dinner at a house in Damadola, but they now believe he was not there.

The missiles killed at least 13 others. After the attack, local officials said that only villagers were killed, among them women and children, who were buried nearby. But Pakistani intelligence sources have since asserted, without offering proof, that a handful of foreign al Qaeda militants also died, possibly including its chief explosives expert, a son-in-law of Zawahiri and an operational leader in Pakistan and Afghanistan.

The Pakistani government's response has been as conflicted as the reports. Some officials joined with the protesters in vehemently denouncing the attack, while others acknowledged that militants operate in the area. Even as the Foreign Ministry lodged a formal objection with the U.S. Embassy, Musharraf stayed silent in public, except to warn his countrymen not to harbor terrorists.

Pakistani Foreign Minister Khurshid Mahmud Kasuri acknowledged in an interview that the strike has put stress on the government, which since 2001 has walked a fine line of assisting the U.S. anti-terrorism campaign -- and receiving billions of dollars in aid in return -- while also trying to appease radical Islamic constituencies at home.

"Such an action creates immense internal problems for us as the perception grows that the U.S. has no respect for our sovereignty," Kasuri said.

U.S. officials, however, say Pakistan's objections amount to posturing. According to American military and intelligence sources who spoke on condition of anonymity, Pakistan had signed off on this month's strike beforehand and had even assisted with gathering pre-attack intelligence.

The use of Predator drones to strike targets in Pakistan is relatively new, and several security officials said it could not happen without the consent of the Pakistani government. There have been at least three such attacks since last May; one in December reportedly succeeded in killing a senior al Qaeda commander, Hamza Rabia.

But now, it remains unclear whether Predator attacks will be allowed to continue.

On Saturday, in a meeting with U.S. Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns, Musharraf said attacks such as the one aimed at Zawahiri "should not be repeated," according to Pakistani Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Tasneem Aslam.

Pakistani Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz, who on Sunday denied that Pakistan had received prior notice of this month's attack, is expected to raise the issue with Bush when they meet at the White House this week.

A senior Pakistani intelligence official, however, said nothing was likely to change in terms of actual U.S. and Pakistani efforts at hunting militants.

"Proper protest has been made, but this will not alter the ground rules and intelligence cooperation with the U.S. It will continue as usual," the official said.

The latest U.S. missile strike came as suicide attacks by militants have been on the rise in Afghanistan, particularly in southern and eastern areas bordering Pakistan. In a country where such attacks have traditionally been rare, Afghan officials blame foreigners.

"It is difficult for me to imagine how it can happen without some kind of support from outside Afghanistan," said Foreign Minister Abdullah Abdullah.

Others direct blame squarely at Pakistan, which they believe is trying to gain more influence in Afghanistan by sowing instability.

"We were using Pakistan as a base during the resistance times," said Hakim Taniwal, governor of Paktia province, referring to the U.S.-funded guerrilla war against Soviet occupation troops during the 1980s. "Now al Qaeda and Taliban are also using the Pakistani side to attack in Afghanistan."

Afghan government officials are feeling especially vulnerable now because the United States announced late last year that it would reduce its troop strength from 19,000 to 16,500. NATO soldiers are supposed to fill the gap by taking over some operations in the south, but the Netherlands, seen as pivotal to that transition, has wavered over whether it will send troops.

Meanwhile, the Taliban, al Qaeda and other groups that are trying to destabilize the nascent Afghan government appear to be taking advantage of the uncertainty.

"At the strategic level of war, this is a defensive insurgency," said Chris Mason, a retired U.S. diplomat who served in Afghanistan and is now a senior fellow at the Center for Advanced Defense Studies in Washington. "They're inserting just enough insurgents to shut down meaningful reconstruction in the south and keep the population on the fence."

Khan reported from Karachi, Pakistan.

Nato's Force Will Live Up To Its Afghan Pledges (FT)

By Jaap de Hoop Scheffer

Financial Times, January 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0010039

As Nato prepares to expand the operations of its International Security Assistance Force in Afghanistan to the country's more volatile south, where violence is intensifying, debate is under way about the role the alliance will play. Taliban fighters, meanwhile, are stepping up terrorist attacks on international forces, trying to scare us off before we even arrive.

The debate surrounding this mission comes as no surprise. After all, Nato's operation in Afghanistan has been, from the start, a fundamentally new step for the alliance. It is also the most ambitious mission in Nato's history, in terms of the strategic distance from our home countries, in terms of the complexity of the challenges we face in Afghanistan and in terms of the multiple roles the alliance must take on.

In all these ways, this mission may be a first for Nato – but I do not believe it will be the last of its kind. The alliance will probably be called on in future to take on other, similar challenges. That is one reason why it is so important to get this one right.

We have already made a good start. Less than five years ago, Afghanistan was the launch pad for the worst terrorist attacks in history. It was also one of the most wretched countries on earth. Today, the Taliban and al-Qaeda are out of power and under pressure. And the people of Afghanistan have just elected their first true parliament, with levels of representation by women that could not have been imagined just a few years ago.

This is enormous progress but there is a long way to go. Afghanistan still needs our help and it will get it. The Afghanistan conference in London next week will show that the international community – including Nato – is still standing squarely behind this country. None of us can afford to let it slip back into chaos and become once again a breeding ground for international terrorism. Our commitment to Afghanistan is not only a question of self-interest: it is also a question of solidarity and obligation. Solidarity with the Afghan people, who have asked for our help. Solidarity between all Nato allies, who decided together to take this mission on, and who should implement that decision together. Solidarity with the United Nations, which passed the resolutions guiding Nato's mission. And it is an obligation for Nato, as the security foundation for Afghanistan's recovery, to stay the course and continue to play an essential role.

We will meet that obligation. Isaf will continue to contribute to stability, and will help to extend the authority of the Afghan government. Nato Provincial Reconstruction teams, joint civil and military groups, are in the provinces of Afghanistan helping rebuild the infrastructure, promoting development and defusing tension as "honest brokers". They are protected by larger military forces, whose job is to ensure that the teams can carry out their mission unimpeded and in safety. And Nato is also helping the Afghan security forces develop, so that they can increasingly provide for their country's security.

Of course, Isaf – a Nato-led force that takes its political direction from Brussels – is not the only international military force in Afghanistan. The US-led coalition, Operation Enduring Freedom (which also includes some Nato member states), has been taking on the Taliban and al-Qaeda there since 2001. Nato's mission is different and it is distinct. With this in mind, allies have agreed command arrangements to ensure that the two missions do not get in each other's way.

Let there be no doubt, however: Isaf forces will not go to the south with one arm tied behind their back. All Nato allies are aware that there are real security challenges in the region and that violence is escalating. They must, and will, meet these challenges. Nato forces will have the rules of engagement and the equipment they need to deal head-on with any dangers to their security or to their mission. If potential attackers threaten Nato personnel or their ability to do their job – which is to help create a secure environment so that Afghans can build better lives – then Isaf will be able to undertake robust military action.

No one should doubt Nato's resolve to carry out this mission. All 26 allies realise that fighting terrorism, and helping the Afghan people and their government, is a collective effort – not a matter of picking and choosing where one might wish to chip in.

We have already been delivering for quite some time, with 10,000 troops in the country. In coming months, we will expand southwards, as an alliance united in our determination to help the Afghan people build the stability and peace they deserve.

Alliance Upgrade (WSJ)

By Marshall Billingslea

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2006

As times have changed, so has the North Atlantic Alliance. That is particularly evident in the way NATO has moved to protect our citizens from terrorism. Over the past few years, the Alliance has intensified armaments cooperation, and has launched and expanded several operations and missions (among other things) to address this threat.

The most dramatic illustration of NATO's new priorities is our support for the democratically elected government of Afghanistan. More than 9,000 troops and military advisers are currently deployed throughout multiple Afghan provinces in the form of Provincial Reconstruction Teams (PRTs). These troops from 25 NATO members and 11 partner nations are there to provide both security and support to local authorities and people, and are doing such things as digging wells, building schools and refurbishing mosques. In a similar vein, NATO is facilitating, together with several international organizations, the rehabilitation of Kabul International Airport, and has made significant investments in airports in Herat and Mazar-e-Sharif. While these airports are important for NATO operations, they are also crucial to Afghanistan's new free-market economy.

Importantly, in a clear demonstration of resolve and determination to support the Afghan people, the Alliance has recently taken decisions to boost its forces even further, and to deploy additional Provincial Reconstruction Teams in the southern part of Afghanistan. A number of NATO nations are now undertaking the necessary domestic processes to deploy the needed forces.

Both in and out of Iraq, NATO maintains a training mission for Iraqi military officers. Last year, several hundred officers were trained at NATO facilities in Europe, and at various national institutions. New training facilities at Ar Rustimiyah, near Baghdad, were constructed and are now functioning alongside the new Iraqi military academy. Likewise, NATO nations supplied thousands of tons of weaponry and equipment to the new Iraqi military. From assault rifles to more than two battalions' worth of tanks and several dozen armored combat vehicles, NATO nations have shown that they are firmly committed to helping the government of Iraq. This year we will see a further increase in these efforts to help the new Iraqi democracy.

Closer to home, NATO runs both naval and air missions to protect the security of its members. At sea, Operation Active Endeavor is NATO's ongoing maritime interdiction effort. The operation has led to several critical boardings of suspect vessels and multiple findings of explosives, weaponry and drugs being smuggled on vessels in the Mediterranean. From the air, the NATO AWACS fleet has provided critical monitoring of air traffic during high-profile events such as the 2004 Olympics in Athens. * * *

As importantly, NATO has intensified its armaments cooperation to ensure that the troops deployed in these operations are equipped with the right kinds of technologies and capabilities.

Two years ago, NATO created an ambitious technology program. Ten critical areas were identified to strengthen our collective defense against terrorism, and each is led by a member country. Spain heads efforts to disable homemade terrorist bombs, Germany to develop new counter-terrorist reconnaissance capabilities, Britain to minimize the danger to civilian aircraft from shoulder-fired missiles, Italy to protect harbors from underwater divers with explosives, the U.S. to improve the aerial deployment of special operations forces and equipment, and so on.

This "Defense Against Terrorism" program has already brought results in a short period of time. For example, a new laser system capable of detecting trace amounts of explosives on surfaces (e.g. car door handles) is being prototyped. A novel technique for creating a sonar "wall of sound" as a trip-wire across harbor entrances is also making progress. Bulgaria is now testing new composites to shield helicopters against the blast of a rocket propelled grenade.

That said, while we are moving in the right direction, a significant infusion of expertise, and funding, is needed for NATO to move forward more quickly on devising better technologies. Despite its successes, the program remains underfunded. We also need additional, dedicated test facilities and training ranges where we can experiment with emerging prototypes.

But perhaps our biggest challenge is that of simply getting visibility on all the potentially useful technologies "out there." Across North America and Europe, there are tens of thousands of large and small companies, universities, government institutes and -- in some cases -- garages and hobby shops of inventors, all of whom may have something to offer the fight against terrorism. The inventiveness and creativity of our private sectors is one of the greatest assets NATO nations have in the fight against terrorism. We need to do a better job of tapping into that creativity.

In the United States, through the Pentagon's Technical Support Working Group, the federal government solicits proposals from a broad segment of the private sector on counterterrorism technology. This group has had remarkable successes. But the group still is limited in the people it can reach, restricted principally to North America and a few partner countries.

NATO needs this kind of solution which would let its member nations reach out to the private sector, across national boundaries, for counterterrorism technology. For instance, the U.S. Department of Homeland Security recently solicited industry proposals on 26 specific technologies such as small, portable masks for law enforcement officers to help them escape suddenly contaminated areas. I am sure that there will be dozens of ideas on how to manufacture these masks. But who knows what other innovations and capabilities are out there in Europe, in someone's hobby shop? * * *

When NATO's 26 armaments chiefs meet in Brussels this spring, they will sit down to review NATO's counterterrorism technology efforts. My hope is that they will come armed with ideas on how to press ahead in the fight against terrorism. Our first challenge will be to review all the operations to see where additional support to NATO troops is urgently needed. Certainly we need to expand, intensify and better fund the ongoing technological program of work. But perhaps more importantly, we need to create a NATO-Technical Support Working Group on a trans-Atlantic scale.

Bin Laden TV (WSJ)

By Jonathan Stevenson

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2006

Last week's videotaped missive from Osama bin Laden -- his first in over a year -- confirmed several things that we knew or at least suspected: that he is isolated, besieged and physically weak. More substantively, it continued a general pattern, but with significant variations. After the Madrid bombings in March 2004, bin Laden attempted to isolate the U.S. by offering to refrain from attacking its European allies if they withheld assistance in any American strategic endeavor affecting Muslims. In the recent tape, he asks the U.S. itself to stand down in Iraq and Afghanistan in exchange for a "long truce." As with the Madrid tape, bin Laden has made an offer that he knows will be refused.

Why the truce offer? By merely indicating a desire for the peaceful reconstruction of Afghanistan and Iraq, he may secure broader Muslim support. In turn, he might erase any political dividends, in the Muslim world, accruing to the West on account of its state-building efforts.

Although the tape was made before the qualifiedly successful Predator strike on high-level al Qaeda operatives in Pakistan, its release following that attack still could prevent actual or potential recruits from becoming demoralized. By way of the threat of planned terrorist attacks on U.S. territory, the tape could constitute a "strategic communication" aimed at shifting U.S. energies away from Iraq and Afghanistan and toward homeland security. Such reallocation would be to al Qaeda's advantage in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Bin Laden's démarche has other, more opaque, designs. In threatening the U.S. with attacks that are purportedly being planned in Baghdad, and declaring that "our situation is getting better while yours is getting worse," he is making four observations: (1) the U.S. counterterrorism campaign in Iraq is failing; (2) Iraq has indeed replaced Afghanistan as a training ground for jihadi terrorists and a center for global (not just local and regional) operational terrorist planning; (3) American homeland security is ineffective; and (4) bin Laden, despite his besiegement in (most likely) the tribal areas of Pakistan, still has strategic control over the jihadist movement in general, and over Abu Musab al-Zarqawi -- leader of al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, the foreign component of the Iraq insurgency -- in particular. The bad news is that bin Laden's first two points appear valid, the third at least partly true, and the fourth untrue but largely irrelevant to the counterterrorist effort.

The fact that violence in Iraq has continued unabated since the elections indicates that despite a more conciliatory attitude on the part of many Iraqi Sunnis, a critical sufficiency of those engaged in political violence remain unmoved. Whether apparent infighting between foreign jihadists and Iraqi nationalist insurgents will significantly compromise the overall effort is uncertain. Moreover, evidence has emerged that Iraqi Sunnis are increasingly susceptible to Islamist radicalization, and that insurgents blooded in Iraq itself are more interested in operating outside Iraq (e.g., in Jordan).

Most likely bin Laden's hope is that his wider audience -- especially potential recruits -- will read U.S. beleaguerment as proof of al Qaeda's might. In suggesting that he himself maintains a significant degree of command over far-flung assets, he wants the world to believe that he and al Qaeda possess concentrated power that has not substantially diminished since 9/11. It would seem, then, that he is still in a position to dictate his own strategic agenda. But this is not the case. Although he and his right-hand man, Ayman al-Zawahiri, appear to have some differences with Zarqawi, there is little evidence that they have been able to influence his tactics. And Spanish and British authorities have been unable to find an operational link between al Qaeda's core leadership and the European jihadists who bombed Madrid and London.

The overarching significance of bin Laden's counterfactual assertion of authority, however, is how little it matters. It has long been clear that al Qaeda was forced to disperse and atomize after the Afghanistan intervention in late 2001. For some time thereafter, though, it appeared that al Qaeda middlemen remained integral to local operations. The situation changed after Madrid, and London reinforced it. The clearest lesson of those bombings was that jihadis were increasingly homegrown. Indeed, the emerging pattern is for diaspora Muslims (especially European ones, alienated from host and home country) to seek identity in the ummah, the "universal community" of believers. In that community, bin Laden's narrative of Islam's humiliation, and its need to respond with violence, flourish. Accordingly, recruits to the jihad can be moved to politically and religiously motivated violence regardless of his personal fate or actions.

In this light, it is tempting to dismiss bin Laden's offer as a haughty act of desperation, or an effort to buy time, as terrorist cease-fire proposals often are. A more nuanced extension of this logic would be that he is explicitly dialing back his ambition of a global caliphate and would now settle for a limited U.S. stand-down, which could help render his demands moderate enough to become subject to at least tacit accommodation. Such thinking would be wishful, and not much more. Even if he really wanted to work toward coexistence, he wouldn't be able to deliver his end of the bargain precisely because he no longer enjoys close operational control over most of those he inspires. His word could be countermanded by Zarqawi, by a Moroccan in Spain, or by a British Pakistani. Quite simply, bin Laden's ideology and résumé have become bigger than the man himself.

Osama bin Laden is almost certainly hiding in a cave somewhere in wild, western Pakistan. He has a $50-million bounty on his head — not exactly something that encourages him to trust those around him. He can't touch a cell or satellite phone for fear it will give away his location. He is isolated.

Yet last week he managed to get a new and bizarre audiotape aired on his favorite TV station, Al-Jazeera. It was the first time in more than a year that the world has heard from him. In it, he threatened the USA but offered a vague, conditional truce. The tape raised an interesting, and increasingly perplexing, question: What power, exactly, does the terrorist leader, who is likely living much as a cornered animal, have?

To non-Muslim ears, bin Laden's message was clumsy and easy to dismiss. Quite apart from grandiose declarations the USA is destined to "loss and shame forever," for example, and his off-base descriptions of U.S. anti-war opinion polls and their meaning, who could seriously consider the offer of a truce? His message echoed a similarly crude bin Laden attempt to influence a vote against President Bush before the last U.S. election, as well as earlier truce offers to European countries if they withdrew from Iraq.

But to Muslim ears — and here is the problem — the same words sound very different. Bin Laden spoke in terms steeped in Islamic tradition. The truce that he offered, for example, recalls great past leaders, including the prophet Mohammed, who offered one in his battle with the Quraysh tribe that he eventually defeated. Bin Laden's aim was to give himself the stature of a leader — specifically the leader who can realize the Muslim dream of establishing a caliphate, or worldwide Muslim superstate. And though it might seem ludicrous for a man on the run to pit himself against the most powerful nation in history, for many Muslims it isn't.

Bin Laden's inspirational power can't be quantified like missile strikes and battles. But it's evident in the waves of recruits for suicide bombings in Iraq and, increasingly, in Afghanistan. It's in surveys that show Muslims increasingly seeing the war on terror as a war on Islam.

The most effective way to strike back is to help stoke a war within, not against, Islam. Many Muslims do not want to follow the medieval version of Islam that bin Laden promotes. Yet many U.S. policies and practices — notably the ill-considered war in Iraq and the government's weak reaction to torture there — played into bin Laden's effort to cast the fight as a clash of civilizations.

Bin Laden is a mass murderer with the blood of thousands of Americans on his hands, and he promises to kill more. His capture or assassination should remain a priority. But the power of his message, too, has to be killed off. That requires an equally potent message that leads Muslims away from the common perception that the United States is the cause of their problems.

Bin Laden's message offered nothing useful for Americans. Its value lies only in reminding us that Muslims are reacting to our messages in much the same way.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Top Exec's Plea Bargain In Judge's Crosshairs (LAW)

By Amanda Bronstad, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, January 23, 2006

The former chief executive of Gemstar-TV Guide International Inc. may face jail time if a federal judge in Los Angeles rejects his plea agreement this week.

Henry Yuen, who was ousted in 2002 after Gemstar lost almost $3 billion in market capitalization due to accounting restatements, pleaded guilty in October to destroying computer files during a separate investigation by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. As part of the deal, he agreed to pay a $250,000 fine and to donate $1 million to charity while serving two years' probation and six months of home detention.

Prosecutors and Yuen's lawyers have said the sentence fits his crime of obstruction of justice, reiterating that he has not been charged with securities fraud.

'TRAVESTY OF JUSTICE'

But lawyers for Gemstar and the SEC have expressed concern about the plea agreement, with Gemstar lawyers calling it a "travesty of justice."

The company also said it spent $100 million in legal fees and lawsuit settlements because of Yuen.

U.S. District Judge John Walter is expected to reject the agreement when he issues a final ruling on Yuen's sentence today. In December, Walter issued a tentative ruling criticizing the sentence, saying that it "sends the wrong message to corporate America," and is "wholly inappropriate," according to court transcripts.

With a plea deal scrapped, federal prosecutors could add charges against Yuen or drop the case altogether. Yuen, who would have the option to withdraw from the agreement, may face a new sentence from the judge or a potential jury in the near future.

That would appease lawyers for the SEC and Gemstar.

"We believe the original plea agreement was not appropriate for the damage that Mr. Yuen has caused the company and its shareholders," said Richard Stone, a partner at Washington's Hogan & Hartson who represents Los Angeles-based Gemstar.

Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Los Angeles, said, "we've encouraged the court to accept the plea agreement filed last year."

Mike Piazza, trial counsel at the SEC's Pacific regional office, said the SEC's reluctance to accept the plea agreement is "unusual."

"We put tremendous amounts of resources on the case, 10 investigative attorneys, crossed over 2 1/2 years and settled with four of the five individual defendants," Piazza said. "That tells you how the SEC feels about the case. We put a lot of resources into it."

Yuen's attorney, Stanley Arkin, a partner at New York-based Arkin Kaplan, expressed frustration about the recent changes in the case. "We don't know what's going to happen here, and the fact is we're searching."

The SEC has filed a civil suit against Yuen and Elsie Leung, the company's former chief financial officer, alleging that they overstated company revenue to increase the company's stock price. Leung settled the claims.

The SEC wrapped up its civil case against Yuen in trial last month and is waiting for a judge's final decision.

Lawyers Want Enron Trial Moved Out Of State Fair-minded Jury Too Hard To Find In Houston, They Say (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, January 23, 2006

With jury selection in the trial of former Enron chiefs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling scheduled to begin in Houston next Monday, their lawyers are insisting that the trial be moved out of state.

They don't think Lay and Skilling can find an open-minded jury in Houston, whose residents bore the financial brunt of the highflying energy company's implosion four years ago.

"What we fear, in a situation as radioactive as this one, is that we'll have a so-called stealth juror," says Mike Ramsey, Lay's lead attorney, referring to someone secretly determined to find a defendant guilty.

"The most important thing we have to care about is a fair-minded jury, an unbiased jury," he says. "We've got to have jurors smart enough and brave enough to know that if they deliver a not guilty verdict, they're going to be asked about that the next day on the Today show."

Of 280 potential jurors who were surveyed last year, 80% said they had a negative bias toward Lay, Skilling or both.

"That's huge," says Howard Varinsky, a veteran jury consultant who aided prosecutors of Martha Stewart and Scott Peterson. "If you get 60%, that's a lot, but 80% is near virtually everyone."

Rusty Hardin, the attorney who represented Arthur Andersen in the first Enron-related case to go to trial four years ago, says he's surprised at how controversial the Enron case still is.

"It remains to me, in 30 years as a prosecutor and defense lawyer, the most polarizing case I've ever seen with jurors."

Still, moving the case to Denver, Phoenix or Atlanta, as defense lawyers requested recently, might not solve the problem. "Are they any better off anywhere else?" Hardin asks.

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake rejected the defense's motion several weeks ago. After a third defendant, former Enron accounting chief Rick Causey, agreed to plead guilty in late December, the defense team renewed its request.

They noted the 80% negative response among potential jurors was before Causey changed his plea. The "media maelstrom" afterward about how Causey's plea could hurt Skilling and Lay only reinforced a presumption of guilt, defense lawyers argued.

Instead of moving the trial, some jury experts agree with another defense motion asking that lawyers be able to question potential jurors without other juror candidates and spectators present. Lake is planning to follow normal federal court procedure for jury selection, or voir dire, where candidates are questioned together in open court. That will hurt the defense, say jury consultants, because people are reluctant to admit in front of strangers that they can't be fair.

Lake is expected to rule this week on the defense motion to allow voir dire to be individualized.

Livedoor CEO Denies Allegations (WSJ)

By Andrew Morse

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2006

TOKYO -- The chief executive officer of a Japanese Internet company that is the subject of an investigation denied having misled investors to inflate his company's stock price.

Takafumi Horie, the CEO of Internet-portal company Livedoor Co., made the denial on his Web log after a television program yesterday morning in Japan examined the widening allegations surrounding his company.

"The extent of the fabrications [in the program] is such that it is difficult to deny them one by one," Mr. Horie wrote in his blog. "I don't know who or how these stories were researched."

Livedoor's offices were raided by Tokyo prosecutors Jan. 16 as part of a probe of possible securities-law violations. Japanese media reports have said prosecutors suspect the company improperly handled a subsidiary's 2004 acquisition of a publishing company that was owned by a fund run by the Livedoor group. The prosecutors, who acknowledge that they are conducting an investigation, haven't commented.

Mr. Horie has challenged traditional Japanese business norms by staging hostile takeovers and aggressively splitting his company's stock. He has irritated Japan's corporate elites by eschewing such customs as wearing suits and ties to news conferences, making him a hero to many younger Japanese.

Yesterday's comments by Mr. Horie come amid growing speculation he will be questioned by prosecutors, who called the company's chief financial officer, Ryoji Miyauchi, and several other Livedoor executives to their offices Friday.

The situation took a tragic turn last week when a confidant of Mr. Horie's, Hideaki Noguchi, was found dead in southern Japan from an apparent suicide. A funeral service was held yesterday.

Since prosecutors raided Livedoor, the company's share price has dropped by more than 50% to 336 yen ($2.92), taking many other Japanese stocks with it. Wednesday, selling pressure became so great that the Tokyo Stock Exchange was forced to close early because it couldn't handle the volume of orders. Friday, the exchange warned investors about potential disclosure irregularities at Livedoor and an affiliated company.

U.S. Chamber Asks Congress For Softening Of Rule On Auditing (WP)

By Kathleen Day

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce is asking the federal government to soften a rule adopted after financial scandals that accounting firms failed to expose at Enron Corp., WorldCom Inc., Freddie Mac and other major U.S. companies.

The chamber, which lobbies for businesses large and small, wants the Securities and Exchange Commission to allow accounting firms to perform audits for any company within a year of having provided consulting or other services for that company.

The current rule bars a company from hiring as its auditor any accounting firm that has performed other services for it within five years. The SEC adopted the rule three years ago as required by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which Congress passed to tighten corporate accountability and make it harder for companies to mislead investors about corporate financial health.

The chamber makes its request in a policy paper it will release publicly today and circulated to some people last week. It is the group's latest effort to weaken some provisions of Sarbanes-Oxley, which it says has added burdensome and costly business regulations.

Supporters of Sarbanes-Oxley say a waiting period of a year or less could put auditors in the position of reviewing their own work and create conflicts of interest that the law was intended to prevent.

In its paper, the chamber also asks Congress to set clear guidelines on when the Justice Department can bring criminal charges against companies. The clarification is needed to "rein in" the department, whose successful prosecution of the accounting firm Arthur Andersen LLP put the company out of business and "led directly to severe job dislocations for 28,000 people," the paper says.

Uncertainty about the circumstances under which accounting firms can be indicted has raised the cost of their liability insurance, according to the paper, written by David C. Chavern, a chamber vice president. That has imposed a big barrier to new firms entering the field, he wrote.

The Justice Department recently dropped its case against Andersen after the Supreme Court reversed the conviction in May. The court ruled unanimously that jury instructions from the trial judge were too broad and allowed jurors to find the company guilty even if its officials did not intend to break the law.

The chamber's paper also calls on the SEC, the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board -- an audit review panel established under Sarbanes-Oxley -- and other government agencies to promote creation of large accounting firms that could compete with the four companies that dominate the business. That would give companies more choices when hiring firms to review their financial statements and, in the process, be better for the nation's economy, the paper says.

SEC spokesman John Nester said the agency would not comment on the chamber's requests because it has not seen the paper. In December, SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said in a speech to a group of accountants that he wants to make sure that government rules don't impede competition among auditing firms.

Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra also would not comment because no one there has seen the chamber's paper. The department has issued clear guidance on factors it considers to determine whether to prosecute a company, he said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Google's Reputation At Stake In Fight With Government (USAT)

By Jim Hopkins, Usa Today

USA Today, January 23, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Google, facing its biggest public relations battle yet, has more at stake than competitors as it fights a federal government demand for data on how millions of users search the Internet. (Related item: Google battles government over porn investigation)

As the No. 1 online search company, Google has the highest profile, and a brand built on a "don't be evil" motto that it must defend as it expands further into search-related ventures.

"That is their motto and their ambition, and they need to be true to that," says Denise Garcia, an analyst who follows Google at W.R. Hambrecht.

Google's stance will likely burnish its image as a search engine industry leader that can be trusted to guard its users' data, Garcia says.

But in the short run, investors are worried. Friday, stock in the company plummeted 8.5%, or $36.98 a share, to $399.46, a day after published reports of its refusal to bow to a Justice Department subpoena. It was Google's biggest daily percentage decline since it went public in August 2004.

Garcia said the subpoena fight was the biggest factor in the stock's decline. It also was driven by a weak revenue forecast earlier in the week by competitor Yahoo. That spooked investors anti-cipating Google's fourth-quarter results, due out Jan. 31.

The Justice Department asked a federal judge in San Jose on Wednesday for an order to force Google to turn over the records as part of the administration's efforts to revive an online pornography law.

The other major search providers — Yahoo, Microsoft's MSN and Time Warner's America Online — have cooperated with the government. Company representatives all said that they did not turn over data that identified individual users.

Google, MSN, AOL and Yahoo declined to say whether they had received other government subpoenas in the past year, company representatives said Friday.

Google co-founder Larry Page reiterated the company's opposition Friday in an interview with ABC News.

"Our company relies on having the trust of our users," Page told the network. "That's a very strong motivation for us. ... I think instead we should have laws that protect the privacy of data, for example, from government requests and other kinds of requests."

More than its competitors, Google has been dogged by privacy concerns.

Launched in 1998, Google now controls the world's biggest computer network and database — a mountain of electronic information that includes every search by its millions of users.

"Privacy advocates have put a big red bull's eye on it," says Jeff Nolan, a Silicon Valley venture capitalist.

In resisting the Justice Department's request, Google doesn't want to further rile privacy advocates or worry users, says search engine expert John Battelle.

Google's stance comes as it mounts defenses against the sort of government intrusion posed by the Justice Department.

It has been beefing up its Washington political operation with the addition of company lobbyists working with an outside lobbying firm, for example.

Trial Of Former Atlanta Mayor Set To Begin Monday (NYT)

By James Dao

DOJ_NMG_0010047

ATLANTA, Ga., Jan. 20 - He was, once, the go-go mayor of the South's most go-go city. Suave and acid-tongued, Bill Campbell was the protégé of a new black politics, steeped in the argot of civil rights yet able to smooth-talk corporate executives. Democrats from President Clinton on down courted him.

But those days are long gone. On Monday, Mr. Campbell, who left office in 2002, is to enter a federal court house here to defend himself against charges that he turned City Hall into a criminal enterprise during his eight years in office.

"I know that I'm innocent," Mr. Campbell said on Friday on a local radio station, V-103.

Mr. Campbell's trial will be the culmination of an investigation that dates back to at least 1999 and that has already led to convictions against 10 people on an array of charges that include bribery, tax fraud and perjury. Three of the people convicted worked in Mr. Campbell's administration.

The seven-count indictment alleges a wide-ranging conspiracy directed by Mr. Campbell and his associates to shake down companies trying to do business with the city. The indictment charges Mr. Campbell, 52, took payoffs totaling more than $150,000; accepted more than $100,000 in illegal campaign contributions; filed false personal income tax returns; and received gifts from contractors, including a $12,000 trip to Paris and nearly $10,000 worth of heating and air-conditioning equipment for his home.

But Mr. Campbell's lawyers assert that the case is built on shoddy evidence and unreliable witnesses who traded lenient punishment for their testimony. "If there was one issue that ran through this, it was the issue of plea deals and immunity," Mr. Campbell's lead lawyer, Billy Martin, said in court on Thursday.

In the months before the trial, Mr. Campbell, who now works as a lawyer in Florida, mounted an aggressive public relations campaign in Atlanta, appearing at local black churches, on sympathetic radio programs and at upbeat rallies.

Often, Mr. Campbell or his supporters have attacked the prosecution as racially motivated. When news of the federal investigation was first reported in 2000, Mr. Campbell denounced the investigators as "forces of evil" who might have been motivated by "ideological differences regarding my aggressive stand on affirmative action."

Concerned that the trial, expected to last at least six weeks, will turn heavily on racial issues, Judge Richard W. Story of the Federal District Court made an unusual plea from the bench on Thursday that the trial rely on law and evidence, "and not judge a man based on the color of his skin."

Judge Story was reacting to what seemed to be a pattern by both the defense and the prosecution of striking potential jurors based on race. Mr. Campbell's team removed 10 potential jurors, all white. The prosecution removed six people, all but one black. The final jury consisted of seven blacks and five whites.

Asked if race was a factor for picking jurors, Fred Orr, one of Mr. Campbell's lawyers, said no. "We're happy with the whites on the jury and I think they are happy with the black jurors," he said, referring to the prosecutors.

Michael Leo Owens, an assistant professor of urban politics at Emory University in Atlanta, said Mr. Campbell, while mayor, made a practice of discerning racial bias in his critics, whether they were newspaper writers, rival politicians or federal prosecutors.

"He was good at challenging those who questioned him," Mr. Owens said. "And if the questions persisted, he would revert to saying: `It's all about race.' " Mr. Owens added that such arguments "still resonated" for many blacks in Atlanta.

Yet it was not always that way for Mr. Campbell, political analysts say. A Duke University law graduate who worked in Atlanta as a lawyer for the United States Justice Department and in private law practice, Mr. Campbell became known as a pro-business protégé of Mayor Maynard Jackson in his early days in politics.

He was the son of the head of the N.A.A.C.P. chapter in Raleigh, N.C., and gained modest fame for integrating the Raleigh schools at the age of 7. In 1981, he was elected to the Atlanta City Council representing the district where the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. once preached, and gained a reputation for being a moderate on racial issues.

"I think Atlanta has dealt with its racial concerns better than any other city in this country," he said in a 1994 interview.

But as mayor, he used increasingly heated oratory to attack what he considered the racial motivations of his critics. When, for instance, the Southeastern Legal Foundation, a nonprofit group, filed a lawsuit challenging the city's affirmative action program, Mr. Campbell likened the plaintiffs to the Ku Klux Klan. "They want us to be able to dunk, to dance and to run, but not to run our own businesses," he said at the time.

Yet at the same time, Atlanta was experiencing explosive growth early in his tenure, and political analysts say Mr. Campbell deserves some credit for that boom. He also won plaudits for his response to the bombing at the Centennial Olympic Park during the 1996 Olympic Games.

But he also established a legacy of poor management. William Boone, a professor of political science at Clark Atlanta University, said Mr. Campbell was slow, or inept, at dealing with major problems he inherited, including an overtaxed sewer system, grinding poverty and traffic-clogged roads. When he left office, the city was facing an $80 million budget shortfall.

"The city was literally crumbling from below ground, and no real action was being taken to address the problems," Mr. Boone said. He added that Mr. Campbell's tenure looks even worse today in comparison with his popular successor, Mayor Shirley Franklin, who overwhelmingly won re-election last year after restoring the city's fiscal health.

On Atlanta's streets, Mr. Campbell remains a polarizing figure. More often than not, whites speak disparagingly about him, while blacks tend to defend him as a victim of a racially or politically motivated investigation.

"A lot of irreparable damage has been done to this city because of him, so I'm glad justice is being done," said Margaret Surber, 23 and white, as she took orders at a Caribou Coffee shop in East Atlanta. "I'm just glad we have Shirley Franklin now."

But Mary Burden, who is black, said the prosecutors should have left Mr. Campbell alone, saying she believes corruption is common among politicians.

"I think they probably wanted him to be an Uncle Tom and he wouldn't go for it," Ms. Burdon said outside a midtown YMCA. "He was a good mayor up to the end."

A Fake Cisneros Scandal (WP)

By Robert Litt

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

An independent counsel has issued a report claiming that officials of the Clinton administration blocked his investigation into allegations of tax violations by former housing secretary Henry Cisneros. Although these sensational charges have been trumpeted by partisans as evidence of Democratic corruption, they are completely false.

I know; I was there.

The independent counsel, David Barrett, was appointed to investigate charges that Cisneros had lied about payments he made to his mistress. (After investigating this charge for several years, Barrett meekly allowed Cisneros to plead guilty to a misdemeanor charge with a promise of no jail time.)

In 1997 Barrett came to the Justice Department, where I was serving in the Criminal Division, and asked permission to expand his case to investigate whether Cisneros had evaded income taxes over four years. The law allowed the attorney general to grant him that jurisdiction if there were "reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation" of possible tax violations was needed.

Nonpartisan career lawyers in the department's Criminal Division and in the Tax Division studied the independent counsel's application in great detail over several weeks. They met with his office, reviewed documents and interviewed witnesses. Each of them concluded that, with the exception of a single year's tax return, there were no reasonable grounds to investigate Cisneros for tax violations.

These career lawyers found that the independent counsel's submission was full of legal and factual errors. For example, the independent counsel claimed that Cisneros had failed to report over $100,000 in income during 1991, but he was unable to produce evidence that there was any unreported income at all.

The conclusions of the career lawyers were reviewed in detail by other officials including myself, up to the attorney general. Every single lawyer in the Justice Department who reviewed this matter concurred in the analysis. As a result, Barrett's jurisdiction was expanded to permit him to investigate one tax year, for which there was barely adequate evidence -- although as it turned out, he never brought any tax charges.

Ironically, jurisdiction to investigate one year's tax violations in effect permitted the independent counsel to investigate all tax years. Under established legal principles, evidence of conduct in one year can be relevant to show tax evasion in another year. Everyone at the department recognized this; apparently, the independent counsel did not.

Far from conspiring to block the independent counsel from investigating tax violations, therefore, the Justice Department bent over backward to permit him to do so. Attorney General Janet Reno had no hesitancy in recommending the appointment of independent counsels when the facts justified it: She sought a half-dozen independent counsels during her tenure. As for me, it has been reported that I recommended appointment of an independent counsel to investigate Vice President Al Gore. Had the law and the facts justified it in this case, the attorney general would have granted the independent counsel's request.

In short, there was no conspiracy, no outside political influence, no improper conduct. There was only a good-faith evaluation of the facts and the law that produced a different result from the one the independent counsel desired. Even the Bush administration told Barrett that there was "no actual evidence" of a conspiracy to obstruct justice.

It is the independent counsel's behavior that warrants examination here. His completely unfounded investigation into the alleged obstruction of justice lasted over six years and cost the taxpayers tens of millions of dollars -- even though the issue was simple and straightforward, and even though the statute of limitations expired during his investigation. In that time he never contacted me or any other Justice Department lawyer to find out what we had to say. At the same time he apparently required one IRS lawyer to testify almost 30 times -- surely a record in any federal criminal investigation. His investigation might still be going on if the court that oversees independent counsels had not ordered him to stop. And yet his report contains no evidence supporting his scurrilous charges.

Sadly, this independent counsel seemed unable to recognize that different lawyers could reach different conclusions in good faith. Instead, he decided that everyone who disagreed with him could only be corrupt. He did not let the complete absence of evidence to support that fantasy deter him from smearing nonpolitical government lawyers, who have devoted their careers to serving the public, without hearing their side of the story. That's the real scandal.

The writer, a Washington lawyer, served from 1994 to 1999 in the Justice Department, where his last position was principal associate deputy attorney general.

Laski To Stay On The Job Despite Charges (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, January 23, 2006

CHICAGO -- Rebutting suggestions by the media and City Hall insiders that he would resign amid corruption charges, City Clerk James Laski said Friday he "will continue to serve and represent the citizens of Chicago."

A federal investigation into his dealings "are not connected to the operations of this office," Laski said in a written statement. "Employees of this office will continue to effectively serve the needs of the citizens of Chicago."

Meanwhile, U.S. Magistrate Judge Sidney Schenkier freed Laski from the requirement to wear an electronic monitoring device that had been ordered a week ago after the clerk was charged with bribery and obstruction of justice.

The decision was supported by federal prosecutors and Laski's lawyer, Anthony Pinelli. "Mr. Laski is not a flight risk nor is he charged with a violent crime," Pinelli said.

Federal prosecutors allege that Laski received bribes from Michael "Mick" Jones, an old friend and top aide in the clerk's office, in return for landing city business for Jones' trucking company. Pinelli said Laski denies the charges.

In a three-paragraph statement, Laski said he was "precluded from commenting" on the charges lodged against him. But he took strong exception to reports that he has been absent from his post.

Laski said he took two weeks of vacation in December and made the decision to stay away from the last three City Council meetings so they wouldn't turn into a "media circus."

CHICAGO Chicago City Clerk James Laski says he has been at work in recent weeks -- despite reports to the contrary.The 52-year-old Laski is charged with soliciting payoffs in exchange for getting a trucking company operator city business and with pressuring a witness to lie to a federal grand jury.Laski said in a written statement today that reports that he has been absent from work recently have been exaggerated and unfair. He declined to comment on the federal charges.Laski says other than a few absences due to illness and two weeks of vacation he has taken to spend time with his family December for the past eleven years, he has been at work.Laski said after he was indicted January 13th that he would continue to work as City Clerk. Elected officials in Chicago lose their jobs upon a conviction.

City Employeenfacing Proben On Kickbacks (CTPOST)

By BILL CUMMINGS

Connecticut Post, January 22, 2006

BRIDGEPORT — A veteran city employee is under investigation for allegedly accepting kickbacks — sometimes in the form of cash-filled envelopes passed openly at City Hall — in exchange for awarding contracts.

The FBI is probing the activities of Chris Kovachi, a 20-year city employee and specialist in the city's Housing Department, three separate sources confirmed.

Kovachi, who is paid $42,271 a year, helps hire contractors and sets up rehabilitation work on city-owned housing so the units can be rented or sold to low-income residents. Federal dollars are used to fund the programs.

Kovachi denied any wrongdoing when asked about the allegations.

"I don't know anything about it. I talked to the FBI way back, about Ganim," Kovachi said, referring to former Mayor Joseph P. Ganim, who is serving nine years in jail on federal corruption charges.

"There is nothing I can comment on. I have done nothing wrong," he said.

Sources also said FBI agents are interested in city contractors who allegedly paid Kovachi in exchange for receiving work.

One of those contractors is Wayne Jones, of Jones and Jones Construction in Bridgeport. A former city employee, who asked not to be identified, told FBI agents about witnessing Jones giving Kovachi an envelope filled with cash.

City records show Jones was paid more than $717,000 over the last five years for various jobs.

Jones did not return numerous calls seeking comment. An effort to interview him at his 48 Sherman St. home was unsuccessful.

A next-door neighbor said Jones moved out a month ago. The neighbor knew Jones was a contractor, and said he worked out of a pickup truck that was often parked at the duplex.

Jones has not been charged with any crimes, and neither has Kovachi, who also lives in Bridgeport. Meanwhile, sources said FBI agents have interviewed city employees in the housing office, and agents have obtained documents relating to Kovachi's activities in the office.

Mayor John M. Fabrizi declined comment about the investigation. "I can neither confirm or deny this. I'm aware of several issues, but I'm not at liberty to speak about it," Fabrizi said.

Lisa Bull, a spokeswoman for the FBI, also declined comment.

The former city employee, who was interviewed by the FBI six times last year while working in the housing office, told the Connecticut Post about witnessing Kovachi accepting an envelope stuffed with money from Wayne Jones.

The exchange took place last summer, in the hallway outside the city's housing office at City Hall on Lyons Terrace, the source said.

"Chris walked past my desk and the envelope fell out of his back pocket. I picked it up and it was filled with hundred dollar bills, maybe $2,000 to $3,000. I said, 'What's this?' and Chris took it from me and said, 'He owed me money,' " the source said.

"Chris would get friends to lower bids so they can get jobs. He would want them to pay him off," the source said.

The source told FBI agents about five incidents in which envelopes were passed to Kovachi by various contractors. Kovachi said the witness may have "misinterpreted" what was passed to him. He said he had no recollection of the specific event described by the witness.

Two sources within city government also confirmed the FBI is investigating Kovachi. Those sources were aware of allegations that envelopes of cash were passed in City Hall, but said they had no direct knowledge of that activity.

But the two sources said they have first-hand information that Kovachi is the focus of a federal investigation. The sources stressed that the FBI is not investigating the entire housing office, and said the city is cooperating with the probe.

None of the sources were aware of city employees who testified before a grand jury, which usually occurs before an indictment is brought.

The city's Housing Department is divided into several divisions, and Kovachi works primarily in the HOME program, a federally funded initiative to renovate and build units for low-income renters or first time home buyers.

The city receives about $1.8 million annually from federal sources to fund the HOME program.

The probe began after city officials received credible information that Kovachi was taking kickbacks, sources said. Officials alerted city police, who in turn contacted federal authorities about the possible corruption.

The Housing Department was reorganized two years ago after longtime director, Para Rosario, was forced out over allegations of incompetence.

After taking over Rosario's office, officials found hundreds of thousands of dollars in checks written to the city that had not been deposited, and a host of other irregularities.

FBI Probe: Schools Vs. Political Connection (PHI)

By Ken Dilanian

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 23, 2006

Philadelphia schools chief Paul Vallas came to town three years ago promising to clean up the district's "dysfunctional" workers' compensation system, which costs taxpayers tens of millions a year.

But his pledge soon foundered on the shoals of the city's political culture. For reasons that Vallas has declined to publicly explain, the district hired a workers' compensation consultant with no government experience but with two important patrons: Democratic City Councilman Rick Mariano and Republican State House Speaker John Perzel.

After Mariano personally introduced Danlin Management to Vallas, the newly formed company won a no-bid contract in 2003 to advise the district on ways to cut costs by reducing worker injuries and curbing fraud.

The district's top financial officer at the time had concerns about Danlin but felt pressured by Vallas to hire the Center City firm, according to newly released records of the FBI's investigation into the matter.

When Danlin ran into problems in 2004, Perzel's office stepped in, pressing Vallas to keep paying the company even after senior district staffers had concluded it wasn't delivering what it had promised, records show. Vallas in turn got personally involved, the records show.

Danlin's managing director contributed $10,000 to Perzel's campaign fund in 2003, including $5,000 a day after the firm won its schools contract, public records show.

Danlin was eventually fired in late 2004, but not before taxpayers paid the company $393,750, court records indicate. The now-defunct firm is suing the school district, alleging breach of contract, and taxpayers are paying a well-connected law firm, Blank Rome L.L.P., to defend the district.

In a statement, Vallas said he didn't pressure anyone and said it was his decision to drop Danlin for poor performance. He declined further comment, citing Danlin's lawsuit.

In October, Danlin managing director Joseph Pellecchia was charged as part of an alleged conspiracy to bribe Mariano.

Pellecchia, who pleaded not guilty, is accused of laundering a $6,672 check for Mariano and then seeking the councilman's help with the Danlin contract. Mariano also has pleaded not guilty.

In a brief interview, Pellecchia argued that Danlin saved the school district money and was fired for political reasons. The FBI should be investigating the school district, not City Hall, he said.

"I told the feds they were in the wrong building," he said, before declining to comment further.

There is no sign that federal authorities are scrutinizing Perzel's efforts for Danlin. Helping a campaign contributor is not illegal unless political cash is exchanged directly for favors.

But newly obtained records in the investigation, including school district memos and written accounts of FBI interviews, offer a rare look at how Perzel - who runs a GOP House majority in Harrisburg that controls billions of dollars - involved himself in the minutiae of school district spending decisions to aid a friendly firm.

The records also suggest that Vallas went to considerable lengths to accommodate politicians who wanted to help a private company, despite the concerns of his staff.

In an interview with the FBI, the school district's former chief financial officer, Michael Harris, said Vallas repeatedly asked him what he was doing about Danlin. Although Vallas never actually ordered him to hire the company, Harris said, the message was clear:

Harris "felt a steady pressure by these inquiries that this is what Vallas and his staff wanted done," the FBI report says.

It's unclear how much money, if any, the district saved by hiring Danlin. A Danlin representative who declined to be identified said the firm made recommendations that saved as much as a million dollars.

The school district released a statement Friday asserting that, under a new consultant hired after Danlin, the district had saved about $5 million in the workers' compensation program by paying lump-sum settlements to workers claiming injuries.

The statement added that, when it comes to contracts, "it is not unusual for suggestions and recommendations to come from public officials." All firms are evaluated on their merits, it said.

Perzel declined to comment about Danlin, but his chief of staff, Brian Preski, said that assisting the company was the sort of thing the speaker does every day.

"It's the nature of this job," Preski said. "Like any other person that comes to see us, we'll try to get them the right meeting with the person who is a decision-maker. But in the end, it's that agency's decision whether they use them or not."

Preski said the political contributions were irrelevant.

"It's never been a part of any decision to us to help or not help anybody," Preski said. Perzel "has over 9,000 contributors."

Runaway costs

Vallas first raised the issue of workers' compensation costs in August 2002, shortly after arriving from Chicago.

About 17 percent of the district's nonteaching employees were absent daily, he noted, and in some job categories, as many as 10 percent of the missing workers were out on disability.

"In a nutshell, we almost have a dysfunctional workers' compensation system," Vallas said in November 2002. "We simply spend far too much."

A month later, Vallas was introduced to Pellecchia by Mariano, records show. Harris also attended that meeting.

"Mariano told Vallas and Harris that Pellecchia was a friend and he would appreciate if Pellecchia and the school district could work together," an FBI report states.

In an interview with the FBI last year, Vallas said he did not recall meeting with Mariano about Danlin - until an FBI agent refreshed his memory with a copy of his date book.

As a rule, Vallas said, he doesn't meet with business people seeking contracts. But, he told the FBI, it's different when the request comes from a councilman.

"If Danlin called, it would not have been put on the calendar," the FBI quoted him as saying.

Vallas also talked to the FBI about Perzel. He told agents that the speaker had asked him to listen to Danlin's proposal, saying: "Do whatever you want with these guys. Whatever is best for the school."

As speaker, Perzel has been chiefly responsible for channeling billions of state tax dollars to the school district.

Danlin was a new company, but Pellecchia told the district that he had years of experience advising private businesses on reducing workers' compensation costs. Danlin's staff included a medical doctor and a longtime workers' compensation consultant.

Pellecchia also had the backing of the Teamsters union, whose officials lobbied the school district and Perzel on Danlin's behalf, according to documents and interviews.

Still, Harris told the FBI that he was never satisfied with Danlin's proposal. He moved forward with it only after he "was frequently asked by Vallas and members of his staff how things were going with Danlin Management Group and if they were going to get a contract," FBI records state.

In an e-mail, Harris, who has since taken a job at the University of Pennsylvania, declined to comment.

Contract disputes

A $225,000 no-bid contract was approved in September 2003. By April 2004, records show, Danlin was pitching a huge expansion of its duties that would have earned it up to $1.5 million a year. But the district official who worked most closely with

DOJ_NMG_0010053

Danlin - risk management director Gina Pellegrino - had become unhappy with the firm's work. She was unimpressed with the new proposal.

"Danlin proposes savings each year that barely cover the cost of their contract ($500,000 to $1,000,000)," she wrote in an April 14, 2004, e-mail. "The district could just not hire them and save almost as much money as they present in projected savings."

By June 2004, Pellegrino was trying to fire Danlin, records show. Perzel's office was not pleased.

"What is going on?" Preski, the chief of staff, wrote in an e-mail to Tim Spreitzer, Vallas' chief of staff. "What did we meet about if this lady has this kind of power and can change what we agreed to?"

The firm stayed on, and a month later, Danlin and the district were fighting over payments. Preski e-mailed again, trying to get the district to pay Danlin extra money - in addition to the $225,000 contract - from bonds sold to raise money to settle workers' compensation cases.

"Just got another call that Pellecchia has not been paid, thought we had this resolved, can you please check into this?" Preski wrote on July 20, 2004.

Spreitzer replied: "The problem is that they've submitted an inflated invoice for $285,000; it is totally outrageous and beyond the pale. They are entitled to no more than $150,000 on the workers' comp bond transaction... they just refused to listen. Paul [Vallas] and I will call you on this issue today."

Preski responded: "Can you pay them the 150k and agree to work on issues surrounding the rest."

The school district's reply is not in the records, but Danlin was able to hang on for a few more months. Perzel attended another meeting with school officials about Danlin in September 2004, according to Danlin's lawsuit.

By November, however, Vallas had also become dissatisfied, and Danlin was no longer working for the school district. The firm is now out of business. The landlord of its former offices at 1818 Market St. has obtained a $59,967 judgment against the company for unpaid rent.

Nonprofit Paid For Suit Against Fumo Opponent (PHI)

By Mario F. Cattabiani, John Shiffman And Craig R. Mccoy

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 23, 2006

A South Philadelphia nonprofit with ties to State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo secretly financed a lawsuit to oust a powerful political opponent from the state Senate, sources said.

The FBI is asking why the nonprofit - created to clean streets and revitalize businesses in Fumo's district - financed an unsuccessful 2001 lawsuit against the head of the state Senate, Republican Robert C. Jubelirer of Altoona, according to people familiar with the investigation.

Fumo, the influential Philadelphia Democrat, has clashed with Jubelirer politically, and personally. In one 2004 episode that grabbed headlines, Fumo, irate at a Republican parliamentary maneuver, called Jubelirer "a faggot" on the Senate floor. Fumo later apologized to the gay community.

The nonprofit, Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, didn't pay for the lawsuit against Jubelirer directly, according to people familiar with the transaction.

Instead, the nonprofit sent about $17,000 to Howard Cain, a longtime close political adviser to Fumo. Cain's political consulting firm then cut a $17,000 check for the suit, the sources said.

Nonprofits are barred by law from spending money on politics.

Fumo did not respond to a request for comment Friday. Cain declined to comment, as did federal prosecutors.

In an e-mail Friday, Fumo's lawyer, Richard A. Sprague, said Citizens Alliance had every right to get involved in what he called a "matter in the public interest to all Pennsylvanians."

The issue in the case was whether Jubelirer could serve as lieutenant governor while holding on to his Senate seat.

"In my opinion, it is perfectly appropriate for a nonprofit, including Citizens Alliance, to be concerned in fundamental issues of constitutional interpretation, which are of great public importance," Sprague wrote.

"There are many possible reasons why a nonprofit would wish to remain anonymous, including the possibility of retaliation from the very officials involved in the litigation," he added.

Jubelirer said he never knew about the funding of the suit until last week.

"There should have been complete transparency," Jubelirer said. "At least they should have been a little bit more honest and upfront."

Of Citizens Alliance, he said: "This is certainly not part of their mission. It is supposed to be helping people in South Philadelphia to live somewhat of a better life."

For two years, the FBI, IRS agents and prosecutors have been aggressively scrutinizing a series of nonprofits connected to Fumo, looking at how Fumo raised money for them and how they spent it.

The investigation began after The Inquirer reported that Fumo had cut a secret deal with Peco Energy Co. The utility donated $17 million to Citizens Alliance after he dropped his opposition to the utility's deregulation plans. Fumo also arranged for the group to get $10 million from the Delaware River Port Authority.

Citizens Alliance is staffed with former and current Fumo aides. Public records show that the group's executive director, Ruth Arnao - a former legislative aide for Fumo - has signed annual tax forms for the group stating that it did not engage in politics.

Arnao did not respond to a request for comment.

The FBI/IRS investigation into Citizens Alliance is wide-ranging and focuses in part on whether the nonprofit broke the law by spending money on politics.

As The Inquirer has previously reported, the nonprofit spent $215,000 for political polling, money that was later reimbursed by a Fumo political-action committee.

Authorities are also pursuing allegations of obstruction of justice. Fumo aides who have appeared before a grand jury have been asked whether records were destroyed after the probe began, sources have told The Inquirer.

Fumo has been at odds with Jubelirer for more than a decade. In 1993, the two almost came to blows in the Senate chamber.

"His hand was cocked," Jubelirer said in 2004, remembering the incident. "He was going to hit me with a sucker punch."

The legal fight with Jubelirer, the Senate's president pro tempore, played out after Gov. Tom Ridge quit midterm to become U.S. homeland security director. Lt. Gov. Mark Schweiker became governor, and Jubelirer stepped up to fill the lieutenant governor's job - but kept his Senate seat.

Then-Rep. John A. Lawless filed a lawsuit in Commonwealth Court, contending that the state constitution barred Jubelirer from holding both posts. Lawless was a Montgomery County Republican when he filed the lawsuit, but he is now considering running for the state Senate as a Democrat.

Lawless' suit argued that Jubelirer should resign from the Senate and a special election be held to fill his seat.

At the time, the hand of Citizens Alliance in the case was not made public.

Fumo did file a separate friend-of-the-court brief urging the judges to take up the case.

The brief, written by Christopher B. Craig, a Fumo legislative counsel, said that "Senator Fumo does not take a position" on the ultimate question, whether Jubelirer should hold both jobs.

Rather, it said Jubelirer was wrong when he argued that only the Senate could decide the matter. Fumo argued that courts needed to intervene to remove "a cloud of uncertainty."

Ultimately, Commonwealth Court agreed to hear the case, thanking Fumo for his brief. It then ruled against Lawless, permitting Jubelirer to hold both jobs.

Jubelirer did so from October 2001 until January 2003, when Gov. Rendell and Lt. Gov. Catherine Baker Knoll took office.

As for Lawless, he lost his seat in 2002 after 12 years. He eventually became corporate secretary to the Delaware River Port Authority, a job that now pays $116,699; a top DRPA official said last week that Fumo, an alternate DRPA board member, was instrumental in Lawless' hiring there.

While declining to discuss the suit, Lawless praised Fumo and said that The Inquirer is pursuing "a witch hunt" against the state senator.

He said that he and the senator often bumped heads on issues in Harrisburg.

"I wasn't a Fumocrat," Lawless said.

Nonetheless, Lawless said, after losing his House seat, Fumo surprisingly returned his call and offered help to get him a new job.

"I said, 'Why would you help me?' He said, and I remember it to this day, 'Because it's easy to be someone's friend when they are on top. Be their friend when they are on the bottom. That's the hard part,' " Lawless recalled.

Although Lawless declined to comment about the suit, the two other plaintiffs in the action, as well as the lawyer in the case, all said they had been interviewed in recent weeks by the FBI about the matter.

One of those plaintiffs, Joseph H. Wiedemer, a resident of Jubelirer's district, said that Lawless told him at one point that he was trying to arrange for Fumo to cover the legal fees.

Gerald C. Grimaud, a lawyer for Lawless, Wiedemer and the other plaintiff, Charles A. Pascal Jr., said that "a Philadelphia corporation" paid him $17,000 as a retainer before he filed the suit in Harrisburg in October 2001.

Grimaud said he had given a copy of the check to the FBI. Although he would not say who had paid him, Grimaud explained the payment this way:

"In my mind, it was because there are not a lot of people willing to take significant action against powerful people, and Sen. Jubelirer was and still remains one of the most powerful persons in the state."

Sources said the check for the legal bills came from Venture Analysis Inc., the political consulting firm formed by Cain in 1978.

Cain has worked with Fumo in various positions for more than two decades and is considered one of his most trusted advisers.

Bruce Ledewitz, a law professor at Duquesne University and an expert on the state constitution, followed the Jubelirer lawsuit closely and never heard that Fumo's nonprofit might be involved.

"What we need in Pennsylvania is to have everything transparent," Ledewitz said. "The people need to be assured that there are no secret deals, that there are no behind-the-scenes agreements, that everything is happening right in front of us."

Nonprofits are barred from spending money on political activities. In an interview, Marcus S. Owens, the former head of the IRS division that regulates nonprofits, said the agency might raise questions about the polling and the lawsuit.

The IRS would frown on any spending it believed would benefit a political agenda as opposed to the public goals of the nonprofit, he said.

In its incorporation papers, Citizens Alliance said its purpose was "to promote public health, housing, safety and education in the City and County of Philadelphia."

MARA SALVATRUCHA New Breed Of Street Gang Spreads Through Texas, U.S. (AAS)

By Mike Ward, AMERICAN-STATESMAN STAFF

Austin American-Statesman, January 22, 2006

ABILENE — It was almost half his life ago, when he was just 12 or 13, but Daniel Teran Flores remembers the beating well. A group of youths in his neighborhood, in a working-class slum of Tegucigalpa, Honduras, surrounded him one day and kicked and slapped and punched him until he consented to join a neighborhood clique.

He did, after just a few minutes of being bruised and bloodied.

"Eme Ese," they called it in Spanish. La Mara Salvatrucha.

"All my friends went with (MS)," he explained in broken English. "So I did, too."

Now 24, Flores sits in a state prison on the wind-swept prairie just outside Abilene, serving a 10-year sentence for aggravated kidnapping and aggravated robbery for abducting and threatening a member of a rival gang and his girlfriend, police say. He is one of 24 convicts locked in Texas prisons who are confirmed members of MS-13, as the gang is known. It's a burgeoning criminal enterprise that has spread into 33 states and the District of Columbia, leaving a bloody trail of vicious crimes in its wake amid persistent reports that al Qaeda might be trying to use its smuggling network to sneak terrorists into the United States.

"America's most dangerous gang," officials have called it.

Its epicenter of recent growth has been neighborhoods of Central American immigrants in Houston, where federal investigators say the gang's membership and crimes have mushroomed. It is now facing a multiagency crackdown aimed at curbing its influence and violence.

Los Angeles "is still the place where you go to make your bones with MS-13, but Houston has emerged as a very large problem area," FBI Special Supervisory Agent Stephen Kodak said in Washington. "Just a couple of years ago, MS-13 wasn't really on the radar screen there. Now, they're all over it."

Recent FBI estimates indicate that MS-13 has 8,000 to 10,000 members — men and women — in the United States, not the largest gang. Nationwide, there are thought to be more than 800,000 members in 30,000 street gangs. But MS-13 is the only one targeted by an FBI national task force, a testament to its threat to public safety.

In Houston, federal and state investigators estimate that MS-13 may have as many as 500 members. More have been confirmed in Dallas and San Antonio, authorities say. And although Austin police say they have confirmed no MS-13 activity yet, federal investigators say that could change.

"We've had some MS-13 related graffiti, but we think it's wannabes or people who think it's cool," said Sgt. Mark Ballagia of the Austin Police Department's gang suppression unit. "It's sprung up in the past year."

Some federal authorities compare the growth and violence of MS-13 with the Jamaican drug posses of the 1980s who helped spread crack cocaine across the United States, leaving a trail of thousands of murders and violent crimes in more than 30 states before a federal task force sent hundreds of its members to prison.

"It's like the old-time Mafia: They prey on their own, offering protection and then extorting money from other illegals who aren't likely to report the crimes," Kodak said. "It's definitely a growing problem."

Ironically, according to most versions of the gang's history, MS-13 was formed in Los Angeles more than two decades ago to protect Salvadoran immigrants from falling victim to established Hispanic street gangs. Initially, the gang operated in loosely organized cells that grew neighborhood by neighborhood, from city to city, generally following the migration of Salvadoran immigrants across the United States, each governed by a member known as the "shot caller," according to federal investigators. It also spread back to Central America.

Although the gang still lacks a centralized leadership structure, operating in local groups called "cliques," federal investigators say the leaders in Los Angeles appear to carry the most clout.

In the past two years, MS-13 cells have been surfacing with alarming frequency across the United States — from mega-cities such as Houston, Boston and New York to smaller cities such as Madison, Wis., Oregon City, Ore., and Reno, Nev., to small towns on the North Carolina coast.

"In those fishing villages, where there are a lot of Salvadorans, you'll find an MS problem," Kodak said. "Right now, they're growing. . . . They're recruiting here in the United States."

In Texas, a life of crime, violence

MS-13's rap sheet in Texas reads like a Top Ten list of ugly crimes: murder, rape, kidnapping, extortion, drug trafficking, car theft, robbery, aggravated assault, illegal firearm sales and immigrant smuggling.

The latest episode to make news was a November shootout in Houston with FBI agents that left two gang members dead and four in jail. In a military-style operation, six MS-13 members in ski masks burst into a house where they thought a rival gang had stored drugs. Instead, federal agents lay in wait.

The FBI is investigating whether gang members are receiving formal training in weapons and military tactics, which promises to increase fears about the group and step up the federal crackdown.

Luis Ascencio, 24, could be a poster boy for what officials insist is a growing threat.

The former construction worker is serving a 20-year sentence for raping a prostitute at gunpoint in August 2002. Speaking from an interview booth at the Darrington prison in Rosharon, a short drive southwest of the Houston neighborhoods where MS-13 holds sway, Ascencio is open about his gang ties.

He fits the profile: buzz-cut hair, tattoos that spiderweb across his arms and chest, matter-of-fact about his allegiance to MS-13.

DOJ_NMG_0010057

He sold drugs and guns out of his pickup, he explains in broken English. An AK-47? "No problem. $600. I could get you whatever you want.

"I probably sold 200 guns.

"I brought in girls from Mexico. For prostitution? Yes. . . . We have a strong network in Houston."

Although many MS-13 members entered the United States illegally as teenagers, Ascencio says he came to Houston with his mother, from a poor working-class neighborhood in El Salvador, when he was 7. She found work as a cook at a well-known Mexican restaurant chain, Ninfa's.

He joined the gang at 14, Ascencio says, encouraged by boyhood friends in his Spring Branch neighborhood who were members. "They were all from El Salvador," he said.

Kicked out of school soon after he joined MS-13 — "for fighting," he says — Ascencio says his "homeboys" soon found him work in construction. With better English than most, he says, he was soon making up to $600 a week as a translator for mostly Mexican crews in the Houston area. His nickname? "Chaos," police records show.

Ascencio talks about "the war," the ongoing battles with rival gangs in Southwest Houston, and how much he looks forward to rejoining the gang when he leaves prison.

"It's a good thing," he says when asked about being a Mara. "We're all over the U.S. now."

A broad smile crosses his face.

"Life is a risk," Ascencio says, shrugging off questions about the violence and characterizations by some authorities that MS-13 members are terrorists. "A lot of people in the world doing the same as we are . . . I'm with them."

Why, he is asked. "Just pride. I'm a homeboy."

As he rocks back in his chair, a tattoo emerges among the many on his arms and chest. "FTW," it reads. "(Expletive) the world," Ascencio says with a grin.

'These youngsters are monsters'

If the gang is considered a top crime threat in the United States, it is just as notorious in Central America. And deadly.

In Honduras, MS-13 is considered a terrorist organization. President Ricardo Maduro, whose son was kidnapped and killed by gangs eight years ago, has ordered zero tolerance for gangs, using a new law making illicit association a crime. Mexican federal police last year rounded up hundreds of Maras after officials labeled the group a threat to national security. Like their counterparts in Honduras, Salvadoran authorities have imprisoned thousands of MS-13 members.

During the past two years, MS-13 members have been linked to or charged with horrific crimes: the gunning down of 28 men, women and children on a bus in Honduras two days before Christmas in 2004, purportedly in retaliation for a mysterious prison fire that killed 100 MS-13 members; machete attacks on rivals; retaliation rapes; drive-by shootings; even a beheading in Honduras in which a note to the country's president was reportedly pinned to the victim.

They have become killing machines, Honduran National Police Minister Oscar Alvarez said in an interview last year with National Public Radio. "They might be youngsters, they might be poor, but these youngsters are monsters," he said.

During the past two years, U.S. investigators say, brutal attacks have become the gang's calling card in the United States, as well.

In July 2003, the body of Brenda Paz, a former MS-13 member, was found dumped in a brier patch along the bucolic Shenandoah River in rural Virginia. She had been fatally stabbed, her head almost severed. She was 17 and pregnant.

She also was cooperating with investigators trying to bust the gang in at least six states, including Texas.

The previous May, MS-13 members in Alexandria, Va., used a machete to hack off several fingers of a rival gang member. In a neighboring suburb the same year, a teenager and his girlfriend were gunned down by MS-13 members who mistakenly thought they were with a rival gang.

In Texas, although shootings have marked the gang's rise in recent years, other crimes have attracted the attention of law enforcement. In 2002, investigators linked the gang to a truckload of stolen infant formula — which police suspected at the time was to be sold to support gang operations. A year later, lawmakers at a congressional hearing were told that MS-13 members in Texas were suspected of working with fences to steal large amounts of clothing, cigarettes and infant formula — in many cases, using shoplifting crews who hit drug stores, discount retailers and other merchants in swings through Texas, Oklahoma and Arkansas.

"Law enforcement in 28 states have reported MS-13 members are engaged in retail drug trafficking, primarily trafficking in powdered cocaine, crack cocaine and marijuana, and, to a lesser extent, in methamphetamine and heroin," Chris Swecker, assistant director of the FBI's criminal investigations division, testified before a U.S. House subcommittee in April 2005. "The drug proceeds are then laundered through seemingly legitimate businesses."

In the past, U.S. authorities routinely deported MS-13 members to their home countries. There, they were soon released and either spread gang activity or slipped back into the United States. Now, more and more MS-13 members are landing in state and federal prisons in the United States. Or they are imprisoned after being sent back home.

Still, officials concede, the influx continues.

For Flores, the MS-13 member from Honduras, the gang for years gave him many of the necessities of life. It smuggled him on a train through Mexico, across the border at Matamoros and onto a bus to Houston, he said. It paid the rent at the apartment where he lived. It provided his car. It helped him get a job as a roofer.

So far, he has never been deported.

Like other imprisoned MS-13 members, most of whom have deportation tags on their prison files, Flores expects he will be sent home after he completes his prison term in 2008. Those who insist that they want to remain in the gang say they expect to be able to slip back into the United States as they did before.

Flores says he wants to go back to Honduras, finish school and get married. And stay away from gang life.

Flores concedes that will be difficult, perhaps impossible. Like other gangs, MS-13 has a "blood-in, blood-out" policy, officials say, meaning that if members renounce their affiliation, they will be killed.

"I already know gangs. It's got me in trouble," he says, shaking his head. I'm not going to put myself with MS anymore."

In 10 years?

"I may be a teacher," he says.

"Or I may be dead."

Despite Denials, Rumors Of Al Qaeda Ties Linger (AAS)

By Mike Ward, AMERICAN-STATESMAN STAFF

Austin American-Statesman, January 22, 2006

Could al Qaeda terrorist operatives be teaming up with the MS-13 gang?

No, federal investigators say. There is little, if any, evidence of such a link, and it is highly unlikely that the radical Muslim organization would align itself with a predominately Catholic gang, they say.

But questions linger.

In September 2004, The Washington Times reported that a top al Qaeda lieutenant, Adnan G. El Shukrijumah, had been spotted two months earlier meeting at a Tegucigalpa, Honduras, cafe with MS-13 leaders.

Then-Attorney General John Ashcroft confirmed that the meeting was being investigated.

Shukrijumah, a cell leader for whom the United States has offered a $5 million reward, is a former South Florida resident and pilot who federal officials thought helped plan the Sept. 11 attacks. He was among seven al Qaeda suspects publicly identified by Ashcroft as being involved in planning for new attacks.

In 2004, U.S. authorities suspected that the Saudi-born Shukrijuman had sought meetings with MS-13 leaders who they said control immigrant smuggling routes into the United States through Mexico.

Ashcroft later confirmed that Shukrijumah had attempted to acquire radioactive material for the production and smuggling of a "dirty bomb" into the U.S.

Federal officials subsequently downplayed and then refuted the reports about the Honduran meeting.

In February 2005, a U.S. diplomat in Matamoros, Tamaulipas, renewed concern that al Qaeda and MS-13 might be working together. Consul John Naland's comments came after the arrest of an MS-13 member in Matamoros who was accused of trying to smuggle three immigrants into the United States and a week after federal officials confirmed the arrest of Ebner Anibal Rivera-Paz, the reputed head of the Honduran MS-13 organization outside Falfurrias, north of McAllen.

MS-13 "might be just the kind of group which would take money to smuggle an honest-to-goodness terrorist into the United States," Naland said.

Storm Scam Leads To Indictments (BRA)

By PENNY BROWN ROBERTS, Advocate staff writer

Baton Rouge Advocate, January 21, 2006

A Georgia man allegedly on his way to getting $125,000 in unemployment benefits for 49 imaginary people and four Baton Rouge residents who may have lied to get thousands in disaster relief are facing federal prison time.

A grand jury handed up indictments this week against Drewey Pierre Whitaker, 44, formerly of Villa Rica, Ga., and Ivory Profit, 30; De'Ondra Profit, 34; Monique C. Preston, 24, and Billy R. James, 30, all of Baton Rouge.

The indictments — made public Friday — bring to 26 the total number of people who have been charged in Baton Rouge federal court with fraud in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

Nationwide, more than 180 people have been arrested, said Baton Rouge U.S. Attorney David Dugas, who oversees the national Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force.

Whittaker faces five counts of wire fraud, each of which carries up to 30 years in prison, and 11 counts of illegal use of Social Security numbers, each of which carries up to five years in prison.

The indictment alleges that in September, Whittaker found a New Orleans family with the same last name and filed for FEMA disaster assistance, "falsely claiming that family's home was his own primary residence and that it had been damaged by the disaster."

At the same time, the indictment claims, he applied for disaster unemployment assistance from the Louisiana Department of Labor, claiming he lost his job with a trash-hauling service in New Orleans.

A month later, according to the indictment, Whittaker sought unemployment benefits for 49 imaginary people with the last name Ramirez or Garcia — all of them with the same birth date and fake Social Security numbers that varied by one or two digits.

When postal authorities confronted Whittaker in November while he was picking up a stack of debit cards mailed to his post office box, he told them he was "picking up the cards for his wife's relatives, all of whom he claimed were living at his residence in Villa Rica, Georgia," the indictment alleges.

Two days later, he fled to Albany, Ga., where he was arrested a month later. He is scheduled to appear before U.S. Magistrate Christine Noland on Monday afternoon.

A criminal complaint unsealed in November contends the Louisiana Department of Labor paid Whittaker $31,360 and that had the fraud not been discovered, he would have gotten $125,000.

Ivory Profit is charged with eight counts of making false and fraudulent claims for disaster assistance benefits and eight counts of illegal use of a Social Security number, each of which carries up to five years in prison.

De'Ondra Profit is charged with illegal conversion of government property — namely two checks from the Federal Emergency Management Agency for expedited disaster assistance, which carries up to 10 years in prison.

An indictment against the pair alleges Ivory Profit filed five fraudulent FEMA applications in his own name and three in De'Ondra Profit's name, using New Orleans and Harvey addresses and fake Social Security numbers.

FEMA sent the Profits two $2,000 checks, the indictment claims, which De'Ondra Profit cashed.

Preston, 10210 Avenue L., Apt. 120, was charged with one count of making false and fraudulent claims for disaster-assistance benefits and one count of making false and fraudulent statements to FEMA. She faces up to five years in prison per count if convicted.

According to the indictment, Preston got $2,000 after applying for disaster-relief benefits over the Internet in December, claiming she lived on Seventh Street in New Orleans.

James, 675 Wooddale Blvd., Apt. 75, was charged with one count of making false and fraudulent claims for disaster-assistance benefits and one count of making false and fraudulent statements to FEMA. He faces up to five years in prison per count if convicted.

The indictment alleges James got $2,000 after applying for disaster-relief benefits in September, claiming he lived at the same address in Apt. 142.

Ex-N.O. Officer Charged In Post-Katrina Theft (BRA)

By JOE GYAN JR., Advocate staff writer

Baton Rouge Advocate, January 21, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — A federal grand jury accused a former New Orleans police officer Friday of driving across state lines with a new pickup truck looted from a Cadillac dealership during Hurricane Katrina.

Willie Earl Bickham Jr. is charged with interstate transportation of a stolen motor vehicle: a black 2005 Chevrolet Silverado.

Houston police arrested Bickham in November driving the stolen truck. Police said he admitted taking the vehicle.

More than 200 vehicles were stolen from Sewell Cadillac Chevrolet in New Orleans in the aftermath of the Aug. 29 hurricane. New Orleans police acknowledged that some of the vehicles were taken to replace flooded patrol cars.

The Louisiana Attorney General's Office is investigating the Sewell matter.

U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said Friday that federal prosecutors and the FBI are keeping their ears "close to the track" for incidents such as Bickham's that might arise and require federal attention.

The 36-year-old Bickham joined the New Orleans Police Department in 1992 and resigned from the force the week after Katrina.

If convicted, he faces up to 10 years in prison and $250,000 in fines.

Letten said Bickham is free on bond.

He is scheduled to appear in a New Orleans federal court Feb. 3.

Siemens Subsidiary Charged With $49 Million Contract Fraud (AP)

By MIKE ROBINSON, AP Legal Affairs Writer

AP, January 21, 2006

A Pennsylvania-based subsidiary of German electronics company Siemens AG and two of its executives have been indicted on charges of forming a sham partnership with a minority-owned company to land a $49 million county contract, prosecutors announced Friday.

The minority-owned company and its owner were also charged. Both were previously indicted in the investigation.

"Once again, we're here because fraud was involved in a major contract in Cook County," U.S. Attorney Patrick J. Fitzgerald told reporters in announcing the indictment that was returned Thursday.

Siemens Medical Solutions USA Inc., based in Malvern, Pa., was charged with fraudulently telling officials that it was partnering in the bid for the contract to provide radiology equipment to the county's new John H. Stroger Jr. Hospital with a minority-owned business, Faustech Industries Inc.

Prosecutors said Siemens claimed to be in partnership with Faustech because county officials were requiring that it was necessary to have 30 percent minority ownership to win the contract.

But in reality Siemens paid Faustech's sole owner, Faust Villazan, a flat fee of $500,000 to pose as a partner, according to the indictment. It said that Faustech had no partnership stake.

A spokesman for Siemens Corp., the parent company for its U.S. operations, says it broke no laws and will fight the charges.

"We felt the agreement was consistent with the minority rules," said spokesman Jack Bergen. "... The worst one could say is that we were in the wrong place in the wrong time."

Prosecutors said the alleged scheme frustrated the intention of county rules that were designed to ensure that minority-owned companies not only get a payment out of such contracts but share in the management and any profits or losses resulting from the enterprise.

The alleged scam was uncovered in 2000 when Fairfield, Conn.-based General Electric Co., which also had sought the contract, filed a lawsuit that claimed fraud was involved in awarding the contract to Siemens.

Robert D. Grant, special agent in charge of the Chicago office of the FBI, said the government is "determined to ensure that public contracts, especially those in the lucrative health care industry, are obtained based on merit and are not tainted by corruption."

Siemens Medical Solutions was charged with one count of wire fraud and one count of mail fraud. The company is a wholly owned U.S. medical supply subsidiary of Siemens AG, which is publicly traded and has headquarters in Erlangen, Germany.

Prosecutors also charged a pair of Siemens executives. Daniel Desmond, 43, of suburban Arlington Heights, was charged with one count each of mail fraud and wire fraud and perjury stemming from the General Electric suit. He is the district business administrator of the Siemens Medical district office in the Chicago suburb of Hoffman Estates.

His attorney, Royal B. Martin, said in a statement Friday that Desmond acted "in the best interests of both Cook County and his employer, Siemens, and welcomes having an impartial jury of his peers judge his conduct."

Ellen Roth, 61, of Ridgewood, N.J., an in-house attorney for Siemens, was charged with one count each of mail fraud, wire fraud and making false statements to the FBI. Telephone messages left for Roth and her attorney were not immediately returned.

Villazan, 44, of Western Springs and Faustech were indicted in September on charges of mail fraud, wire fraud and bribery in the case and denied the charges. The fresh indictment repeated those charges.

His attorney, Terrence Gillespie, said Friday he hadn't yet read the indictment and refused to comment.

"We're certainly not surprised," Gillespie said Friday. "We've known this was coming for a while."

Siemens' U.S.-listed shares fell $1.87, or 2.2 percent, to close at $84.23 on the New York Stock Exchange Friday.

Stroger Contractor Indicted In 'Sham' (CHIT)

By Mickey Ciokajlo And Robert Becker, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, January 23, 2006

A federal grand jury has indicted Siemens Medical Solutions USA Inc. and two of its employees on fraud charges related to the awarding of a $49 million Cook County hospital contract.

The charges were announced today in a superceding indictment that also added new charges against minority contractor Faust Villazan and his former company, Faustech Industries.

Villazan, 44, of Western Springs, and Faustech originally were indicted in September for allegedly passing a $20,000 bribe to a Cook County employee to influence the award of the radiology contract during the construction of the new Stroger Hospital.

Villazan had joined with Siemens to form a joint venture in bidding on the contract. County rules at the time required a certain percentage of minority participation in contracts, and Villazan was a minority businessman.

In the superceding indictment handed up late Thursday afternoon, prosecutors alleged the joint venture was a sham and did not comply with county contracting rules because Villazan received a flat fee of $500,000 and did not share in the profit or loss of the deal.

Cook County required that 30 percent of the hospital contract go toward a minority- or women-owned business, U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald said at a news conference today to announce the charges.

"A minority business enterprise had to share in the risks and the losses, if the contract lost (money), and also share in the profits and genuinely in the work of what was happening," Fitzgerald said. "It was not simply you had to pay an amount of money to have a minority business affiliated with the contract."

Robert Grant, special agent in charge of the FBI's Chicago office, said Villazan entered into the Siemens deal "for the sole purpose of personal greed," saying, in effect, "I'm a minority business enterprise, and I'm for sale."

In the superceding indictment, Villazan and Faustech, which is now out of business, were charged with one count each of wire fraud, mail fraud and bribery.

Siemens Medical Solutions USA Inc., formerly Siemens Medical Systems, was indicted on one count each of wire fraud and mail fraud. A subsidiary of Siemens AG, of Germany, the unit has a local field office in Hoffman Estates.

Company employee Daniel Desmond, 43, of Arlington Heights, was indicted on one count each of mail and wire fraud as well as one count of perjury. Desmond was the company's district business administrator and was president of DD Industries, the joint venture that was formed for the bid and named after him.

Also, in-house Siemens lawyer Ellen Roth, 61, of Ridgewood, N.J., was indicted on one count each of wire fraud, mail fraud and making false statements to the FBI.

The defendants are to be arraigned at a later date in U.S. District Court in Chicago, prosecutors said.

DD Industries was awarded the county contract on Aug. 9, 2000. But that October, a competitor, GE Medical Systems, filed suit in federal court alleging fraud in the awarding of the contract.

The parties ultimately settled the suit, and nearly all of Stroger Hospital's radiology contract was transferred to GE, prosecutors said.

The superceding indict alleges that during court proceedings in the GE suit, the defendants concealed the side agreement between Siemens and Villazan, promising him the $500,000 payment.

Prosecutors said Desmond perjured himself in his trial testimony, and that an unnamed Siemens attorney kept Roth and corporate management apprised of the proceedings, and they did nothing to correct the official record.

Finally, Roth lied to FBI agents when they questioned her last September about an e-mail that confirmed the $500,000 flat-fee agreement between Siemens and Villazan, Fitzgerald said.

"If not for the light shed on the scheme by a competitor, this fraud might not have been uncovered," Grant said.

Desmond's attorney, Royal B. Martin, said in a statement that Desmond acted "in the best interests of both Cook County and his employer, Siemens, and welcomes having an impartial jury of his peers judge his conduct."

Villazan's attorney, Terrence Gillespie, said he had not yet read the indictment and refused to comment.

"We're certainly not surprised," Gillespie said. "We've known this was coming for a while."

A telephone message left with Roth was not immediately returned, the Associated Press reported.

If found guilty of the charges, the defendants face prison sentences of 5 to 10 years and fines in the hundreds of thousands of dollars, prosecutors said.

The Associated Press contributed to this story.

Firm Indicted In Scheme To Get Contract At Stroger Hospital (CHIT)

By Robert Becker And Mickey Ciokajlo, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, January 23, 2006

A major corporation and two of its employees were indicted in a fraudulent scheme to win a $49 million Cook County contract, a deal that also involved bribery of a county employee, federal prosecutors alleged Friday.

A grand jury late Thursday handed up indictments against Siemens Medical Solutions USA Inc., a subsidiary of Germany-based Siemens AG, one of its in-house lawyers and a locally based district manager.

The officials allegedly schemed with a minority contractor, Faust Villazan, in setting up a shell company to win the contract for radiology equipment at the then-new Stroger Hospital.

U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald said Villazan and his company, Faustech Industries Inc., received a flat fee of $500,000 without providing any real service and without sharing in the risks or profits of the deal.

"The joint venture was, in fact, a sham," Fitzgerald said.

The Siemens subsidiary, company lawyer Ellen Roth and Hoffman Estates-based administrator Daniel Desmond were each indicted on one count of wire fraud and mail fraud.

Desmond, 43, of Arlington Heights, was also charged with perjury for allegedly lying about the deal in federal court after a competitor filed a lawsuit to nullify the deal. Roth, 61, of Ridgewood, N.J., was also charged with allegedly lying to FBI agents in 2004.

In September, Villazan and Faustech had been indicted on a bribery charge. Villazan allegedly paid a $20,000 bribe to an employee in the county's contract compliance office to influence the deal. The employee has not been charged or named by prosecutors. Thursday's superseding indictment added fraud charges against Villazan and Faustech.

Siemens officials and attorneys for the defendants denied any wrongdoing. "We broke no law, and the worst one can say is we were in the wrong place at the wrong time," said Jack Bergen, Siemen's senior vice president for corporate affairs and marketing.

"It is very sad that the government has chosen to seek federal charges in this case, especially against Ellen Roth, who has an excellent reputation as a lawyer and as a person," said her lawyer, Michael Monico. "We look forward to a trial and being vindicated in this matter."

The allegations underlying the indictments were originally brought to light more than five years ago when General Electric, a losing bidder for the radiology contract, filed a lawsuit in federal court. A magistrate determined that the joint venture did not comply with county minority set-aside guidelines, causing the County Board to cancel the deal and award the contract to GE for $57 million.

Medical Supplier's Officials Indicted In Cover-up (CHIST)

By ABDON M. PALLASCH AND DAVE NEWBART, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, January 21, 2006

An executive and an attorney for medical supply giant Siemens have been indicted for allegedly lying to the FBI and a federal judge to cover up a scheme in which Siemens paid a minority businessman to be their phony partner in a $49 million Cook County contract.

"They went before a judge and took an oath," said U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald.

Last year, a grand jury indicted businessman Faust Villazan for allegedly bribing an unidentified Cook County official with $20,000 to approve his bid for Siemens to supply radiology equipment at Cook County Hospital for $49 million.

All deny wrongdoing

The superseding indictment handed up late Thursday and made public Friday adds as defendants Siemens Medical Solutions USA, an American subsidiary of Germany's Siemens AG, an electronics powerhouse; Daniel Desmond, the business administrator of SMS's Hoffman Estates office, and Ellen Roth, in-house attorney for Siemens, USA.

Attorneys and representatives for Siemens, Roth, Desmond and Villazan all denied wrongdoing by their clients said they would be vindicated in court.

Instead of following the county's rules, which require a company to have a 30 percent minority partner, Siemens allegedly privately agreed to pay Villazan $500,000 to pretend to be a 30 percent partner.

"He had to share in the risks, the losses, the profits and the work," Fitzgerald said.

Siemens stood to make most of the profits from the $49 million deal under the secret agreement prepared with the knowledge of Siemens officials, Fitzgerald said.

GE -- which lost to Siemens in the bidding -- sued the county and Siemens in federal court, alleging fraud in the bidding process. Siemens officials, including Roth and Desmond, lied in court and said there had been no fraud, officials said. Roth told the FBI she would be "shocked" to learn that Siemens entered into any "side" agreement with Villazan to pay him just $500,000 on the deal instead of 30 percent, Fitzgerald said.

Chicago FBI chief Robert Grant said the true victims of the fraud were minority-owned businesses the county's rules were designed to help.

Fitzgerald would not elaborate on the $20,000 bribe Villazan allegedly paid a still-unidentified county official, or whether the donations Villazan and Siemens made to Cook County commissioners on the eve of the contract implicated any commissioner. Smiling, Fitzgerald acknowledged that count is "a bit skimpy" but noted the investigation continues.

Civil lawsuit credited

Fitzgerald's office has subpoenaed information from Commissioner Roberto Maldonado and interviewed Commissioner Joseph Mario Moreno. Villazan also made donations to County Board President John Stroger and Commissioner Deborah Sims.

Faustech and Siemens gave $3,000 to Maldonado before the bids were to be submitted. They gave Moreno $1,500 on July 2, 1999, and Stroger $500 on April 26, 2000.

"I think the feds should continue their investigation the way that they are doing," Maldonado said.

"It's unfortunate that anyone has to get involved in doing stuff like that to get business," Moreno said. "Certainly it doesn't surprise me."

Fitzgerald and Grant credited GE's civil lawsuit filed four years ago with starting the process of exposing the alleged fraud.

"If not for the light shed on this scheme by a competitor, this fraud might not have been uncovered," Grant said.

"I'm pleased to see that both the individuals and the companies involved are being called to account for their roles in perpetrating this scheme and attempting to cover it up," said GE's attorney Kathy Roach.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Geraldine Soat Brown ruled in the civil case that Faustech appeared to have been brought into the deal merely to facilitate "access" for Siemens executives to county officials.

Man Gets Four Years In Lucrative Credit Card Scam (AP)

AP, January 23, 2006

NEW ORLEANS A New Orleans man has been sentenced to four years in prison and ordered to pay 35-thousand dollars in restitution after a jury found him guilty of stealing the credit card numbers of people and using them to buy merchandise that he would resell.The U-S Attorney's Office says Jerome McNeil and an accomplice recruited some cashiers at Kenner's Esplanade Mall and a restaurant to use a credit card skimmer to record customers credit card numbers.McNeil then used those numbers to purchase items and sell them on the street at half price.U-S Attorney Jim Letten said the pair was so brazen that they even began to distribute business cards on the street.Letten said McNeil and his accomplice earned between six-thousand and eight-thousand dollars a day in cash between November 2002 and January 2003.(From WWL-TV, New Orleans)

Calling All Future Police Officers (CSM)

By Kris Axtman

The Christian Science Monitor, January 23, 2006

HOUSTON - It seems that police work - the ho-hum "protect and serve" variety once glamorized in the 1970s and '80s on TV shows like "Adam-12," "CHiPs," and "Hill Street Blues" - went out with wide lapels.

The result is a major shortage of police recruits - which has reached crisis proportions in some cities - and fewer cops on the street than top brass say are needed for public protection.

The problem has several sources: low pay, a big hole left by retiring baby boomers, and an image problem that steers the few young people who are interested in law-enforcement careers toward crime-scene investigation and forensics, rather than everyday street patrols.

To remedy the manpower shortage, some law-enforcement agencies are getting creative. They are giving new recruits help with down payments on homes and, for experienced officers in other locales, they are offering signing bonuses for switching to a new city. They're even encouraging their own officers to find new recruits in exchange for extra vacation time.

"I haven't been to a place in this country where agencies aren't concerned about the number and quality of their officers," says Elaine Deck, who studies recruitment issues for the International Association of Chiefs of Police in Alexandria, Va.

The shortage has made officer retention a top concern of police departments, most of which report they are 10 percent shy of the numbers they need, she says. Law-enforcement agencies say the consequences are slower emergency-response times and backlogs in criminal cases.

In an aggressive move to get more boots on the ground, the Houston Police Department wants to offer $7,000 signing bonuses to any police officer who moves here and completes a 12-week modified training academy.

The idea is to lure experienced officers from other Texas law-enforcement agencies, so the city won't have to spend as much time training them. In return, the relocated officers will receive financial credit for up to five years of experience elsewhere - something that is not typically done.

The proposal came before a city council committee last week and hasn't yet been set for a full vote. The department hopes to train 70 "lateral" officers - those with experience in other Texas agencies - in March.

"I can't ever remember having a full lateral class, but we are already getting inquiries," says Craig Ferrell Jr., the department's general counsel, who says lateral classes average between 25 and 35 officers.

At the San Diego County Sheriff's Department in California, officials say such incentives are working. Down 10 percent on its staffing earlier this year, the department tripled its advertising budget and began offering signing bonuses of up to $5,000.

"It's starting to pick up. The incentives are helping," says Lt. Mike Barletta in the department's personnel division. "What we are actually doing is robbing nearby agencies of their people."

The recruiting has left some hard feelings at nearby agencies, but the sheriff's department's ad campaign is helping overall recruitment in the area by promoting law enforcement as a desirable career, he says.

The San Diego County department, like many agencies nationwide, began to see the number of recruits fall in the 1990s, but the drop-off became a crisis only in the past few years as retirements increased.

Lieutenant Barletta, for his part, also blames the media, which he says began to demonize police officers after the Rodney King beating by Los Angeles police officers in 1991.

"The glamour was taken off the job, and people began to think that all cops were bad," he says. "Who would want to put up with that?"

To try to make law enforcement an appealing career again, agencies across the nation are resorting to advertising campaigns. Others are changing physical agility tests to more accurately reflect the kind of work their officers do. Some are streamlining the recruiting process to put officers on the streets faster.

Some analysts ask, though, if such efforts will yield many recruits among a generation of young people with different ideas about work. "Those of us who began working in the 1960s and '70s live to work. Our identity is wrapped up in what we do," says Ms. Deck. "Young people today work to live. They are more concerned about spending time with family and friends."

That means working late or on weekends is less acceptable. The average starting salary, $32,000 a year, is another deterrent - especially as the economy picks back up.

"Police work, like patrolling, is dangerous, and the pay is too low," says Brittaney Riojas, a bubbly junior at Houston's High School for Law Enforcement and Criminal Justice.

Like many of her fellow students who have grown up in the computer age, Brittaney doesn't find old-fashioned police work very exciting. She wants to do crime-scene investigations. "Shows like 'CSI,' 'Without a Trace,' 'Numb3rs,' they make it seem so interesting," she says.

Aaron Najera, a junior, is one of the few at the magnet school interested in traditional policing. Given the staffing shortages, he doesn't expect to have a problem getting a police job here when he turns 21. "Since I was a kid, I've wanted to be a superhero who went around helping people. I figure the closest thing to that is a police officer."

CIVIL LAW:

Case Puts Focus On Conflicts Of Interest In Contracts (WP)

By Charles R. Babcock

DOJ_NMG_0010066

In August, local defense contractor Alion Science and Technology Corp. faced the imminent loss of one of its largest contracts, a $275 million deal helping manage the Pentagon's military communications network. The government had just announced that Advanced Engineering & Sciences of Reston, a division of contracting giant ITT Industries Inc., would take over the work.

But today Alion, which has helped run the Pentagon's Joint Spectrum Center in Annapolis for decades, is back in contention for the job.

In a case that could signal a more aggressive federal approach toward potential conflicts of interest in contracting, Alion convinced government reviewers that a division of ITT should not be allowed to manage a program that potentially would be evaluating products made by the defense conglomerate -- or at least not without much more analysis then the Pentagon initially performed.

This month, the Government Accountability Office agreed, indicating that it was going to begin looking more closely at "organizational conflicts of interest" -- the potential for a company to end up in a situation in which it is essentially evaluating itself or its competitors -- and would make sure contracting agencies begin paying more attention as well.

The spectrum center oversees the military's expanding demand for radio frequencies, and it evaluates communications equipment for the armed services. Because ITT makes radio equipment, the GAO said that before the company could be awarded the contract, the military had to more carefully study its potentially "impaired objectivity" in carrying out the work.

The decision was "a bit of a shocker," said Christopher R. Yukins, who follows the issue as an associate professor of government contract law at the George Washington University Law School. The GAO sustains only about one of every five bid protests. While it had made a similar decision last year, Yukins said this case goes further and is a "clear statement [the GAO] is going to be second-guessing agencies, not deferring to them," if their analysis of possible conflicts is not thorough or well documented.

The potential for organizational conflicts is a growing concern as the government outsources more technical work to private companies and the defense industry continues to consolidate. In a recent paper, Daniel I. Gordon, who runs the GAO's bid protest operation, called organizational conflicts "a significant part" of the federal procurement landscape that "present an integrity challenge and merit attention."

Yukins added that Congress also has expressed concern about possible conflicts among "lead systems integrators," the contractors who in effect run large defense programs and pick other contractors to provide goods and services for the job. The defense authorization bill President Bush just signed includes a provision requiring the Defense Department to report on actions it is taking to prevent or mitigate such problems.

The contracting industry recognizes the potential problem but cautions agencies not to go too far. Chris Jahn, president of the Contract Services Association, a trade group representing more than 200 companies that perform $40 billion in government services contracts, said: "Where conflicts of interest do exist, contractors should disclose them and take necessary precautions to limit them, but they should still be allowed to fairly compete for those contracts. The government needs to then make an informed decision as to whether those conflicts are a significant issue."

Alion and ITT declined to comment on the substance of the recent GAO decision because the final contract winner hasn't been determined.

The new contract for managing the spectrum office is worth up to $500 million over 10 years. Officials at the Defense Information Systems Agency (DISA), which issued the award, said the agency would be "carefully reviewing GAO's decision and determining how best to proceed." In the meantime, the agency said Alion's current contract would be extended.

Alion, an employee-owned company that does almost all of its business with the Pentagon, has held contracts to help manage the Annapolis spectrum center since the 1960s.

The context for the dispute over the new contract is described in a U.S. Court of Federal Claims decision last fall. In ruling against an Alion effort to postpone the ITT award, Judge Lawrence J. Block noted that technology is changing how the military operates.

DOJ_NMG_0010067

He described special forces troops in Afghanistan using space age communications while riding mules to call in precision airstrikes against Taliban targets. Such reliance has given the military "a nearly insatiable appetite" for new communications technology, Block wrote, and a crucial need for a range of electromagnetic spectrum.

Block's ruling said the Pentagon spectrum office experienced "a sea change" in the way it approached its job and sought a new contractor to supply more technical expertise. DISA concluded that only the ITT division could supply the personnel needed for the new work, which included preparing for important international meetings on use of the spectrum.

When the defense agency picked Advanced Engineering and Sciences in August, Alion filed a protest raising the conflict issue. That led the Pentagon to take "corrective action," the GAO decision said. It asked the bidders to submit revised plans for dealing with conflicts. ITT raised the idea of using subcontractors protected by a firewall to perform any functions it could not. DISA concluded the maximum potential for "impaired objectivity" would be 15 percent of the contract's projects and reconfirmed its award to the ITT division.

In sustaining a second Alion protest, the GAO noted that it was clear that ITT sold many radio and radar systems to the Defense Department and foreign governments.

It said DISA had "failed to reasonably identify and evaluate" ITT's possible conflicts.

Beware The B-Readers (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2006

Of all the unsavory details rolling out of investigations into the silicosis and asbestos scams, some of the ugliest concern doctors who abandoned their ethics to cash in. Even more disturbing is the growing evidence that what has allowed them to get away with this is a federal certification program.

That's why a coalition of industry and other groups has began pushing the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health (Niosh) to start policing its "B-reader" program, which certifies doctors to read X-rays. The federal agency proposed new ethics rules in November, after a federal judge slammed several government-certified doctors who had ginned up sham diagnoses in a silicosis suit. But Niosh needs to go much further to clean up this corrupt corner of American medicine.

Niosh's B-reader program started in the 1970s, as the government tracked coal workers with black lung disease. Niosh was concerned about the competence of doctors reading chest X-rays, so it began a training course and test. Those who pass become known as "B-readers." By all accounts the test is difficult; pass rates can hover around 50%, a number that's even lower for recertification. Over time the program has certified some 1,200 B-readers, of which there are more than 500 today.

Most of these professionals perform valuable roles in the occupational-hazard world. But a growing number of B-readers are now leveraging their credentials to abet fraudulent litigation. These doctors churn out staggering numbers of X-ray "readings" that purport to find diseases such as asbestosis and silicosis -- readings that are then seen to come with a "government stamp of approval." Their standing is so high that litigators often forward their work as proof of a diagnosis, even though the medical world universally agrees that X-rays alone never prove a serious illness. In short, a program designed to raise standards has been hijacked for the opposite purpose. * * *

Reading any X-ray is tricky, and studies show there is a 30% variance in how even honest doctors read the same chest film. Yet the B-readers who've hired themselves out to lawyers have proven that their work has little to do with medicine.

In a 2004 study published in the journal Radiology, Johns Hopkins researchers obtained 492 chest X-rays that had been used in asbestos litigation. They then had these same X-rays examined by six independent B-readers, none of whom were told what the original interpretations had been, or even that the X-rays had been used in litigation. The initial (lawyer-retained) B-readers had found that 96% of the cases revealed abnormalities. The independent panel found 4.5%.

Niosh has also found amazing disparities. One famous example involved a tort bar scheme called the National Tire Workers Litigation Project, which sent doctors around the country in mobile X-ray vans to screen rubber workers for asbestosis. Information distributed to tire workers stated that 64% of those screened at one location had shown positive for asbestosis, and 94% at a second location. Yet when Niosh had an independent panel evaluate X-rays of tire workers most at risk for the disease, it found asbestosis in 0.2%.

What kicked off this recent scrutiny of B-readers was Texas federal Judge Janis Graham Jack's withering decision in a giant silicosis suit last July, in which she found that doctors had been "manufacturing" claims for money. Of the seven physicians she singled out for special criticism, five were Niosh-certified B-readers. Some of these doctors simply signed diagnosing language provided to them by others. Some did not write, read or sign their own reports. More than 6,000 of the 10,000 silicosis plaintiffs had also filed asbestos claims, despite the medical rarity of having both diseases; sometimes the same doctor had signed both reports.

None of this is surprising considering these "doctors" have become little more than experts-for-hire. Certain B-readers long ago came to understand that their government-issued credentials made them valuable in court, and therefore worth a lot of money. Many doctors are paid more if they find a disease than if they don't. Dr. Ray Harron, a key figure in silicosis-asbestos diagnoses, made an estimated $5 million for his work for one screening company. * * *

In a better world, these doctors would have been stopped long ago by state medical boards, which are supposed to enforce medical standards. These bodies have come in for a lot of deserved criticism of late for their reluctance to discipline these doctors, yet so far have shown no signs of cracking down.

Another possibility is greater involvement by professional bodies, although that has its limits. The current ethics committee chair for the American College of Radiology, Dr. Leonard Berlin, tells us that even if the college has real evidence of wrongdoing, the most it can do is "either suspend or revoke their membership. It doesn't stop them from practicing."

Which gets back to Niosh. The agency's new ethics rules are a good start, particularly as they are aimed at B-readers involved in litigation. But the outside commentators are on to something when they suggest that Niosh also audit doctors who receive its government-sanctioned credentials. The agency already conducts an audit program for respirator devices, and a similar one could be set up for B-readers. It might start by investigating the X-rays that Judge Jack still has in her court document depository.

If Niosh isn't willing to audit, perhaps it should abolish the B-reader program altogether. Other countries have managed to turn out qualified X-ray readers without such special credentials. But certainly the last thing we need is for the federal government to keep blithely providing yet more "expert witnesses" to corrupt the court system.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Politics Alleged In Voting Cases (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

The Justice Department's voting section, a small and usually obscure unit that enforces the Voting Rights Act and other federal election laws, has been thrust into the center of a growing debate over recent departures and controversial decisions in the Civil Rights Division as a whole.

Many current and former lawyers in the section charge that senior officials have exerted undue political influence in many of the sensitive voting-rights cases the unit handles. Most of the department's major voting-related actions over the past five years have been beneficial to the GOP, they say, including two in Georgia, one in Mississippi and a Texas redistricting plan orchestrated by Rep. Tom DeLay (R) in 2003.

The section also has lost about a third of its three dozen lawyers over the past nine months. Those who remain have been barred from offering recommendations in major voting-rights cases and have little input in the section's decisions on hiring and policy.

"If the Department of Justice and the Civil Rights Division is viewed as political, there is no doubt that credibility is lost," former voting-section chief Joe Rich said at a recent panel discussion in Washington. He added: "The voting section is always subject to political pressure and tension. But I never thought it would come to this."

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and his aides dispute such criticism and defend the department's actions in voting cases. "We're not going to politicize decisions within the department," he told reporters last month after The Washington Post had disclosed staff memoranda recommending objections to a Georgia voter-identification plan and to the Texas redistricting.

The 2005 Georgia case has been particularly controversial within the section. Staff members complain that higher-ranking Justice officials ignored serious problems with data supplied by the state in approving the plan, which would have required voters to carry photo identification.

Georgia provided Justice with information on Aug. 26 suggesting that tens of thousands of voters may not have driver's licenses or other identification required to vote, according to officials and records. That added to the concerns of a team of voting-section employees who had concluded that the Georgia plan would hurt black voters.

But higher-ranking officials disagreed, and approved the plan later that day. They said that as many as 200,000 of those without ID cards were felons and illegal immigrants and that they would not be eligible to vote anyway.

One of the officials involved in the decision was Hans von Spakovsky, a former head of the Fulton County GOP in Atlanta, who had long advocated a voter-identification law for the state and oversaw many voting issues at Justice. Justice spokesman Eric W. Holland said von Spakovsky's previous activities did not require a recusal and had no impact on his actions in the Georgia case.

Holland denied a request to interview von Spakovsky, saying that department policy "does not authorize the media to conduct interviews with staff attorneys." Von Spakovsky has since been named to the Federal Election Commission in a recess appointment by President Bush.

In written answers to questions from The Post, Holland called allegations of partisanship in the voting section "categorically untrue." He said the Bush administration has approved the vast majority of the approximately 3,000 redistricting plans it has reviewed, including many drawn up by Democrats.

Holland and other Justice officials also emphasize the Bush administration's aggressive enforcement of laws requiring foreign-language ballot information in districts where minorities make up a significant portion of the population. Since 2001, the division has filed 14 lawsuits to provide comprehensive language programs for minorities, including the first aimed at Filipino and Vietnamese voters, he said.

"We have undertaken the most vigorous enforcement of the language minority provisions of the Voting Rights Act in its history," Holland said.

Some lawyers who have recently left the Civil Rights Division, such as Rich at the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law and William Yeomans at the American Constitution Society, have taken the unusual step of publicly criticizing the way voting matters have been handled. Other former and current employees have discussed the controversy on the condition of anonymity for fear of retribution.

These critics say that the total number of redistricting cases approved under Bush means little because the section has always cleared the vast majority of the hundreds of plans it reviews every year.

The Bush administration has also initiated relatively few cases under Section 2, the main anti-discrimination provision of the Voting Rights Act, filing seven lawsuits over the past five years -- including the department's first reverse-discrimination complaint on behalf of white voters. The only case involving black voters was begun under the previous administration and formally filed by transitional leadership in early 2001.

By comparison, department records show, 14 Section 2 lawsuits were filed during the last two years of Bill Clinton's presidency alone.

Conflicts in the voting-rights arena at Justice are not new, particularly during Republican administrations, when liberal-leaning career lawyers often clash with more conservative political appointees, experts say. The conflicts have been further exacerbated by recent court rulings that have made it more difficult for Justice to challenge redistricting plans.

William Bradford Reynolds, the civil rights chief during the Reagan administration, opposed affirmative-action remedies and court-ordered busing -- and regularly battled with career lawyers in the division as a result. During the administration of George H.W. Bush, the division aggressively pushed for the creation of districts that were more than 60 percent black in a strategy designed to produce more solidly white and Republican districts in the South.

These districts were widely credited with boosting the GOP in the region during the 1994 elections.

Rich, who worked in the Civil Rights Division for 37 years, said the conflicts in the current administration are more severe than in earlier years. "I was there in the Reagan years, and this is worse," he said.

But Michael A. Carvin, a civil rights deputy under Reagan, said such allegations amount to "revisionist history." He contended that the voting section has long tilted to the left politically.

Carvin and other conservatives also say the opinions of career lawyers in the section frequently have been at odds with the courts, including a special panel in Texas that rejected challenges to the Republican-sponsored redistricting plan there. The Supreme Court has since agreed to hear the case.

"The notion that they are somehow neutral or somehow ideologically impartial is simply not supported by the evidence," Carvin said. "It hasn't been the politicos that were departing from the law or normal practice, but the voting-rights section."

In Mississippi in 2002, Justice political appointees rejected a recommendation from career lawyers to approve a redistricting plan favorable to Democrats. While Justice delayed issuing a final decision, a panel of three GOP federal judges approved a plan favorable to a Republican congressman.

The division has also issued unusually detailed legal opinions favoring Republicans in at least two states, contrary to what former staff members describe as a dictum to avoid unnecessary involvement in partisan disputes. The practice ended up embarrassing the department in Arizona in 2005, when Justice officials had to rescind a letter that wrongly endorsed the legality of a GOP bill limiting provisional ballots.

In Georgia, a federal judge eventually ruled against the voter identification plan on constitutional grounds, likening it to a poll tax from the Jim Crow era. The measure would have required voters to pay $20 for a special card if they did not have photo identification; Georgia Republicans are pushing ahead this year with a bill that does not charge a fee for the card.

Holland called the data in the case "very straightforward," and said it showed statistically that 100 percent of Georgians had identification and that no racial disparities were evident.

But an Aug. 25 staff memo that recommended opposing the plan disparaged the quality of the state's information and said that only limited conclusions could be drawn from it.

"They took all that data and willfully misread it," one source familiar with the case said. "They were only looking for statistics that would back up their view."

Mark Posner, a former longtime Civil Rights Division lawyer who teaches election law at American University, noted that Justice could have taken as many as 60 more days -- rather than seven hours -- to issue an opinion because of the new data.

Staff writer Thomas B. Edsall and researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

Demonstrators Mark Roe V. Wade Anniversary (AP)

By Martiga Lohn

The Associated Press, January 23, 2006

ST. PAUL, Minn. -- Thousands of abortion opponents massed outside Minnesota's Capitol on Sunday in one of several protests nationwide on the 33rd anniversary of the Roe v. Wade ruling, amid heightened hopes and fears over what a new face on the Supreme Court will mean for the decision establishing abortion rights.

A crowd of sign-wavers clad in parkas, winter boots and collars turned up against a cutting wind to call for a ban on public funding of abortion.

"We must stop abortion in our state," said Scott Fischbach, head of Minnesota Citizens Concerned for Life. "Things are changing in this country."

Many abortion opponents said they were heartened by President Bush's choice of Samuel Alito to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a moderate who was often the court's swing vote.

Alito, who appears to have solid support from the Senate's Republican majority, refused during his confirmation hearings to agree with assertions by Democrats that Roe v. Wade was "settled law," upsetting supporters of abortion rights and heartening opponents.

"We have a dream today that someday soon this will not be an anniversary of sadness, but an anniversary of justice restored," said Minnesota's Republican Gov. Tim Pawlenty.

DOJ_NMG_0010071

In San Francisco, thousands of abortion opponents shouldering signs with slogans such as "Peace Begins in the Womb" marched Saturday, while abortion rights supporters along the march route waved clothes hangers and shouted "Bigots go home."

"Abortion rights have been slowly whittled away while we haven't even been looking," said Kitty Striker, 22, who decorated her hair with small coat hanger replicas for the counter-protest. "That's what's so shocking and so scary to me."

In Idaho, nearly 400 abortion protesters marched at the Statehouse Saturday, including Reid Richardson and his 5-year-old stepdaughter, Allie Zebley, who carried sign with her ultrasound photo and the words, "This is me at 16 weeks."

About half that number gathered Sunday outside the Idaho Capitol in support of abortion rights.

"When American women are barred from accessing health services at the whim of a politician's religious beliefs, we are not in a democracy at all," said Bree Herndon-Michael, a member of the Idaho Women's Network.

The largest abortion demonstration was expected Monday in Washington, D.C., where anti-abortion activists planned to converge on the mall to hear speakers supporting their cause and march on the Congress and Supreme Court.

Many who support abortion rights held a candlelight vigil in front of the Supreme Court Sunday night, waving signs that read: "Alito-No Justice For Women," and "Keep Abortion Legal."

The nation's high court made abortion legal on Jan. 22, 1973. But efforts to restrict or outlaw the procedure have been just as enduring; 34 states have passed laws requiring parents either to be notified or to give consent when their underage daughters seek abortions.

This year, abortion foes in Minnesota will try to encourage the Legislature to ban public funding of abortions for Medicaid recipients, which has been required since a 1995 state Supreme Court decision. They are also campaigning against the re-election of a justice who supported the decision.

In Michigan, a group of ministry leaders used the anniversary to launch a new anti-abortion organization, Michigan Chooses Life. One goal is to support efforts to get a measure on the 2006 ballot that would change the state constitution to legally define a person as existing at the moment of conception. The American Civil Liberties Union of Michigan has said that even if the measure does succeed, it will be challenged in court.

Pro-life Groups See Brighter Days (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, January 23, 2006

As tens of thousands of abortion foes prepare for today's 33rd annual March for Life, they are buoyed by developments they see as promising for their cause, both at the state and federal levels.

"The pro-life movement is in the best position it has ever been in," said Wendy Wright, executive vice president of Concerned Women for America (CWA).

Pro-life advocates are excited about broad abortion bans proposed by lawmakers in two states, Ohio and Indiana.

It's their hope that these bills become law and that the statutes are eventually considered and upheld by a more conservative U.S. Supreme Court in a challenge to the Jan. 22, 1973, ruling in Roe v. Wade that abortion was a constitutional right.

"We're seeing, after many years of education and work, that people are beginning to understand the pro-life movement. The culture is shifting to a more pro-life perspective," said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, which opposes abortion.

Miss Wright of CWA agrees. "The American public better understands what abortion has done to women and our country" by destroying innocent lives, she said.

The March for Life, sponsored by the March for Life Education and Defense Fund, is held annually in Washington, on or near the anniversary of the Roe v. Wade ruling. March leaders have estimated the number of protest marchers each of the past two years at 100,000.

DOJ_NMG_0010072

As usual, this year's event begins with a noon rally. But unlike the past, it will not be held on the Ellipse near the White House. The staging area "will be on the Mall at Seventh Street," march organizer Nellie Gray said. After the rally, the crowd will march along Constitution Avenue, passing Congress and ending at the Supreme Court on First Street Northeast.

Pro-life advocates make it clear they are optimistic the Supreme Court will be more favorable to abortion restrictions, with the addition of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and this week's expected confirmation of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr.

Judge Alito said he would have "an open mind" about any challenge to Roe v. Wade, while previous nominees such as Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer have declared Roe fundamental law.

Vicki Saporta, president of the National Abortion Federation, said that Judge Alito "has not been confirmed yet" and that advocates for abortion rights are "still trying to defeat his nomination."

She said she isn't afraid of the abortion bans some states are eyeing. "I think any such law would be declared unconstitutional," she said.

Pro-life and pro-choice advocates alike saw victory in a unanimous opinion the Supreme Court rendered Wednesday, when it said lower courts erred by ruling a New Hampshire law requiring parental notification for minors seeking abortions was unconstitutional.

"The justices respected the law of the state and the right of parents to know if their minor daughter will have an abortion," said Carrie Gordon Earll, senior analyst for bioethics with Focus on the Family, a pro-life group based in Colorado Springs.

On the other side, Ms. Saporta said she is encouraged that the Supreme Court asked lower courts to examine the potential for parental notification waivers in cases where a girl's health is at risk in an emergency. At this time, waivers are permitted if a pregnant teenager's life is at risk but not for health emergencies that are not life-threatening.

It's still uncertain whether the Ohio and Indiana bills to ban abortions in those states will advance. Jon A. Husted, Ohio's Republican House Speaker, said Wednesday he plans no more hearings on the measure.

Indiana Gov. Mitch Daniels, a Republican who opposes abortion, told the Associated Press on Wednesday he thinks the proposed abortion ban in that state has a "very limited prospect of ultimate success" until Americans become less divided on abortion.

In a report last week, the group NARAL Pro-Choice America gave 19 states a failing grade in reproductive rights. Ohio, Indiana and South Dakota made the list, as did Virginia, Alabama, Arkansas, Idaho, Kentucky, Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Texas, Utah and Wisconsin.

If You Choose Not To Decide, You Still Have Made A Choice (WSJ)

By James Taranto

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2006

The astonishing thing about Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's opinion in Ayotte v. Planned Parenthood -- last week's case involving New Hampshire's Parental Notification Prior to Abortion Act -- is that it was for a unanimous court. This is the first time in the 33-year history of Supreme Court abortion jurisprudence that the court has decided a case by a 9-0 vote. That unanimity is the key to understanding Ayotte's significance, which is political more than legal.

The court vacated a ruling of the First U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that had overturned the statute on the ground that in some cases it imposed an "undue burden" on a girl seeking an abortion, which is unconstitutional under the 1992 Planned Parenthood v. Casey precedent. The justices sent the case back to the lower court with the instruction that it issue "either an injunction prohibiting [only] unconstitutional applications or a holding that consistency with legislative intent requires in validating the statute in toto." Whatever the First Circuit does, it is likely to be appealed, so the case stands a good chance of ending up before the high court again.

If the court does rule on the statute again, it is sure to be divided. In the Casey case, Justice John Paul Stevens disagreed with the majority's rationale for upholding a parental consent statute. Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer have indicated that their approach to the question is similar to Justice Stevens's. On the other side, Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas argued in Casey that there is no constitutional protection for abortion.

Under normal circumstances, all these justices probably would have filed or joined separate concurring or dissenting opinions in Ayotte expressing or reiterating their views. Instead, they silently joined Justice O'Connor's decision, which they were able to do because she stipulated at the outset that "we do not revisit our abortion precedents today." The justices agreed to disagree, and found common ground by reaching the narrowest possible conclusion. They also did it very quickly, deciding the case just seven weeks after it was argued, and in time to dispose of it -- at least for now -- before Samuel Alito takes his seat.

Why would the court do this? Probably for institutional reasons -- to insulate itself from politics. The court currently is in flux: It has a new chief justice; it is about to get a new associate justice; and another vacancy or two -- with the attendant political battle -- is a distinct possibility in the next few years. For the court's sake, it is better to leave any consideration or reconsideration of the constitutionality of abortion for a time of greater stability in the court's personnel.

Consider what might have happened if the initial vote on whether to uphold the New Hampshire law was 5-4, with Justice O'Connor in the majority (on either side). If the court had dealt with the case at its usual pace, it would not have been decided before Judge Alito's confirmation, which means the case would be reheard, and Justice Alito would cast the deciding vote.

That in itself is unproblematic, but in the normal course of things, Justices Scalia and Thomas would write separate opinions, either concurrences or dissents, restating their view that Roe v. Wade should be overturned. Suppose further that Justice Alito and Chief Justice John Roberts agreed with Justices Scalia and Thomas. Then there would be four justices on record for overturning Roe.

This would drastically raise the stakes if Justice Stevens or Justice Ginsburg were to retire. There has never been a Supreme Court vacancy at a time when the court was split 4-4 between justices on record supporting Roe and those favoring its invalidation -- though there was reason to suspect the court was evenly divided in 1987, when President Reagan unsuccessfully nominated Robert Bork. Justice Scalia had not yet taken a position, but his views were easy to guess. Justice O'Connor, although she had refrained from either endorsing or opposing Roe explicitly, had voted with dissenters William Rehnquist and Byron White in cases involving abortion regulation and thus was easily mistaken for a Roe foe. Considering the ugliness of the Bork battle and the bitterness that lingers nearly two decades later, the court did itself and the country a service by avoiding this divisive matter for now.

In addition, if one assumes that both Chief Justice Roberts and Judge Alito are inclined to overturn Roe, there are good strategic reasons why both anti- and pro-Roe justices would not want them to say so immediately. The anti-Roe side does not have enough votes to prevail, even with the new justices; whereas the pro-Roe side may hold out hope of persuading one or both of them, which would be much harder to do once they have gone on the record. Only Chief Justice Warren Burger has ever switched sides on Roe after publicly taking a position, and he retired less than two weeks later.

Ayotte is reminiscent of Bush v. Palm Beach County Canvassing Board, the first 2000 election case, in which the justices unanimously vacated a ruling of the Florida Supreme Court that was designed to manufacture votes for Al Gore, and instructed the state court to find an equitable solution to the election dispute. Everyone remembers what happened eight days later, when a sharply divided Supreme Court, in Bush v. Gore, effectively decided the election in George W. Bush's favor. The court paid an institutional price for doing so. But in Bush v. Palm Beach, the justices were united in an attempt to avoid this eventuality by giving Florida's high court a chance to resolve the matter.

Unlike in the election cases, the Supreme Court is not racing the clock to resolve the abortion question. Most likely, sometime in the next decade the court will either overturn or reaffirm Roe. If President Bush gets to replace another pro-Roe justice or two, or a Republican is elected president in 2008, Roe will probably be history. Otherwise, it will be with us for another generation. In either case, politics will determine the outcome of what should have been a political matter all along, but the political battles over the next court appointees may be less bloody than if Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito took a position now.

As a matter of law, Ayotte itself is no more than a historical footnote. But if it helps to bring about a civilized resolution of an issue that has roiled American politics for decades, it will deserve to be remembered as a great act of judicial statesmanship.

Where The Real Action Is... (TIME)

By karen tumulty

Time, January 23, 2006

Not since the doomed Robert Bork has there been a Supreme Court nominee with such a clear record of opposition to abortion. And yet, as Samuel Alito moves closer to Senate confirmation this week, the rumble that many expected over his position on the issue has failed to materialize. That in itself tells us something about the nature of the abortion wars today.

Listening just to the alarms of abortion-rights groups on the one hand and the cheers of opponents on the other, you could come away with the impression that the fate of Alito's nomination will determine whether abortion remains available in this country. That is not what is at stake. Alito's confirmation would not produce the votes sufficient to overturn the Supreme Court's landmark Roe v. Wade decision guaranteeing abortion rights throughout the country. And even if Roe is reversed in the future, states will be free to preserve abortion rights, and many almost surely will. Today the tussle is over not whether abortion will exist but how. In that respect, the terms of the debate have caught up with the public's attitude toward the issue: polls consistently show that most people in the U.S. want abortion to be legal; they just don't want it to be easy.

That sentiment has been expressed in a variety of measures passed by legislatures since a 1989 Supreme Court ruling gave states more leeway to restrict abortion. It's a reality the Supreme Court reaffirmed just last week. In a narrowly written but unanimous decision authored by Sandra Day O'Connor, the high court backed away from directly interfering with a New Hampshire law. The Justices said a lower court should not have struck down a parental-notification requirement entirely, and ordered the judges to come up with a more limited version that would protect the health of girls seeking abortions in emergency situations.

On the eve of the 33rd anniversary of Roe v. Wade, TIME took a look at the situation in the state of Missouri, where the 1989 case originated, to explore how the shifting battlefield affects the making of abortion law and to examine the impact of state restrictions on women who find themselves unhappily pregnant.

Consider, for example, the case of a 22-year-old unmarried woman we will call Lisa, who missed her period last November. Lisa, who was managing a restaurant, decided to have an abortion. Her timing could have been better. Just the month before, Springfield's only abortion provider, which had been operating five days a week just 15 minutes from her home, closed its doors. "The environment here in Missouri is so hostile," its administrator told the local paper. With four abortion doctors left in the state, compared with 10 as recently as 1996, Lisa's closest alternative turned out to be the Planned Parenthood clinic in St. Louis, an eight-hour round trip by car. That meant Lisa, who has no car, not only had to ask a friend to drive her but also had to come up with an excuse for missing two days of work, because she was afraid to tell her boss the truth. Two weeks later, she had to make the trip again, for a follow-up exam that lasted about five minutes. She figures the whole episode--the clinic's bill, the prescription for the abortion drug mifepristone, gasoline, food and incidentals--cost her a little more than $600. "It was all very frustrating," Lisa told TIME a month after her abortion. "I only recently paid back everyone I borrowed money from."

Increasingly, the question of how difficult it is to get an abortion--and sometimes whether you can get one at all--depends on where you live and how much money you have. Last year state legislatures across the country passed 52 new laws restricting abortion, more than twice as many as in 2004.

Few states were more active than Missouri, where Republicans last year took control of the Governor's mansion and both houses of the legislature for the first time in 84 years and thus strengthened the antiabortion majority in the statehouse in Jefferson City. Governor Matt Blunt even summoned the legislature into special session in September to pass bills that allow civil suits to be brought against anyone who helps a Missouri teen obtain an abortion without a parent's consent and that require doctors who perform abortions to have privileges at a hospital within 30 miles of the clinic. Generally, only local doctors can get those, and abortion providers often do not live close to where they work. That was largely why the Springfield clinic closed. The Missouri legislature is back in session this month, and abortion-rights foes have another list of bills they hope to pass, including one that would protect pharmacists who refuse to fill prescriptions for morning-after pills from lawsuits and employer sanctions, give tax credits to centers that discourage pregnant women from having abortions, and require that pain relief be given to fetuses that are aborted after 20 weeks of pregnancy.

One reason that abortion-rights opponents in Missouri and elsewhere succeed in winning restrictions is that regulations on the procedure generally enjoy broad popular support, even among people who say they want to keep abortion legal. Pollsters say that Americans' views on abortion have shifted relatively little since Roe v. Wade, that they have always been complicated and that sometimes they are even contradictory. In a survey by the Pew Research Center last July, for instance, 65% of those polled said they oppose the idea of overturning Roe v. Wade, but nearly an identical percentage said they would like to see more legal restrictions. Among the most popular: mandatory waiting periods, parental- and spousal-notification requirements and a ban on all late-term abortions.

Americans tend to have little sympathy or support for the reasons most women seek an abortion. In a 2004 study, the Guttmacher Institute--an abortion-rights advocacy group whose data are considered the best on the issue and are cited by both sides in the debate--found that the two most common reasons given by women are that "having a baby would dramatically change my life" and "I can't afford a baby now." Both were mentioned by more than 70% of the 1,160 women surveyed. And yet numerous polls have found that most Americans say they think abortion should be illegal in those circumstances--a position that cannot be reconciled with their expressed support for Roe v. Wade. In a Pew poll last October, a majority of Americans said they supported legal abortion only in the case of rape, when the mother's life or health is endangered or when there is a strong chance of serious birth defect.

No one so far has seriously tried to legislate the reasons a woman can have an abortion, but restrictions have taken many other forms. Do these laws actually bring about a reduction in the number of abortions, a goal that abortion-rights advocates also support? Even before many of the restrictions went into effect, the abortion rate and the overall number of abortions in the U.S. were on the decline. In 2000, the latest year for which Guttmacher has compiled statistics, the abortion rate was 21.3 abortions per 1,000 women ages 15 to 44, which was the lowest since 1974 and down from a peak of 29.3 abortions per 1,000 women in 1980 and 1981. In 2000 a total of 1.31 million pregnancies ended in abortion, down from a high of 1.61 million in 1990. In Missouri the reductions in both figures in recent years have been even sharper.

The reason for the declines is a matter of dispute. Economic growth, better contraception and safe-sex practices probably all contribute to the trend. But a 2004 study by researcher Michael J. New for the conservative Heritage Foundation found that states that have adopted laws regulating abortion experienced a larger decline than those that have not. Reductions are particularly steep, he found, in states that restricted the use of Medicaid funds to pay for poor women's abortions and those that required pre-abortion counseling about fetal development and abortion risks. (Lisa complied with that rule by phone.)

Some of those who deal with women seeking abortions have different theories. "The restrictions may stop some, but we think things like the 24-hour waiting period and the reduction of the numbers of clinics do not reduce abortions. They increase later abortion," says St. Louis--region Planned Parenthood CEO Paula Gianino, who has been at the organization for 15 years. While Missouri keeps no statistics that would back up that contention, a 2000 study by Guttmacher conducted in Mississippi found that the percentage of second-trimester abortions increased after the state adopted mandatory counseling and waiting periods in 1992.

Despite that, Gianino says, women overall are having abortions at earlier stages of gestation than ever, largely because better pregnancy tests are on the shelves of every drugstore. And there are alternatives to surgical abortion that weren't around years ago, which give women a greater incentive to make their abortion decision early in their pregnancy. Fully 24% of the St. Louis Planned Parenthood clinic's first-trimester abortions are being done with mifepristone, formerly called RU-486, which was federally approved in 2000 for use in the first 49 days of pregnancy. Two years ago, it was only 18%. And finally, there is an alternative that one side of the debate calls contraception and the other considers abortion: the so-called morning-after pill, which must be taken within 72 hours of intercourse to be effective. The Planned Parenthood affiliate in St. Louis performed about the same number of abortions (approximately 6,300) in 2004 as in 2003. But in the same time period, the number of morning-after kits they dispensed--containing a pregnancy test, four birth-control pills and a booklet advising the user not to take the pills if already pregnant--jumped, to 8,000 from 6,500.

Missouri's new restriction concerning minors is already having an impact. Missouri has become the first state to extend its parental-notification law beyond its state line, a move aimed across the Mississippi River at the Hope Clinic, a low-slung building that sits amid a vast industrial park in Granite City, Ill. A recent morning found a security guard posted out front and a waiting room filled with anxious-looking young women, along with a few boyfriends, husbands and children. Because Illinois has no parental-notification law, Hope Clinic had been the easiest option for Missouri teens seeking to get an abortion without telling their parents. But the new Missouri law that makes it possible to sue anyone who provides an abortion to a Missouri resident under age 18 without written consent of a parent has Hope demanding proof of age of all prospective patients.

Hope counselor Zoila Rendon-Ochoa recently received a call from a St. Louis woman who spoke only Spanish and identified herself as an illegal Mexican immigrant working as a dishwasher in a restaurant kitchen. In her ninth week of pregnancy, she had left Mexico with no birth certificate; she had no driver's license or other identification. "I can't have this baby," she pleaded. Recalls Rendon-Ochoa: "Before the law, we could have given her an abortion. She kept saying to me, 'You can trust me. I'm 24,' but we couldn't prove it. She asked me, 'Where do I go now?' I couldn't tell her. I would guess that she carried the baby to term."

In another case at Hope, a 17-year-old high school student from St. Louis appeared with her boyfriend. She said she did not know where her mother or father was. She was told to get a judge's order that would allow the abortion without parental consent. Another 17-year-old who was turned away said she would return after her birthday in several weeks, thus increasing the risk and expense of the procedure.

Some abortion-rights foes say that if they want to win the political battle in the long run, they will have to prove that there are alternatives to abortion and that they can work. In 1997, for instance, Missouri passed a tax credit for donations to maternity homes. These activists also acknowledge that they bear a special burden to help women trying to raise babies they can't afford. Larry Weber, executive director of the Missouri Catholic Conference, notes that the year after abortion-rights opponents helped rally support in 1993 to make more people eligible for Medicaid, the abortion rate dropped sharply.

It's impossible to say precisely what caused the drop, and the rate was up again slightly two years later. Meanwhile, those on the other side say that reducing the number of abortions is not the only measure of success. "You have to look at the long-term social effects," says Pamela Sumners, Missouri executive director of NARAL Pro-Choice, the abortion-rights advocacy group. "There's a greater likelihood that teenage mothers in particular and their children will wind up on public assistance, drop out of high school, end up in low-wage jobs--all things that are not good for society."

Both sides might look to college dropout Jessica Schutte, 23, to make their point. When Schutte got pregnant in the fall of 2004, her family members urged her to have an abortion, but she resisted, figuring it wasn't her baby's fault that she hadn't used birth control. Things didn't work out with her boyfriend, so he started making calls to find her a place to live and came upon Our Lady's Inn, a St. Louis maternity home. Schutte was 8 1/2 months along and terrified when she moved in, figuring that she had landed in what amounted to a homeless shelter. But the inn gave her classes in child development and taught her how to feed a baby, when to get him vaccinated, even how to clean a house. It also taught her about safe sex. "I learned how to be a good parent, and I became confident that I could do that," she says.

But she still can't do it alone. Earlier this month, she got a $7-an-hour cashier job at a Family Dollar store; about $30 of her $200-a-week paycheck goes to child care for her son Hayden, 8 months old. She still lives in an apartment subsidized and furnished by Our Lady's Inn. Pointing to her spartan surroundings, she notes, "All the furniture in this apartment is theirs. All of it: the TV, the bed, the couch, the crib, the coffee table, dishes--everything I need."

Schutte talks of paying off her $2,500 student debt, getting state grants to go back to nursing school and eventually moving back to her hometown, Cedar Hill. All those things are going to take more than a few donations from a do-gooder group. But just like Lisa, Jessica Schutte had a choice when it came to having an abortion. And she decided, no matter how hard it gets, she wants to watch that choice grow up.

White House To Push Military On Jesus Prayer (WT)

By Julia Duin

The Washington Times, January 23, 2006

The White House will pressure the Pentagon into being more explicit in saying that military chaplains can pray in the name of Jesus Christ, an evangelical Christian chaplains' group says.

The administration struck a deal on Thursday with Rep. Walter B. Jones, North Carolina Republican, said the Rev. Billy Baugham of the Greenville, S.C.-based International Conference of Evangelical Chaplain Endorsers.

DOJ_NMG_0010077

Since October, Mr. Jones has arranged for letters from 74 members of Congress demanding an executive order to end reported religious discrimination against evangelical Christian chaplains.

Claude Allen, White House domestic policy adviser, promised the congressman that President Bush will take up the issue personally with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, said Mr. Baugham, who was involved in the discussion.

"He asked Jones if he'd be satisfied with less than an executive order, and Jones said 'yes,' " he said.

Mr. Jones' office, which confirmed that the conversation had taken place, says chaplains should be able to pray to whomever "their faith tradition" demands, including named gods, saints or prophets.

Although no branch of the U.S. military explicitly forbids sectarian prayer, some say overtly evangelical Christian chaplains are whisked out of official ceremonies if they insist on praying in Jesus' name.

Army Chaplain Capt. Jonathan Stertzbach, now serving as a field artillery chaplain with the Army's 10th Mountain Division in Iraq, says the rules on the ground are less tolerant than military officials admit.

"When we were at chaplain school," he said in a phone interview from Camp Liberty near Baghdad, "there was a Muslim chaplain candidate. When he prayed in the name of 'Allah, the most blessed and beautiful,' he was talked to the next day.

"So he switched to 'the most generous and eternal God.' You need to allow people to pray according to their faith group. Many faith groups do not pray in general and generic terms ... For Christian groups, the name of Jesus is from where all the power comes."

Four weeks ago at a funeral for a slain sergeant, a brigade chaplain asked Capt. Stertzbach to "modify" his prayers to begin with, "Please pray according to your faith as I pray according to mine," and to end with "in Thy name we pray." He then could add, "and in Jesus' name I pray."

In Iraq, "it seems like there is an unwritten expectation. We don't know what's going on. We are asking for answers and not getting them," he said.

"When we come to a monthly division training meeting, we are told we cannot do this, and if you do this, you will be punished," the captain said.

Martha Rudd, an Army spokeswoman, said sectarian prayer has not been an issue among its 2,700 chaplains.

"Chaplains are advised to consider their audience when they're speaking publicly and be considerate of a plurality of views in the audience," she said. "But we don't tell them how they can and cannot pray."

But the military does, Capt. Stertzbach said, citing a speech last May in Fort Drum, N.Y., by Army Lt. Col. Phillip Wright, chief of about 40 division chaplains.

Lt. Col. Wright, he said, expressed sympathy for chaplains wanting to pray in the name of Jesus, but urged his listeners to not insist on it, "or we are going to lose our ability to pray at all. If anyone does this without my knowledge, I will crunch you."

When contacted at Fort Drum, Lt. Col. Wright denied that he had said those words.

"I've never told chaplains they cannot pray in Jesus' name," he said. "Sometimes I've told them it's not a correct time to espouse their theology to everyone, [but] there is no regulation that says you cannot pray in Jesus' name."

ANTITRUST:

Albertson's Deal May Be Set Monday (WSJ)

By Janet Adamy And Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2006

A consortium of retailers and financial buyers could announce a deal to acquire Albertson's Inc. for roughly $9.6 billion as early as today, say people familiar with the matter, offering an end to a tumultuous sale process.

The Albertson's board was expected to meet last night to approve the deal, people familiar with the process said. As happened in December, it is possible the deal could collapse at the final moment.

The deal could give grocery-store chain Supervalu Inc., which would acquire most of Albertson's stores, a challenge in freshening up hundreds of supermarkets. Meanwhile, drugstore operator CVS Corp., which would acquire Albertson's free-standing pharmacies, would pull closer to rival Walgreen Co., the nation's largest drugstore chain by revenue.

Final terms weren't known last night, but they are expected to roughly mirror the ones that the board turned down in December. One significant exception: Albertson's buyers would assume any antitrust risk involving Chicago-area stores, a sticking point that helped unwind a previous deal, said the people familiar with the matter.

Under the previous deal, CVS was going to buy Albertson's pharmacy business for as much as $4 billion. A group led by private-equity firm Cerberus Capital Management LP and Kimco Realty Corp. was going to acquire poorly performing Albertson's stores for the value of their real estate in areas including Dallas, Florida, Northern California and the Rocky Mountains. That group also includes Schottenstein Realty Co. of Miami, Lubert-Adler Partners of Philadelphia and Klaff Realty LP of Chicago.

Supervalu was going to swap stock and cash for hundreds of Albertson's better-performing stores, including stores operating under the names Shaw's Supermarkets, Jewel-Osco, Acme, Star Market and Bristol Farms and a few hundred more Albertsons-flagged stores in Southern California and throughout the West.

The buyout consortium is planning to pay about $26 per Albertson's share, said the people familiar with the matter. Based on the terms for the December deal, that would entail offering 0.182 of a share of Supervalu stock plus $20.25 in cash, or $26.05 in total, based on Friday's closing price.

Albertson's shares closed up 24 cents at $24.11, rising 1%, in 4 p.m. composite trading Friday on the New York Stock Exchange. Supervalu on Friday fell 34 cents, or 1%, to $31.85 on the NYSE.

A spokeswoman for Supervalu declined to comment. Representatives from Albertson's and CVS didn't return calls seeking comment.

The same buyer group was on the brink of closing a deal with Albertson's days before Christmas. But at the last minute, Albertson's board rejected the deal in part because the grocers couldn't agree who should shoulder the responsibility if antitrust regulators raised flags in markets where both companies operate grocery stores, particularly the Chicago area.

In addition to frustrating investors, who had bid up the shares in anticipation of a deal, the collapse embarrassed CVS, which prematurely sent analysts an email promising to brief them on the deal only to have it fall through.

Supervalu will have to revive Albertson's stores in the face of growing competition from Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and other discounters. The company is buying Albertson's most successful divisions, which control large pieces of the grocery business in their respective regions.

But even those stores suffer from years of poor and inconsistent strategies -- from piecemeal price lowering to adding cost-saving but unfriendly self-checkout lanes -- that made it harder to fend off new competition.

A deal would expand the presence of Supervalu, of Eden Prairie, Minn., on the East Coast and make it a much larger national grocery player. Supervalu has become one of the most successful grocery chains in the country by operating and licensing small, cheap food stores under the Save-A-Lot name that cater to low- and middle-income households.

If a deal is completed, Supervalu would have to orchestrate larger-scale changes while navigating the grocery industry's growing woes, including contracts that make labor costs higher than those of new competitors and changes in consumers' shopping patterns. It would also raise the profile of Jeff Noddle, the Supervalu chief executive who joined the company three decades ago as a retail-operations director.

For CVS, of Woonsocket, R.I., the deal would broaden its presence on the West Coast, particularly in California. One challenge would be extracting the free-standing drugstores from the Albertson's umbrella. Albertson's co-brands its stand-alone pharmacies with its stores in many markets, a strategy that has contributed to success of those pharmacies, Albertson's officials have said.

For Albertson's, a sale would relieve shareholders and help redeem Chief Executive Larry Johnston. The Boise, Idaho, chain, which operates about 2,500 stores across the country, said in September it was putting itself up for sale after years of losing sales to new discount competitors and the small but lucrative batch of upscale stores like Whole Foods Market Inc.

In the late 1990s, as grocery stores bulked up to compete against Wal-Mart, Albertson's spent billions of dollars to buy rivals with the hope it could cut costs and broaden sales.

But the deals left Albertson's bloated and without any clear advantages over traditional grocery competitors, which were aggressively lowering their prices, adding more natural food and putting a more distinct stamp on the shopping experience. Albertson's hired Mr. Johnston, a former General Electric Co. executive, at the beginning of the decade but he failed to turn around the company. Investors have been growing impatient with him and their frustrations reached a boiling point after the deal collapsed last month.

For the fiscal third quarter ended Nov. 3, Albertson's posted net income of $77 million, or 21 cents a share, compared with net of $110 million, or 29 cents a share, in the year-ago period. Sales were roughly flat at $9.95 billion.

Albertsons Nears Deal, Yet Again, To Sell Itself (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

After rejecting a nearly identical deal at the 11th hour last month, Albertsons, the giant supermarket chain, was close to a reaching a new pact last night to sell itself to a group of companies and investment firms for about $9.7 billion in cash and stock, people involved in the talks said.

The sale, which the company is hoping to announce today, would be to a consortium that includes the CVS drugstore chain; Supervalu supermarkets; Cerberus Capital Management, an investment fund; and Kimco Realty, a real estate investment company.

Albertsons, which owns the supermarket brands American Stores, Shaws, Jewel-Osco, Acme Markets, Sav-on and Osco Drug, decided to reconsider a sale after the investment group approached the company last week with a slightly improved offer. The biggest difference between the scuttled deal and the new one is that the buying group has agreed to assume any risk that the deal will run afoul of antitrust regulators, virtually guaranteeing that the transaction will be completed.

While people involved in the negotiations were hopeful that this deal would be completed, they also cautioned that it remained possible that the talks could drag on or collapse altogether again if an unforeseen issue arises the way it did in December.

Since that deal fell apart, the board of Albertsons has been under increased scrutiny from analysts and investors who have questioned why the December deal was abandoned at the last minute. Albertsons shares fell more than 10 percent after the company announced it had terminated talks.

At the time, analysts were critical of the company. Stephen Chick, an analyst at J. P. Morgan, lamented in a note to investors that the sales process had been "bungled." Robert Summers, an analyst at Bear Stearns, said: "We find it unlikely that another bidder emerges for a more attractive offer."

There were angry calls from some shareholders for the resignation of Albertsons' chief executive, Larry R. Johnston, a former General Electric executive who was brought in to revive the business. The company's independent directors issued a statement pledging their support for him.

In the latest deal, the buying group plans to break Albertsons into three parts by splitting the supermarket business in two and merging the drugstore business with CVS. Supervalu supermarkets is expected to acquire Albertsons' most attractive stores, like its Jewel stores in the Chicago area. Cerberus Capital and Kimco Realty plan to buy its underperforming businesses and either sell them and their real estate or try to institute a turnaround plan, depending on the store.

The group is expected to pay slightly more than $26 a share in cash and stock, people involved in the talks said. CVS, Cerberus Capital and Kimco Realty are planning to contribute slightly more than $20 in cash, while Supervalu is expected to pay the rest in its stock.

Shares of Albertsons closed on Friday at $24.11, up 24 cents, or 1 percent, on speculation that a deal could be reached.

The possible sale of Albertsons, based in Boise, Idaho, comes as traditional grocers are being squeezed by larger discount competitors like Costco and Wal-Mart Stores, which now has more than 1,000 supermarkets within its stores around the country. Wal-Mart had grocery sales of $109 billion in 2004, according to Retail Forward, a research firm in Columbus, Ohio. That was nearly double the revenue of Kroger, the next closest competitor among the traditional supermarket chains, which had $56 billion in sales in 2004.

On the other end of the spectrum, Albertsons is also being squeezed by upscale rivals like Whole Foods and Trader Joe's.

Over the last five years, sales at Kroger, Albertsons and Safeway, the country's three largest supermarket chains, have stagnated and profits have been weak. Albertsons has 2,500 stores in 37 states.

Toshiba Wins $5bn Westinghouse Deal (FT)

By Rebecca Bream and Carola Hoyos

Financial Times, January 23, 2006

Toshiba, the Japanese engineering company, has won the battle for control of Westinghouse, the US power plant arm of British Nuclear Fuels, with a bid of almost $5bn, more than double original expectations.

Toshiba was competing against General Electric of the US and Mitsubishi Heavy Industries of Japan, and in recent weeks the bidding had grown increasingly fierce. GE formed a partnership with Hitachi of Japan, and Mitsubishi started working with the Washington Group of the US, in efforts to clinch the deal.

But late on Saturday night Mike Parker and Gordon Campbell, chief executive and chairman of UK government-owned BNFL, decided to sell Westinghouse to Toshiba. The group's bid of close to $5bn was not only the highest offer but BNFL decided it would also be the best for Westinghouse's future growth prospects and its workers, said a person close to BNFL.

BNFL said on Sunday that its directors would make a final decision at a board meeting on Thursday.

Toshiba is said to have promised to invite a US partner to take a minority stake in Westinghouse, which designs nuclear power plants and manufactures reactors.

Shaw, the Louisiana-based engineering group whose bid for Westinghouse was rejected this month, is believed to be considering taking a small stake in the business.

There has been some US political opposition to a non-US group gaining control of Pittsburgh-based Westinghouse. Last month Ralph Hall, Republican chairman of the House of Representatives' energy subcommittee, wrote to the US Treasury arguing that Westinghouse's "sensitive technology" should not be controlled by a foreign company.

Westinghouse was originally expected to attract bids in the region of $2bn when it was put up for sale by BNFL in July.

A person close to the deal said the amount raised is likely to bolster Mr Parker and Mr Campbell's decision to press ahead with the sale in the face of criticism from some UK politicians and trade unions, who thought the government should retain ownership of Westinghouse.

GE and Mitsubishi were initially seen as the frontrunners in the battle for Westinghouse.

A person close to the deal said Toshiba was favoured because BNFL believed it was most likely to allow senior Westinghouse management to run the business on its own with minimal interference from its new corporate parent.

GE was seen as having a more aggressive corporate culture than Toshiba, which could have harmed Westinghouse's chance of winning a Chinese nuclear reactor contract, it said.

With nuclear assets in the US, GE could have faced antitrust difficulties.

Toshiba May Buy Westinghouse For $5 Billion (New York Times)

By Jad Mouawad And Andrew Ross Sorkin

New York Times, January 23, 2006

After weeks of a fierce bidding war, the Toshiba Corporation of Japan is near a deal to buy Westinghouse Electric, a builder of nuclear power plants, for about $5 billion, a person involved in the talks said yesterday.

Toshiba beat competing bids from General Electric, Hitachi and Mitsubishi Heavy Industries, and it is in exclusive talks with Westinghouse, this person said. Westinghouse, based in Monroeville, Pa., is controlled by British Nuclear Fuels, which in turn is controlled by the British government.

Mitsubishi made an offer of more than $2.5 billion for Westinghouse last summer, and The Wall Street Journal reported last week that G.E. and Hitachi had teamed up to make a $3.5 billion bid. But Toshiba made a last-minute, higher offer, the person said.

Nuclear energy is gaining support with governments around the world amid high oil and natural gas prices, tight petroleum supplies and growing demand for electricity. Technology by Westinghouse is found in half the world's operating commercial nuclear power plants, according to the company's Web site. The company has 8,500 employees.

Since the 1979 Three Mile Island accident, no new nuclear power-plants have been built in the United States. Opponents of nuclear power say the 1986 explosion of the Chernobyl power plant in Ukraine and the problems associated with the disposal of waste fuel illustrate the dangers of nuclear energy for the environment. But elsewhere, nuclear energy never lost the favor of governments who view it as a reliable source of energy.

Even in the United States, the appeal of nuclear power has risen as prices for natural gas and coal, which power most of America's power plants, have risen in recent months.

Energy companies are seeking licenses around the country to build new power plants, notably in Alabama and Mississippi. The Bush administration, which is also encouraging the development of nuclear energy as a way to reduce dependence on foreign energy sources, is seeking to streamline the application process and permits needed to build new plants.

British Nuclear bought Westinghouse's nuclear business from the CBS Corporation for $1.1 billion in 1999, ridding the company of its last industrial vestige. The sale completed the transformation of what was once called the Westinghouse Electric Corporation into a media conglomerate.

The sale of Westinghouse to a Japanese company may raise security concerns at a time when Iran is seeking to develop a nuclear program of its own.

Worldwide, there are 443 nuclear plants used for electricity generation in 31 countries, according to the Nuclear Energy Institute. Of these, 103 are in the United States, where they account for about a fifth of power production. Twenty-four new nuclear plants are under construction in 10 countries.

United States Ranks 28th On Environment, A New Study Says (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 - A pilot nation-by-nation study of environmental performance shows that just six nations - led by New Zealand, followed by five from Northern Europe - have achieved 85 percent or better success in meeting a set of critical environmental goals ranging from clean drinking water and low ozone levels to sustainable fisheries and low greenhouse gas emissions.

The study, jointly produced by Yale and Columbia Universities, ranked the United States 28th over all, behind most of Western Europe, Japan, Taiwan, Malaysia, Costa Rica and Chile, but ahead of Russia and South Korea.

The bottom half of the rankings is largely filled with the countries of Africa and Central and South Asia. Pakistan and India both rank among the 20 lowest-scoring countries, with overall success rates of 41.1 percent and 47.7 percent, respectively.

The pilot study, called the 2006 Environmental Performance Index, has been reviewed by specialists both in the United States and internationally.

Using a new variant of the methodology the two universities have applied in their Environmental Sustainability Index, produced in four previous years, the study was intended to focus more attention on how various governments have played the environmental hands they have been dealt, said Daniel C. Esty, the director of the Yale Center for Environmental Law and Policy and an author of the report.

The earlier sustainability measurements "tell you something about long-term trajectories," Mr. Esty said. "We think this tool has a much greater application in the policy context."

For instance, Britain ranked 65th in last year's sustainability index, but 5th in the latest study, among the 133 nations measured. Among the reasons for the earlier low ranking, Mr. Esty said, was that "they cut down almost all their trees 500 years ago and before," something that modern British governments could not control.

The 16 indicators used in the latest study, the report says, provide "a powerful tool for evaluating environmental investments and improving policy results."

The report will be issued during the World Economic Forum, an annual conclave of business and political leaders which meets in Davos, Switzerland, this week. Mr. Esty said the report was also intended as a tool to help monitor progress on the environmental issues included among the Millennium Development goals adopted by 189 nations at the United Nations Millennium Summit.

"It's like holding up a mirror and having someone help you see what you couldn't see before," he said. But the report acknowledges "serious data gaps" that resulted in leaving more than 65 countries out of the rankings. In addition, some thorny methodological issues, like how to measure land degradation or loss of wetlands, have no widely accepted solutions, the report noted, and the authors used the best measures they had available.

Like the sustainability index produced last year, the pilot study ranks countries within their geographic peer groups, so that nations in arid regions or tropical ones can be measured against one another. So Belgium's overall ranking of 39, with a 75.9 percent score, can be viewed by region and by issue. Belgium ranks last, for instance, among European countries in protection of its water resources.

Air quality rankings tend to favor less industrialized nations like Uganda, Gabon, Ecuador and Sri Lanka. Among the countries of the Americas, the United States ranks in the bottom third on this scale.

In the Americas, the United States is at the bottom of the scale measuring agricultural, forest and fisheries management, in part because the study is weighted against countries with a high level of crop subsidies. The study's authors say that such subsidies "in agriculture, fisheries and energy sectors have been shown to have negative impacts on resource use and management practices."

In the area of environmental health, the study measured such factors as sanitation, lead exposure and indoor air pollution, a particular concern in the least developed countries, where indoor home fires may be common. In those measures, the richest countries, including the United States, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Japan, France, Britain, Ireland and the countries of Northern and Central Europe score near 100 percent.

On the same scale, the poorest countries fared worst, with 32 of 37 sub-Saharan African nations, along with Bangladesh, Haiti, Yemen, Tajikistan, Laos, Cambodia and Papua New Guinea, scoring at or below 40 percent. Chad and Niger rank last in the world, with scores of 0 percent and 1 percent, respectively.

"In the zone we capture as the field of play, they're at the very bottom," Mr. Esty said. "It doesn't mean that nobody there has a toilet. It means a very, very small percent do."

The energy sustainability portion of the index factors national wealth into measurements of energy efficiency and greenhouse-gas emissions. Nonetheless, all but three of the top 25 spots in the worldwide rankings are occupied by countries in economic distress, including Uganda, Chad and Myanmar. Switzerland, Costa Rica and Peru are the exceptions.

The study's definition of renewable energy resources does not include nuclear power - in part, Mr. Esty said, because countries with a high proportion of nuclear-fueled energy, like Japan, the Czech Republic and France, reaped the benefits of their energy choices by earning high rankings on the study's other scales, like the air quality index measuring particulate matter.

To create another scale that disproportionately favored nuclear-energy users would have undermined the overall reliability of the study, he said. As a result, the renewable-energy rankings tilt heavily toward countries reliant on hydropower, like tiny Bhutan.

The study shows that annual carbon dioxide emissions, measured as metric tons per $1 million of gross domestic product, average about 363 tons. North Korea, Turkmenistan, Ukraine, Uzbekistan and Mongolia rank at the bottom of the scale, with amounts ranging from Mongolia's 1,992 tons to North Korea's 4,859 tons.

Carbon dioxide emissions from nations with rapid economic expansion, like China and India, are more than double the world average (731 tons and 621 tons, respectively). The United States, at 171 tons per $1 million of gross domestic product, ranks well behind some other nations in the Group of 8, the major industrial powers - France (56), Japan (57), Germany (80) and Britain (118) - but close to Canada (168), ahead of Australia (209) and far ahead of Russia (914).

Senate Entwined In Debate Over Fishing Quotas (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 22, 2006

A Senate spat over relaxed fishing quotas could snag the renewal of the 1976 Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act.

DOJ_NMG_0010083

Reauthorization of Senate Bill 2012, which governs offshore ocean fisheries, is expected by late spring, but differences remain over whether it should permit relaxed enforcement of annual catch limits for each fishery or impose strict limits.

"Aside from the issue of catch limits, [the bill] is pretty non-controversial," said Lee Crockett, executive director of the Marine Fish Conservation Network, a coalition of 175 organizations that includes a mix of commercial and recreational fishermen as well as environmentalists.

The version of the bill approved by the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee on Dec. 15 had an amendment to soften annual fishing quotas, as a result of pressure by New England fishermen and the members of Congress who represent them.

It was the collapse of that region's cod stock in the late 1980s and early 1990s that led to the realization that fish stock is finite, environmentalists say. According to the National Marine Fisheries Service, nearly half of the major fish stocks found in the ocean off New England were overfished last year.

As originally drafted, the bill called for fishery management councils, where annual catch limits were exceeded, to have their quotas reduced by that amount the following year.

But since New England fishermen "routinely exceed their quotas," sometimes by as much as 200 percent yearly, Mr. Crockett said, the industry there is seeking "indirect management tools" other than lowering the quota to reduce the following year's catch.

Congressional observers say it is ironic that the difference of opinion regarding catch limits has made Massachusetts Democrats such as Sens. Edward M. Kennedy and John Kerry and Rep. Barney Frank, normally viewed as environmental champions, to favor looser controls on fishing.

Meanwhile, Sen. Ted Stevens, Alaska Republican and Commerce Committee chairman, who favors oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, is seen as a lawmaker dedicated to conservation of declining fish stocks and protection of their habitats with the bill.

"Senator Stevens has said the reauthorization of the Magnuson-Stevens Act will be one of his legacies. He blocked any attempts to get it reauthorized until he became chairman of the Commerce Committee," said Phil Kline, senior fisheries policy adviser for Oceana, an oceans advocacy nonprofit group.

"We know Senator Stevens wants the bill moved out of the Senate by the end of May," said Mr. Kline, who previously worked as a West Coast fisherman for three decades.

He noted that Mr. Stevens was responsible for an important modification made to the Magnuson-Stevens Act when it was last reauthorized in 1996. At that time, its "focus was changed from fishing and exploitation to conservation," Mr. Kline said.

He considers the bill a "good solid starting point" for reducing excessive fishing and protecting fish environments. "It's not perfect, but it's a great start in improving our oceans," he said.

An Answer To Waste Worries? (WP)

By Dan Morse

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

Why burn chicken manure? For starters, consider how effectively chickens produce it.

On the Delmarva Peninsula -- a chicken-growing mecca that includes Delaware and the Eastern Shores of Maryland and Virginia -- 571 million birds create enough manure annually to fill a line of backyard swimming pools stretching from Washington to Philadelphia.

But disposal options are limited. The leading method, spreading on farms, works well as a fertilizer until too much is applied. Then chemicals can seep into streams and end up in the Chesapeake Bay. A newer option turns manure into dried, little pellets of fertilizer that can be transported out of state and sold to farmers and golf courses. But that product has drawn fewer buyers than hoped.

Which brings us to chicken producer Allen Family Foods Inc. The company last week presented plans to the Dorchester County Council to burn chicken manure in Linkwood on Maryland's Eastern Shore. The resulting steam would help run an Allen

Family Foods factory that processes leftover chicken parts such as heads, feet and feathers, turning them into ingredients for animal feed.

Allen Family Foods said it has sorted through the technical barriers that sunk its previous manure-burning plans. The proposed furnace would burn about 1 1/2 tractor-trailer loads of manure a day.

That would be only about 2 percent of Delmarva's annual manure load. But backers see the project as one potential answer to the chicken industry's huge waste disposal needs because if burning proves safe, the technology could expand and consume more manure.

In Britain, three giant poultry-manure burners are producing electricity. In Minnesota, a facility using technology similar to the British plants is going up that is designed to burn 100 tractor-trailer loads of turkey waste a day.

In Maryland, some leading conservationists back the project. If more manure is burned, they say, less will end up on farms and potentially in runoff.

"Conceptually, we think it's a great idea," said Beth McGee, a senior water quality scientist for the Chesapeake Bay Foundation. "There's a lot of reasons to like these projects."

Development is one of those reasons. If it sounds as though the Eastern Shore is overrun with manure, it isn't. The smells aren't everywhere and can be fleeting. Subdivisions are popping up and taking up farmland, Allen Family Foods said. And state planners predict that the Eastern Shore's population will begin to increase at a faster rate than many of Maryland's counties closer to Washington and Baltimore.

"If we don't find alternative uses [for manure], it's going to be hard to keep growing chickens," Mike Pilcher, Allen Family Foods vice president of operations, said of an industry valued at $1.7 billion in the Delmarva Peninsula.

Chicken executives have been talking up manure burning for more than two decades. But it is technologically challenging, and no one has made it work commercially in the United States, according to industry executives and engineers.

Nor is it assured that Allen Family Foods will get regulatory approval. The Maryland Department of the Environment plans to question Allen Family Foods about odors and emissions. Allen said it won't start construction until it gets an operating permit from the department.

At least a few residents in Dorchester County have vowed to fight the project. "If it's never been done in the United States, why should we be the guinea pigs?" resident Jim Dolan said.

The idea of burning chicken manure goes back to at least 1983, when the Delmarva Power company experimented with the fuel at a power plant in Delaware, Delmarva Power spokesman Matt Likovich said. The utility later studied retrofitting another plant, in Maryland, estimating it would cost $50 million. Neither project got off the ground.

Burning chicken manure isn't easy. Unlike lumps of coal, manure is an inconsistent fuel because of where it comes from.

Birds grow up inside large chicken houses. In Delmarva, the houses typically are slightly longer than football fields and hold about 25,000 birds that live atop beds of sawdust or wood shavings. The bedding can get wet from roof or pipe leaks, among other things.

When the birds are hauled off to slaughterhouses, workers drive tractors into the houses to clean them out. During full cleans, the bedding is generally nine parts manure and one part wood product, and is called "chicken litter."

The litter's varying moisture content can become a problem when burning.

Under many burner designs, chicken litter is fed into the furnace on conveyor grates. The drier sections tend to burn first while wetter sections can pass through uncombusted.

There have been other attempts to burn chicken waste in Maryland. In 1999, a quasi-government group called Maryland Environmental Service fed cubed chicken litter into a furnace burner that produced electricity and thermal power for a state prison complex in Somerset County. But as the manure burned inside the combustor, the resulting ash gummed up air-supply holes. "It was a difficult fuel to work with," said James Allen, operations manager of the complex's power plant.

In light of such failures, Delmarva poultry giant Perdue Farms passed on burning several years ago. Its solution: Spend $12 million to build a plant to dry chicken litter, convert it into pellets and sell it as fertilizer. The company had hoped it would consume about 80,000 tons of chicken litter a year this way. The product is well-liked by golf course managers and farmers. But it's not as rich in nutrients as other commercial fertilizer. Over the next year, Perdue expects to use about 65,000 tons of chicken litter in making the fertilizer. The company said it might burn in the future.

Others say burning is the way to go.

For years, the company Fibrowatt, which is building the Minnesota turkey excrement unit, has eyed Maryland's chicken manure. Several years ago, Fibrowatt asked Maryland officials for tax credits to help it build a litter-to-energy plant. That effort drew concern at Perdue Farms, where officials argued that such measures could unfairly favor one company and questioned whether there would be enough manure to supply all the proposed projects. Countered Carl Strickler, chief operating officer of Fibrowatt: "There's definitely enough for everybody."

Allen Family Foods has gone down the manure-furnace path before. Several years ago, it partnered with an engineering firm in Michigan to build one in Hurlock in Dorchester County. But that project ran aground after technical design and cost problems.

The proposed unit under review isn't as complicated. It is designed to overcome the difficulties of burning higher-moisture litter by directing hot air at it.

Neither Allen Family Foods nor the engineers would disclose costs. But such a burner package would generally cost more than $1 million, experts say.

When Allen Family Foods presented its plans in Dorchester County last week, they received a skeptical but somewhat welcome reception. County resident Glen Payne told the council that he was worried about odors and emissions. He said he'd been to Britain and scoped out a facility. "People in that plant wore masks," he said.

But Dave Mooney, one of the Georgia engineers hired by Allen Family Foods, said his design mimics elements employed in Britain for odor control. The manure would be stored in a room with negative air pressure. Inside it would stink. Outside, it wouldn't, he said.

Council President Glenn L. Bramble, a lifelong county resident, called the venture a good idea as long as it met environmental requirements.

He didn't anticipate a significant increase in truck traffic. And he said the common practice of spreading chicken manure on farms hasn't always been ideal.

"I know it's part of the process," he told the Allen Family Foods executives. "But when they spread that on the field, for about two or three days, it's bad. It's no question about that. But I live with that; I don't complain. But, I mean, I have to put the windows up."

As Profits Soar, Companies Pay U.S. Less For Gas Rights (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 - At a time when energy prices and industry profits are soaring, the federal government collected little more money last year than it did five years ago from the companies that extracted more than $60 billion in oil and gas from publicly owned lands and coastal waters.

If royalty payments in fiscal 2005 for natural gas had risen in step with market prices, the government would have received about $700 million more than it actually did, a three-month investigation by The New York Times has found.

But an often byzantine set of federal regulations, largely shaped and fiercely defended by the energy industry itself, allowed companies producing natural gas to provide the Interior Department with much lower sale prices - the crucial determinant for calculating government royalties - than they reported to their shareholders.

As a result, the nation's taxpayers, collectively, the biggest owner of American oil and gas reserves, have missed much of the recent energy bonanza.

The disparities in gas prices parallel those uncovered just five years ago in a wave of scandals involving royalty payments for oil. From 1998 to 2001, a dozen major companies, while admitting no wrongdoing, paid a total of $438 million to settle charges that they had fraudulently understated their sale prices for oil.

DOJ_NMG_0010086

Since then, the government has tightened its rules for oil payments. But with natural gas, the Bush administration recently loosened the rules and eased its audits intended to uncover cheating.

Industry executives deny any wrongdoing, arguing that the disparities stem primarily from different rules for calculating the sale prices for paying royalties and the sale prices for informing shareholders.

"The price of gas downstream is always going to be higher because you have costs that have to be recouped for getting it to the customer," said Robert H. Davis, a spokesman for Exxon Mobil. "You have to process the gas. You have to transport it, and you have to sell it. There will always be a discrepancy there."

Companies that pump oil and gas on federal property are required to pay the government royalties, usually 12 percent to 16 percent of the value of what they sell.

Royalties for natural gas have climbed sharply in the last three years. But while prices nearly doubled from 2001 to 2005, the $5.15 billion in gas royalties for 2005 was less than the $5.35 billion in 2001. When oil and gas are combined, royalties were about $8 billion in 2005, almost the same as in 2001.

Because much of the information about specific transactions is kept secret, it remains unclear to what extent, if at all, the weakness in royalty payments stems from deliberate cheating or from issues with the rules themselves.

But one major producer, Burlington Resources, admitted to shareholders last year that it might have underpaid about $76 million in gas royalties in the 1990's. And in Alabama, a jury ruled in 2003 that Exxon had cheated on $63.6 million worth of royalties from gas wells in state-owned waters. The jury awarded $11.9 billion in punitive damages, which a judge later reduced to $3.5 billion. Exxon disputes the charges and is appealing the verdict.

The possible losses to taxpayers in gas could be even higher than the losses tied to the scandals over oil royalties. For one thing, natural gas production on federal land is worth twice as much as oil.

Moreover, the Interior Department has scaled back on full audits, pushed out a couple of its more aggressive auditors and been criticized by its own inspector general for the audits that it did pursue.

"We are talking about the same issues and in many cases the same players as before," said Danielle Brian, executive director of the Project on Government Oversight, a nonprofit watchdog group that exposed many of the oil royalty scandals.

"These companies had knowingly been cheating on oil for years, if not decades," Ms. Brian continued. "To ignore the likelihood that the same thing is happening on the gas side is absurd."

Johnnie M. Burton, director of the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service, said the disparities were mostly the result of deductions that the regulations let companies take, reducing the sale prices they report to the government.

But Ms. Burton said she had not known and could not explain why companies were reporting higher sale prices to their shareholders and to the Securities and Exchange Commission than to her office.

"I can't answer because I don't know," she said in an interview. "We don't look at S.E.C. filings. We don't have enough staff to do all of that. If we were to do that, then we would have to have more staff and more budget. You know, there is such a thing as budget constraint, and it's been real tough, let me tell you." The contrasts between what companies are telling the government and what they are telling shareholders is stark.

The Interior Department, using the numbers given by companies paying royalties, said the average sale price of natural gas on federal leases was $5.62 per thousand cubic feet in fiscal 2005, which ended Sept. 30.

By contrast, Exxon told shareholders that it received about $6.88 per thousand cubic feet in the nine months that ended Sept. 30. Chevron said its average price in that period was $6.49. Kerr-McGee, which suffered huge losses from hedging against a drop in prices, nonetheless said it still received an average price of $6.59.

"There's no reason why what the companies report to their shareholders should be higher than what they report" to the Minerals Management Service, said Lee Helfrich, a lawyer who has represented California in many battles with the industry over royalties. "The ultimate goals or mission of the S.E.C. and the M.M.S. are different, but the information reported to each should be the same."

In the scandals over oil royalties in the 1990's, government investigators, aided by industry whistle-blowers and investigation by the Project on Government Oversight, found that companies were using a host of tricks to understate their sale prices.

These included buy-sell agreements in which producers swapped oil with each other at artificially low prices and then resold it at higher prices. Companies also sold oil at below-market prices to their own affiliates, classified high-priced "sweet" oil as much cheaper "sour" oil and padded their deductions for transportation costs.

In the wake of the scandals, the outgoing Clinton administration pushed through tough new rules for valuing crude oil, which relied on comparing company reports with an index of spot market prices.

A Pro-Industry Approach

But the Bush administration did not close any loopholes for valuing natural gas. Indeed, in March 2005 it expanded the list of deductions and decided against valuing sales at spot-market prices when companies were selling to their own affiliates.

The industry-friendly stance was intentional. Mr. Bush and top White House officials also placed a top priority on promoting domestic energy production. Vice President Dick Cheney's energy task force called for giving lucrative new incentives to companies that drill in the Gulf of Mexico and other high-risk areas.

The Bush administration also took a much more relaxed approach to auditing and fraud prevention. In 2003, the Interior Department's inspector general declared that the auditing process was "ineffective" and "lacked accountability" and that many of the auditors were unqualified.

In one instance, inspectors discovered that auditors had lost the working papers for an important audit and tried to cover up their blunder by creating and back-dating false documents. Rather than punish anybody, the inspector general recounted, the minerals service gave the employee who produced the new documents a financial bonus for "creativity."

Administration officials said last week that they had addressed most of the criticisms and that the inspector general had since said its corrective actions were "sufficient."

The Interior Department also fired two of its most aggressive and successful auditors. One of them was Bobby L. Maxwell, a veteran auditor who had recovered hundreds of millions of dollars in underpayments over a 22-year career and received an award for meritorious service in 2003 from Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton.

Mr. Maxwell was fired in early 2005 after clashing with superiors over his belief that Kerr-McGee had shortchanged the government $12 million. Mr. Maxwell charged that he had been wrongfully fired, and the government paid him an undisclosed amount of money to settle out of court.

Mr. Maxwell is now pursuing Kerr-McGee, which has denied any guilt, with his own lawsuit under the False Claims Act, which allows private citizens who prove fraud to collect some of the money they help recover.

Patrick Etchart, a spokesman for the Minerals Management Service in Denver, said that Mr. Maxwell lost his job because of a reorganization and that he had declined an offer to move to a different city.

But lawmakers who wrestled with the government over previous royalty scandals are dubious.

"It's all gotten worse, not better," said Representative Carolyn B. Maloney, Democrat of New York, who led Congressional investigations into cheating on oil royalties in the 1990's. "They make the process so complicated that no one can really follow the money."

Ending Detailed Inspections

Perhaps the most striking example of sluggish auditing is the government's effort to collect back royalties from companies that blatantly ignored one of the government's basic rules.

Under current rules aimed at promoting energy production in deep waters, companies can produce large volumes of oil and gas without paying royalties at all. But the rules also require companies to start paying royalties if market prices climb above certain "threshold" levels.

As it happens, market prices have been above those levels since the 2003 fiscal year. But even though dozens of companies never bothered to start paying, Ms. Burton said earlier this month that the government had yet to demand repayment three months into the 2006 fiscal year.

"It's more complicated than you might think," said Lucy Querques Dennett , associate director of the Minerals Management Service in charge of the issue.

But enforcing the rules about price thresholds is easy compared with verifying the actual sale value of natural gas.

DOJ_NMG_0010088

Over the last four years, the Bush administration has ordered its auditors to move away from detailed inspections in favor of a more cursory approach of looking for anomalies in company reports. If a company in Louisiana, say, reported prices that differed from those of other companies in the same region, it would attract closer scrutiny.

Mr. Etchart, the agency's spokesman, said that the number of full-scale audits had declined slightly over the past few years and that the budget for compliance had fallen.

But he said the government still took a "close look" at 71 percent of oil and gas production. "Our strategy would obviously be to focus on anomalies," he said, "but it is also to focus on large producing areas."

The agency's strategy has drawn protests, however, from many states, which are entitled to a share of federal royalties, and from some of the Interior Department's most aggressive auditors.

One of those auditors was Kevin Gambrell, director of the Federal Indian Minerals Office in Farmington, N.M. Mr. Gambrell fought with his superiors over many issues, one of which was their demand that he do fewer audits and simply monitor posted prices of companies in the same area.

"Where the M.M.S. approach falls short is that there are so many different types of deductions you can take in getting gas and oil to the market, and there are so many premiums and bonuses in the contracts," Mr. Gambrell said in a recent interview. "You have to take a detailed look at the contracts to know what's going on."

The Interior Department forced Mr. Gambrell out in 2003, charging that he had improperly destroyed office documents. Mr. Gambrell sued for wrongful termination, arguing that he had discarded only copies of documents. He also presented evidence that his office had recovered eight times as much money as offices that used the administration's preferred approach.

The government settled his case in 2004 by clearing him of any wrongdoing and paying him an undisclosed amount of money.

For practical purposes, the biggest cost to taxpayers may have less to do with cheating and fraud than with the government's inscrutable rules.

Consider the case of Burlington Resources, a Houston-based producer that ConocoPhillips acquired in December for $35.6 billion. Burlington paid $8.5 million in 2001 to settle charges of cheating related to its oil royalties. Last March, Burlington disclosed that it might also have underpaid gas royalties by about $76 million during the 1990's. It set aside $81 million to cover possible litigation costs.

Unlike others, Burlington executives provided information to The Times on the royalties it paid for natural gas and on the sale prices that it has reported to the Interior Department since 2002.

During those four years, Burlington said it paid $627 million in gas royalties and that its annual payment shot up from $89 million in 2002 to $233 million in 2005.

That surge in royalties does track closely with the rise in market prices. But Burlington's numbers also highlight the essential issue raised by many critics: the rules let companies understate the value of their gas sales by taking scores of deductions.

Those deductions include the cost of transportation, processing, brokerage fees, pipeline reservation fees and even certain "theoretical losses" for companies that own their own pipelines.

In 2001, Burlington reported an average price of $1.98 per thousand cubic feet to the government but an average sale price of $3.20 to its shareholders. In 2005, the company reported an average sale price of $5.75 to the government and $6.46 to shareholders.

Keeping Royalties Secret

James Bartlett, a spokesman for Burlington, said part of the discrepancy resulted from the fact that much of Burlington's production is in the Rocky Mountains, where natural gas fetches lower prices.

The federal government does not require companies to divulge the amount of royalties they pay or what they tell the government about sale prices. And unlike Burlington Resources, Exxon and most other major oil companies refused to disclose the information when asked.

"It's not required information," said Mr. Davis of Exxon, echoing responses from Chevron, Royal Dutch/Shell and other big producers. "We're not going to publish it."

Oceans In Peril (WP)

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

THE BUSH administration remains in denial about climate change and sometimes treats environmental protection as an inconvenience. Yet there was reason to hope, when the U.S. Commission on Ocean Policy issued its report more than a year ago, that President Bush would seize the issue of the dire threat to this country's coastal waters. The commission was the second major task force in recent years to detail the rapidly deteriorating ecology of America's oceans. All serious looks at the issue have reached similar conclusions: that current human use of oceans is unsustainable and that without dramatic changes in the ways the waters are exploited and enjoyed, the seas will die out. The magnitude of the crisis offers an opportunity for the president to lead on a preeminent environmental issue.

So far, it is an opportunity Mr. Bush has largely passed up. To be sure, there have been some constructive changes. Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) is pushing legislation to improve fisheries management. Regional fisheries managers have acted to protect deep sea corals. And, explains James L. Connaughton, chairman of the White House Council on Environmental Policy, the president has moved to improve coordination on ocean-related policy by the many agencies of government that have jurisdiction over aspects of the problem, a key commission concern. The administration is developing a long-term research plan and is planning to protect a large area around some Hawaiian islands as a marine sanctuary. All of this is promising -- though a big test will come when the administration has to propose funding for oceans research in its coming budget.

Still, there is little sense of urgency about a problem the oceans commission described in stark terms: Americans, the report warns, are "starting to love our oceans to death." If that is to be averted, "reform needs to start now, while it is still possible to reverse distressing declines." Mr. Connaughton says Mr. Bush is deeply committed to the problem. Yet the president himself does not talk about it.

Tackling this meaningfully is going to require regulatory initiatives across a range of areas: pollution, runoff, development, environmentally harmful farming practices and others, requiring substantial sums. None of this is possible without sustained and vocal presidential leadership. Ecosystems are at a tipping point, verging on a collapse from which they won't recover. The stakes are as immense as the oceans, which will not wait for the White House to gear up to save them.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Potent Mexican Meth Floods In As States Curb Domestic Variety (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

DES MOINES, Jan. 18 - In the seven months since Iowa passed a law restricting the sale of cold medicines used to make methamphetamine, seizures of homemade methamphetamine laboratories have dropped to just 20 a month from 120. People once terrified about the neighbor's house blowing up now walk up to the state's drug policy director, Marvin Van Haaften, at his local Wal-Mart to thank him for making them safer.

But Mr. Van Haaften, like officials in other states with similar restrictions, is now worried about a new problem: the drop in home-cooked methamphetamine has been met by a new flood of crystal methamphetamine coming largely from Mexico.

Sometimes called ice, crystal methamphetamine is far purer, and therefore even more highly addictive, than powdered home-cooked methamphetamine, a change that health officials say has led to greater risk of overdose. And because crystal methamphetamine costs more, the police say thefts are increasing, as people who once cooked at home now have to buy it.

The University of Iowa Burn Center, which in 2004 spent $2.8 million treating people whose skin had been scorched off by the toxic chemicals used to make methamphetamine at home, says it now sees hardly any cases of that sort. Drug treatment centers, on the other hand, say they are treating just as many or more methamphetamine addicts.

And although child welfare officials say they are removing fewer children from homes where parents are cooking the drug, the number of children being removed from homes where parents are using it has more than made up the difference.

"It's killing us, this Mexican ice," said Mr. Van Haaften, a former sheriff. "I'm not sure we can control it as well as we can the meth labs in your community."

The influx of the more potent drug shows the fierce hold of methamphetamine, which has devastated many towns once far removed from violent crime or drugs. As Congress prepares to restrict the sale of pseudoephedrine, the cold medicine ingredient that is used to make methamphetamine, officials here and in other states that have recently imposed similar restrictions caution that they fall far short of a solution.

"You can't legislate away demand," said Betty Oldenkamp, secretary of human services in South Dakota, where the governor this month proposed tightening a law that last year restricted customers to two packs of pseudoephedrine per store. "The law enforcement aspects are tremendously important, but we also have to do something to address the demand."

Here, officials boast that their law restricting pseudoephedrine, which took effect in May, has been faster than any other state's in reducing methamphetamine laboratories. Still, when Mr. Van Haaften, director of the Governor's Office of Drug Control Policy, surveyed the local police, 74 percent said that the law had not changed demand, and 61 percent said supply had remained steady or increased.

In a survey of treatment professionals, 92 percent said they had seen as many or more methamphetamine addicts; the state treated 6,000 in 2005 and expects to treat more than 7,000 this year, based on current trends. Some health officials said abuse among women, typically the biggest users of methamphetamine, was rising particularly fast.

While seizures of powdered methamphetamine declined to 4,572 in 2005 from 6,488 in 2001, seizures of crystal methamphetamine increased, to 2,025 from one.

Federal drug agents tend to describe ice as methamphetamine that is at least 90 percent pure. Officials here say much of their crystal methamphetamine is less pure - "dirty ice," they call it. But either is far more potent than homemade powdered methamphetamine; a "good cook" yields a drug that is about 42 percent pure, but around 25 percent is more common. And in the first four months after the law took effect here, average purity went to 80 percent from 47 percent.

Other states have seen the same.

"The Mexican drug cartels were right there to feed that demand," said Tom Cunningham, the drug task force coordinator for the district attorneys council for Oklahoma, the first state to put pseudoephedrine behind pharmacy counters, in 2004. "They have always supplied marijuana, cocaine, and heroin. When we took away the local meth lab, they simply added methamphetamine to the truck."

A methamphetamine cook could make an ounce for $50 on a stovetop or in a lab in a car; that same amount now costs $800 to $1,500 on the street, the police say.

"Our burglaries have just skyrocketed," said Jerry Furness, who represents Buchanan County, 150 miles northeast of Des Moines, on the Iowa drug task force. "The state asks how the decrease in meth labs has reduced danger to citizens, and it has, as far as potential explosions. But we've had a lot of burglaries where the occupants are home at the time, and that's probably more of a risk. So it's kind of evening out."

When the state surveyed the children in state protection in southeastern Iowa four months after the law took effect, it found that 49 percent were taken from parents who had been using methamphetamine, the same percentage as two years earlier, even as police said they were removing fewer children from homes with laboratories.

Some law enforcement officials say that addicts may find the crystal form more desirable. "If they don't have to mess with precursor chemicals, it's actually a bit easier on them, and safer," said Kevin Glaser, a drug task force supervisor for the state highway patrol in Missouri, which last year led the nation in methamphetamine lab seizures.

But the switch has also increased the risks. "People are overdosing; they're not expecting it to do this much," said Darcy Jensen, director of Prairie View Prevention Services in South Dakota. "They don't realize that that fourth of a gram they're used to using is double or triple in potency."

Federal officials say there are 1.4 million methamphetamine addicts in the United States, concentrated in the West, where the drug began to take hold in the late 1980's, and the Midwest and South, where it moved in the mid- and late 1990's.

Drug enforcement officials have always said that 80 percent of the nation's supply comes from so-called super labs, those able to make 10 pounds or more. But in some counties here, officials say that all the methamphetamine came from mom-and-pop labs that made the drug by cooking pseudoephedrine with toxic farm and household chemicals.

Law enforcement focused on the laboratories because they were so destructive: the police found children who had drunk lye thinking it was water, or went without food as parents went through the long binge-and-sleep cycles of using. Laboratories in homes, motels, abandoned farm buildings or cars frequently exploded, or dumped their toxic chemicals into drains or soil. Small police departments spent much of their time attending to contaminated sites.

More than 30 states have restricted pseudoephedrine in some way. Nine have put it behind pharmacy counters, and Oregon now requires a prescription to obtain it.

Addicts and cookers have proved to be skilled at getting around the restrictions; as one state imposes a law, bordering states see an increase in laboratories. Oklahoma recently linked its pharmacies by a computer database to track sales after discovering that cooks were going county-to-county buying from several pharmacies a day.

Iowa's law passed unanimously. As in other states, officials say the number of laboratories had already begun to decline, most likely because cooks feared they would be caught because there was so much public attention on the problem.

The law resulted in a decline of at least 80 percent. Police found 138 laboratories from June to December, down from 673 for the same period the year before. The state had hit a high of 1,500 lab busts in 2004, but with the law, had 731 for 2005, and expects just 257 this year. Law enforcement says the costs of policing and cleaning up labs will drop to $528,000 next year from $2.6 million in 2004.

But here and in many of the states with recent pseudoephedrine restrictions, frustration with the stubborn rate of addiction has moved the discussion from enforcement to treatment and demand reduction.

That discussion, officials say, will be much tougher.

After listening to Mr. Van Haaften's report on the effects of the law this week, State Representative Clel Baudler, a former state trooper who now heads the public safety committee for the Iowa General Assembly, charged his committee to come back to the next meeting with strategies to reduce demand.

"My fear is, when I ask what they think we should do, they'll say 'I don't know,' " Mr. Baudler said in an interview afterward. "We've increased penalties, we've increased prison time, we're still not getting in front of it."

Officials say they never advertised the law as one that would reduce methamphetamine addiction. Still, they are surprised at how the drug has hung on.

"Things that are highly destructive, including diseases, tend to be self-limiting," said Arthur Schut, president of the Mid-Eastern Council on Chemical Abuse in Iowa City, and a member of the state's drug policy advisory council. "This has been devastating. It's remarkable how quickly people are damaged by it."

Mr. Van Haaften, too, knows that it was too much to hope that the law would reduce demand. Still, he says, "I had a little hope."

"I knew of the addictive nature, but in my heart, I believed people didn't want to deal with dealers," he said. "They have guns, it's dangerous, if you make your own it's safer. I hoped for a dip, but the availability did not allow that to happen."

Investigator: News Of Raid Was Leaked To Drug Suspects (MADCOUR)

By Donovan Estridge, Courier Staff Writer

Madison (IN) Courier, January 23, 2006

INDIANAPOLIS — More light is being shed on the Drug Enforcement Administration drug raid last week in the Courierarea.

Aaron Payne, a special deputy for the DEA, testified at a detention hearing Friday in Indianapolis.

Payne was one of the lead investigators for the government during the yearlong investigation that lead to the arrests of 14 Courierarea residents on federal charges. Results of the investigation uncovered a Mexico-to-Chicago cocaine trafficking ring that then came through Madison. The indictment indicates that both John Scruggs and Randy Thomas were the ringleaders of the organization. They acquired cocaine from their sources in Chicago and then distributed it to 12 mid-level dealers in the Courierarea, according to the federal indictment

During the investigation, Payne obtained court-ordered wiretaps on four telephone lines. The wiretaps began in November to accompany aerial surveillance already under way in the investigation.

"We had four target phones during the course of our investigation," Payne said.

The first two phones were cellular phones belonging to Audra Gray. According to the U.S. Attorney's office, Gray was Thomas' girlfriend and acted as the "bookkeeper" for the organization. She would call various mid-level dealers to set up cocaine transactions.

According to Payne's testimony, the third and fourth phones belonged to Scruggs. The wiretaps allowed the DEA to document different cocaine transactions that would later be used in the indictment.

"During one of the conversations we heard Gray say there was a 'Mexican standoff' between the conspirators," Payne said.

During the investigation, a date was set with the DEA and local authorities to take down the operation. Payne testified that Jan. 12 was chosen as the day the warrants would be served.

Testimony at the hearing Friday indicated that the night before the scheduled drug sweep, authorities overheard a phone conversation between Joseph Griffin and Thomas. Payne testified that Griffin somehow received information that a major police operation was about to take place. Upon receiving the tip, Griffin contacted leaders inside the conspiracy, Payne testified.

"Griffin called Thomas as said, 'There are cops at the armory. They have a list of names. Get out," Payne testified.

Payne also testified that the phone conversation ended with Thomas saying he would contact Scruggs and inform him of the news. Thomas and Scruggs later called their mid-level dealers to tell them.

The next day when authorities began their sweep across the area, they did not find Thomas and Scruggs at their residence. They did find several individuals with large amounts of money.

Authorities reported a conversation between Estes and Thomas after the leak.

"They (police) have a list of names. We need to get the (expletive) out of here," Payne testified that Estes said in a phone conversation.

Despite the leak, authorities apprehend all of the individuals in the Madison area suspected to be involved in the trafficking.

U.S. Assistant Attorney Josh Minkler said the source of the leak is under investigation.

Pain Doctor Loses License, But Gets No Jail Time (ROT)

By Lindsey Nair

Roanoke (VA) Times, January 21, 2006

ABINGDON -- Roanoke pain doctor Cecil Knox was stripped of his right to practice medicine and sentenced to five years of probation Friday, marking the end of what has been called both a legitimate prosecution and an unnecessary persecution.

The conclusion came as a relief to many in the packed federal courtroom, but outside, both camps still expressed regrets -- that loved ones who died were not around to see the day, and that chronic pain patients no longer have a physician they can trust.

"The ordeal is finally behind me," Knox said, "but it is not finished for the patients."

John Brownlee, U.S. Attorney for the Western District of Virginia, said he believes Knox knows "in his heart of hearts" what he did.

"I think the community is safer today now that Dr. Knox is not a doctor," Brownlee said.

Knox was first indicted in February 2002, along with his practice, his former office manager, Beverly Boone, and two employees. His charges included prescribing controlled substances such as the painkiller OxyContin outside the scope of legitimate medical practice, and the government said Knox's irresponsible behavior led to injury or death to patients.

At one point, he faced more than 300 charges.

Knox's October 2003 trial ended with not guilty verdicts on about half the charges. The jury was hung on the rest. Boone was acquitted.

A few months later, Knox and Boone were indicted a second time, but Knox's battle with non-Hodgkin's lymphoma delayed the trial.

DOJ_NMG_0010093

Knox's illness eventually went into remission, but before the second trial, he decided to plead guilty to felony racketeering, two counts of felony marijuana distribution and misdemeanor health care fraud.

Charges against Boone and the other employees, with the exception of Tiffany Durham, who pleaded guilty, eventually were dropped. Durham has not yet been sentenced.

A disagreement between the prosecution and defense created some anxiety as Friday's sentencing kicked off. Knox believed his plea agreement did not include the possibility of jail time, while the government thought he could potentially receive up to 12 months in jail.

U.S. District Judge James Jones ruled quickly on the disagreement, saying he favored the government's position.

Arguing for jail time, prosecutor Tom Bondurant said the doctor was essentially a drug dealer, and drug dealers usually face incarceration. He also pointed out that Knox's deceased patients were not there to testify for themselves.

But defense attorneys John Lichtenstein and Tony Anderson said Knox was a more caring doctor than many, adding that a jury chose not to find him guilty after the first trial. Because Knox faces a life-threatening disease, they said, probation would be the best option for him.

Before Jones pronounced sentencing, Knox addressed the court.

"I would like the opportunity to speak to you from my heart," he said, telling Jones that he's had a hard time understanding the charges against him. "If ever there were errors made, they were made with the intentions of trying to ease my patients' suffering and prolong their lives."

Jones said he had no doubt that neither side would be completely satisfied with his decision. But he stressed that the government succeeded in removing Knox from medical practice while Knox, in turn, avoided jail time.

As part of the plea agreement, Knox voluntarily surrendered his medical license to the state of Virginia and his registration number for prescribing medicine to the Drug Enforcement Administration.

In a letter to Jones, William Harp, executive director for the Virginia Board of Medicine, wrote: "In my opinion, the citizens of Virginia are well-served by the removal from practice of a physician who has engaged in the illegal distribution of controlled substances as well as billing fraud."

But Harp said Thursday that a physician convicted of a felony who has his license mandatorily suspended can reapply for the license as early as the next meeting of the board. And Laura DiCesare with the DEA said a doctor in that situation can also reapply for his registration number.

Knox, who is now working as a cobbler at Shafer's Shoe Repair in Roanoke, said it was too early to comment on that issue.

"I think that his goal all along has been at some point, when he gets his health concerns under control, to return to the practice of medicine," Anderson said.

Tammy Walton, who attended the sentencing, blames Knox for her late brother's poor quality of life in his final years. She said Knox got off too lightly but was gratified that he lost his medical license.

"When you realize what he gave up, I think that is what is so important," she said. "And really, he gave it up for his freedom."

Faron Kidd, whose brother, Monte Kidd, died four years ago, agreed that Knox's sentence was not strict enough. Monte Kidd was Knox's patient.

"Dr. Knox has had four more years than my brother did," he said.

But others who attended the hearing crowded around Knox afterward, hugging him and shaking his hand.

Tom Ballard and Rick Dudding credit Knox with saving them from debilitating pain. Dudding says it was Knox who helped him to walk again.

"They say he hurt people. He didn't hurt people; he's got a heart bigger than this world," Dudding said.

Many former patients said they cannot find a good pain specialist now that Knox has been prosecuted.

"Nobody wants to handle chronic pain because of this," Ballard said.

It's because of that, Knox said, that he does not feel completely vindicated.

"When I see all patients able to exercise their right to appropriate pain management," he said, "I will feel like this has been a small step toward that victory."

Lawsuit In 2003 Shooting By DEA Settled For $200,000 (SAEN)

By Guillermo Contreras, Express-News Staff Writer

San Antonio (TX) Express-News, January 23, 2006

On Jan. 3, relatives of Ashley Villarreal, many of them in tears, gathered at San Fernando Cemetery No. 2. They shared cake, released balloons and observed what would have been her 17th birthday.

The ceremony was half a celebration and half a call for justice over the controversial shooting by federal agents that put her in her grave when she was 14.

But four days before the civil case was to head to trial, U.S. District Judge Fred Biery ruled Thursday that the government would be allowed to put on evidence that could have hurt the plaintiffs' case.

Hours later, the wrongful-death suit was settled for $200,000 — far less than the $35 million listed in the plaintiffs' original demand letters to the government.

Under the settlement, released Friday, the government denied any liability in the shooting that occurred during a stakeout for Ashley's father.

Ashley Villarreal

The government argued that the agents fired at a Mitsubishi Eclipse driven by Ashley the night of Feb. 9, 2003, because they feared the car was going to hit one of them.

"This tragedy weighs heavily on all of those involved: the family, the special agents involved and the entire community," said Joe Arabit, head of the Drug Enforcement Administration in San Antonio. "The DEA is hopeful that the community can now move forward beyond this incident."

The plaintiffs included Ashley's mother, Ashley's paternal grandmother, and Daniel Robles, a man who was in the car when Ashley was shot. They were advised by their lawyers not to comment.

The League of United Latin American Citizens said the settlement means the DEA's policies, such as its policy on deadly force, will not be scrutinized in a trial to determine if they were adequate.

DEA's policy on deadly force says agents may use such force when they have a reasonable belief that they are in imminent danger of death or serious injury. The policy allows verbal commands if feasible, and only if they do not increase danger to the agent or others.

It also allows an agent to fire at the driver or other occupants of a moving vehicle only if the agent, a fellow agent, "or another" is in imminent danger of death or serious physical injury and the use of such force outweighs the risks to the safety of the agent or "other persons." Weapons may not be fired solely to disable moving vehicles, the policy states.

Ashley was shot after the Eclipse she was driving left her paternal grandmother's house in the 800 block of South San Joaquin and was surrounded by undercover DEA vehicles at nearby Motes Street.

DEA agents had been staking out the home for Ashley's father, Joey Villarreal, whom the agents linked to a cocaine distribution ring. The agents sought Villarreal because they had received information that he was preparing to flee to Mexico to avoid being arrested.

According to investigative reports, agents who had been watching the San Joaquin house thought Robles, who got in the car with Ashley, was Joey Villarreal, but were unsure because it was dark.

The agents contend they fired into the darkened Eclipse after the car hit at least two undercover vehicles and then appeared to try to run down agents.

The agents also said they had on vests identifying them as police, and that they ordered the car's occupants to show their hands before they were forced to fire. Ashley's family disputes the government's version.

The Bexar County district attorney's office said in March 2004 that it wouldn't prosecute any of the agents because federal law generally shields agents from prosecution by local authorities.

State prosecutors also said they couldn't prove the agents did not shoot in self-defense.

At Thursday's hearing, Biery granted the government's request to exclude from the trial plaintiff evidence he deemed prejudicial. Among it was an autopsy photo of Ashley's shaved head that showed where she had been struck by a bullet.

DOJ_NMG_0010095

The judge said he didn't want to retry Joey Villarreal, but said he would allow the government to use some evidence from the criminal case that connected him to drug trafficking, and items the government planned to use to show Ashley had been driving without a license since she was 12. The plaintiffs contended the evidence was prejudicial or irrelevant.

Over objections by the plaintiffs, the judge allowed the government to use several pieces of evidence, such as pictures of guns, body armor, surveillance equipment law officers seized in probes connected to the Joey Villarreal case — including some taken from the property on San Joaquin.

Biery also said jurors would hear details of "a family situation that's not the best in the world" and arguments that agents "acted too quickly."

"We also have a 14-year-old gorgeous little girl who didn't get to choose any circumstances into which she was born," Biery said.

Eight hours later, the plaintiffs and their relatives tearfully signed the settlement after their lawyers told them of the waning chances of their case. Ashley's father, summoned to San Antonio for the trial, will soon head back to Beaumont to continue to serve the 19 years in federal prison he got for a drug-trafficking conspiracy.

Medical Pot Advocate Loses Bid To Bar Deportation From Canada (LAT)

By Eric Bailey, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2006

SACRAMENTO — A judge in Canada on Friday rejected an eleventh-hour appeal by a California medical marijuana refugee trying to avoid deportation to the United States, five years after fleeing to avoid a short jail stint he called a death sentence.

Steve Kubby, a former Laguna Beach resident who was a 1998 Libertarian candidate for governor and one of the authors of California's watershed medical marijuana law, suffers from a rare form of adrenal cancer that can cause blood-pressure spikes that his doctors say are controlled by smoking cannabis.

Canadian Federal Justice Yvon Pinard ruled that Immigration Canada may now proceed with its order to return Kubby to the U.S. — along with his wife, Michele, and two young children — as soon as next week.

Kubby was sentenced in March 2001 to four months in jail by a Placer County judge for possession of a peyote button and a hallucinogenic mushroom after jurors acquitted him of more serious charges that he was selling pot grown in his basement medical marijuana garden.

The peyote and mushroom were in his possession, Kubby said, for an artist's rendering to be used in a book he wrote on the drug war while living in Olympic Valley, just north of Lake Tahoe.

Amid wrangling with authorities over his sentence, Kubby moved with his family to British Columbia in May 2001.

If jailed and not allowed to use marijuana, Kubby contends, he will die behind bars. Jailhouse use of medical marijuana is not allowed in California, where voters in 1996 approved the nation's first law allowing the use of cannabis as medicine with a doctor's recommendation.

Around the time Kubby moved to Canada, judges in Placer County ordered his original misdemeanor convictions converted to felonies. Kubby, who says he now could face up to three years behind bars, has appealed those rulings, which he calls a miscarriage of justice.

Kubby also worries that prosecutors will attempt to extend his jail stay because he left the country and later was declared a fugitive.

"They don't want to admit it's political," Kubby said of officials in Placer County. "I committed the unpardonable sin of helping pass a medical marijuana law that police and prosecutors hate."

Authorities in Canada "were sold a bill of goods" by counterparts in the U.S., Kubby said, adding, "There's this failure on the part of Canadian officials to accept that there could be this much animosity and determination to harm me on the part of officials in Placer County."

Placer County Dist. Atty. Bradford R. Fenocchio could not be reached for comment.

Michele Kubby, who has been representing her husband in court, expressed hope after Friday's ruling that she could push their case to the Canadian Supreme Court.

DOJ_NMG_0010096

"I've got to do whatever I can to keep Steve away from Placer County," she said. "No one believes that removing his cannabis will kill him. But I'm the one who will be left a widow."

U.S. Agents Catching Cash At Border (DMN)

By David Mclemore, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, January 21, 2006

LAREDO – For Mexican smuggling organizations, the border is a two-way street. Drugs, people and other contraband move north. The money moves south.

In the last three years, customs agents have seized more than $20 million in currency at the eight ports of entry from Brownsville to Del Rio – roughly one-fifth of the value of the bulk cash seizures the agency made nationally.

While U.S. drug agents have long concentrated their efforts on stopping drugs at the border, they're increasingly going after the money, hitting the drug cartels in the pocketbook and providing invaluable intelligence of the trafficking networks. And with stricter controls on bank accounts and wire transfers, trafficking organizations are running piles of cash into Mexico, in cars, trucks, boats, and airplanes and even strapped to the bodies of couriers, federal officials said.

"We're seeing bigger amounts of cash coming across, and we're seeing deeper concealment," said Hector Mancha, assistant port director for security at Laredo. "They don't just throw it in a bag in the trunk of their car anymore."

In just one hit in February, agents at Laredo found $1.2 million in $20s, $50s and $100s stashed in the rear quarter panel of a 2003 Honda Accord.

And Sunday, at the international bridge in Hidalgo 150 miles downriver, three women were charged with bulk currency smuggling when officers found $55,940 in cash hidden in bundles underneath clothing and wrapped in white plastic bags in the back of their 1995 Mercury Villager. They were turned over to Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

"It's never a dull moment on the border," said Mark Pacheco, Customs and Border Protection's assistant port director for tactical operations at Laredo. "There are days it seems almost impossible. But then you find that hidden compartment filled with cash, you get pretty excited. You know that's going to hurt the bad guys."

Crimes of cash

Although it's not a crime to carry any amount of cash across the border, it is a federal offense not to declare any amount over $10,000 or conceal it from agents as you enter or leave the country. If the proceeds are determined to stem from illegal activity, charges of bulk currency smuggling can lead to a prison sentence.

Customs agents, Drug Enforcement Administration agents and the FBI are cracking down on currency smuggling as a way to attack the Mexican trafficking organizations, some of which have roots in Dallas and other Texas cities.

In a Jan. 11 national money laundering threat assessment, officials cited an increase in the movement of bulk cash south across the border. It was the first multi-agency analysis of methods that drug traffickers use to disguise their profits.

DEA Administrator Karen Tandy, during a Senate hearing on narcotics control last March, called tracking the money the key to controlling the $65 billion a year trade in illegal drugs.

"To make a significant impact on the drug trade in America and around the world, there is no strategy more effective than following the money back to the sources of drug supply and taking away the dirty proceeds of that trade," she said. "But our efforts to date clearly have not successfully done the job."

Total seizures – which include all assets and can be in the form of cash, houses, guns and vehicles – amounted to well short of $1 billion, Ms. Tandy said.

"Drug traffickers pay more than that each year in fees to launder their ill-gotten gains," she said. Officials said there is no established formula to determine what percentage of cash gets across the border successfully.

Homeland Security's investigation arm, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, has taken a lead role in the escalating hunt for trafficking organizations' money.

Since it was created in 2003, ICE arrests in financial investigations increased from 1,224 that year to 1,567 in fiscal year 2005. Nationally, ICE agents have seized more than $477 million in trafficking assets over the last three years, with $100 million of that in bulk currency. The seized cash goes into a fund to buy equipment and to be given in grants to local law enforcement, officials said.

In South Texas, ICE investigators participate in multi-agency investigations that target the choke points for the movement of money southward: bus stations, trucking firms and what investigators call the money services businesses – wire transfer offices and "casas de cambio" or currency exchange houses.

"We don't depend on one strategy," said Jerry Robinette, deputy special agent-in-charge of the San Antonio ICE office. "We don't look just at bulk currency but all the ways that money can move into the pipeline south.

The last stop for federal investigators is the border.

In Texas, customs officers have found currency "in car speakers, engine manifolds, boxes of detergent and any number of false compartments in vehicles," said Donna De La Torre, customs director of field operations at Laredo.

"The smugglers are limited only by their creativity on how they will smuggle cash across the border," said Ms. De La Torre. "Often, the way they brought the drugs in are used to carry the cash back."

She said officers at ports of entry go through an eight-day school on how to conduct outbound inspections and act as "human lie detectors."

Still, much of what they do, she said, "stems from years of experience in studying people as they cross the bridge."

Walking cash register

Over the Christmas holidays, when cross-border traffic swells, customs inspectors searched a 51-year-old man as he attempted to walk into Mexico, one of the 12,000 daily pedestrians who cross at Laredo.

Officers found more than $55,000 in cash taped in packets around his body.

U.S. searches of outbound traffic are a fairly new phenomenon along the border. Sporadically, officers will stop southbound drivers to ask if they have cash in excess of $10,000 to declare. Who gets picked for a closer look depends on a number of factors, Officer Pacheco said.

"We look at the drivers, at their demeanor, when we ask them questions about undeclared currency. And we look at the vehicles to see if anything seems out of the ordinary," he said.

It's also a matter of timing.

"We try to be unpredictable," he said. "We want to keep the smugglers off-balance. But they follow us pretty closely."

Customs officers said that spotters for the traffickers keep a close watch on the border crossings. Armed with cellphones or two-way radios, traffickers can signal northbound drug shipments and southbound cash deliveries where and when border enforcement has tightened.

Once picked for secondary inspection, baggage and personal items in the car are removed and searched. Specially trained "currency dogs" are brought in to see if they pick up the scent of cold cash. Officers check door panels, fenders, the trunk, under the hood and under the car. If something triggers a deeper suspicion, they bring out the high-tech gear, such as portable X-ray machines and fiber-optic cameras.

"There is no formula for who smuggles the cash," Officer Pacheco said. "We've caught young men and grandmas and mothers with kids in the car. They drive up in old beat-up trucks and Volvo SUVs. Every case is different."

Most are mules or couriers hired by the traffickers to drive the cash out of the United States. On rare occasions, those carrying hidden cash may be doing so for innocent reasons.

"We'll try to mitigate the cases of people who were just trying to take money home to Mexico," Officer Pacheco said. Those cases may be assessed a fine for failure to declare the money and be sent on their way."

On Thursday, Laredo customs officers found a man attempting to carry $25,000 in U.S. currency into Mexico in a duffel bag in his truck. Although the man initially raised suspicions, officials released him with a $1,000 fine for failure to disclose the cash. It was believed he was carrying the money home to his family.

That, said Officer Pacheco, is an increasingly rare occurrence.

US, Venezuela To Seal Drug Accord (BBC)

By Greg Morsbach, BBC news, Caracas

DOJ_NMG_0010098

BBC, January 23, 2006

Hugo Chavez believed US drugs officials were spying on him Venezuela and the US appear ready to sign a new agreement to fight international drug trafficking.

Last year Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez ordered the US Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) to cease all its operations inside Venezuela.

He dissolved a joint taskforce because he believed DEA officials were spying on his government - a claim the US has always denied.

Much Colombian-produced cocaine is trafficked through Venezuela to the US.

At source

For the past five months all official relations between Venezuelan and US anti-narcotics agents have been frozen.

But after tough negotiations between Venezuelan and US diplomats a new contract is now on the table.

This accord will re-establish a basic working relationship in the fight against drugs.

Luis Correa, the chief of Venezuela's anti-narcotics police unit, says the new agreement with Washington will be signed next week, once all the paperwork has been finalised.

Venezuela will have to hand back US surveillance equipment and computer hardware it confiscated from the US embassy last August, when the joint narcotics programme was suspended.

Although this new deal is one US State Department officials believe they can live with, it will not give the US the same far-reaching powers it used to enjoy as an independent partner.

Some US officials doubt whether a fully fledged joint operation will be set up again.

They believe the US will in future have to rely more heavily on intercepting drug traffickers at the source in Colombia rather than targeting them in transit through Venezuela, because of the new conditions the Americans will be working under.

IMMIGRATION:

Scholar Released By China Now Facing Deportation By U.S. (AP)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 23, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. -- Nearly five years ago, the U.S. government exerted high-profile diplomatic pressure on China to secure the return of scholar Gao Zhan, a researcher at American University whom Beijing believed was a spy for Taiwan.

Now the Department of Homeland Security is pushing with equal vigor to have her deported back to China, despite objections from the Department of Justice and a federal judge. A hearing is scheduled Monday in immigration court to determine whether Gao poses a risk to national security, as DHS contends.

Gao's case became international news in February 2001 when the American University researcher and her family were arrested by the Chinese on suspicion of espionage. Her husband, Xue Donghua, and the couple's 5-year-old son were released after a month in custody.

But the Communist government charged Gao with espionage.

The State Department protested and worked hard to secure her release. Sen. George Allen, R-Va., was one of many elected officials who took up her cause and introduced legislation, which ultimately failed, to grant her U.S. citizenship in absentia.

The Chinese government put Gao on trial in July 2001, convicted her and sentenced her to prison. But they decided to deport her to the United States rather than imprison her, and Gao received a hero's welcome when she returned to the U.S. a month later.

She spoke out frequently upon her return against human-rights abuses in China. A naturalization ceremony was scheduled for her, but abruptly canceled.

Then in 2003 came shocking news: Gao had pleaded guilty to illegally exporting more than $1 million in military-grade computer microprocessors to a Chinese government agency. Court documents indicate that the scheme had preceded her 2001 arrest and that Gao knew the microprocessors could be used by the Chinese military.

She struck a plea bargain that resulted in a seven-month jail sentence, plus eight months in a halfway house. Her jail time was severely reduced because prosecutors believed Gao had cooperated with their investigation and provided useful information to the United States.

As part of the plea bargain, the Justice Department recommended to the Department of Homeland Security against deporting Gao after she served her sentence.

Normally such recommendations carry great weight, but in this case, DHS and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement are ignoring the recommendation and pushing for deportation.

Monday's hearing will determine whether Gao is a national security risk. If she is found to be a national security threat, she would almost certainly be deported. If not, a hearing in February is scheduled to determine whether Gao should be granted asylum.

Ladan Mirbagheri Smith, Gao's immigration lawyer, said Gao would face persecution in China given the 10-year prison sentence looming over her.

And earlier this month, U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III, who sentenced Gao, said he never anticipated that she would face deportation and that if Gao were truly a national security risk, prosecutors would have brought more serious charges.

"I certainly never contemplated that she would face this situation," Ellis said at a post-trial hearing for Xue, who was convicted along with Gao of tax evasion for failing to report profits from the microprocessor sales on the their joint tax return. "Only the most serious proof (that Gao is a national security risk) should change that."

Ellis has allowed Xue to remain free and deferred the start of his prison sentence while Gao's case remains unresolved.

Ellis declined, though, to formally intervene in Gao's immigration case, saying the matter should be resolved by an immigration judge.

ICE spokesman Dean Boyd said the department's rationale for seeking Gao's deportation is plain given the crime for which she was convicted.

"We know she was exporting sensitive technology with missile applications to Chinese government entities," Boyd said. "A lot of our agents have invested quite a bit of time in this investigation."

Gao wrote a letter to Ellis in July seeking leniency for her husband and bemoaning her plight.

"I am writing in despair. I am cursing the day of my birth just like Job. I would have wished a quick end to my suffering if not for the sake of my children," Gao wrote. "My own situation is as bad as can be, according to my lawyer. ICE could hold me for years while labeling me as a threat to national security. I am not sure if I could survive it."

Xue said he feels double-crossed by government agents who led the family to believe that Gao would not face deportation after serving her sentence.

"If it was ICE's intention or determination to deport Gao to the Chinese government, the should have mentioned the issue during the (plea-bargain) process," Xue wrote in court papers on his wife's behalf.

Across The Country, Many Mobilize Against Illegal Immigration (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, January 23, 2006

Immigration has become an increasingly contentious political and social issue around the country.

Organizations patterned after the controversial "Minuteman Project" along the US-Mexico border have sprung up in New England, the Midwest, the South, and the Pacific Northwest. This has led to demonstrations and shouting matches with those opposed to what they call "vigilantes."

State and local officials are working to limit government services to illegal immigrants and their children (such as college tuition and worker's compensation), requiring proof of citizenship to get a driver's license and cracking down on day labor sites where men - many in the country illegally - gather to seek work.

Concerns over terrorism, identity theft, and the national methamphetamine epidemic (which is fueled by Mexican drug cartels and Hispanic gangs operating far from the border) are part of the picture. But some observers warn of an upsurge in "nativism" - the kind of anti-immigrant feeling that has swelled at other times in US history.

"This is a really significant issue right now," says Mark Pitcavage, a historian of extremist movements with the Anti-Defamation League and an adviser to law-enforcement agencies.

For years, says Dr. Pitcavage, some organizations have been critical of what they see as lax immigration policies promoted by both Republican and Democratic administrations.

There are about 11 million illegal immigrants in the US today, a figure that grows by some 500,000 a year, according to the Center for Immigration Studies. In a recent paper, the center's research director, Steven Camarota, reports that there now are more than 35 million immigrants (legal and illegal) living in the US. That amounts to more than 12 percent of the total population, the highest percentage in eight decades.

While many illegal immigrants enter the country to do jobs most US citizens shun, the National Research Council has estimated that the net cost of immigrants ranges from $11 billion to $22 billion a year. Camarota notes that the proportion of immigrant-headed households using at least one major welfare program is 29 percent, compared with 18 percent for native households.

Many immigration reformers are concerned that the kind of temporary guest worker program President Bush, businesses, and some members of Congress favor will exacerbate the situation.

"They need to fix the system," said Dan Stein, president of the Federation for American Immigration Reform, in a fund-raising message. "Not only do they need to make the enforcement commitments work, they need to reduce immigration ... and eliminate the nepotistic family chain migration system that fuels the seeds of unmanageable immigration growth."

Recently, that concern about immigration has developed into a widespread political movement. But it's also developed more radical offshoots.

"Not surprisingly, when you see a movement like this emerge, you see extremists actively working to exploit that mainstream sentiment ... as a wedge to recruit or to propagandize," says Pitcavage.

Devin Burghart of the Center for New Community, a faith-based human rights organization in Chicago, estimates that the "Minutemen" have spawned at least 40 new groups in more than a dozen states.

In some areas, the rise in extreme anti-immigrant sentiment has resulted in attacks on Hispanic men, and conspiracy theories. One theory warns of "la reconquista," the invasion of the US southwest by Mexicans determined to take back territory lost in the 19th century.

Movement across the US-Mexico border has gone on for centuries, says Jean Rosenfeld, of the UCLA Center for the Study of Religion. But today, says Dr. Rosenfeld, "The nativist narrative ... signals a high tide of resurgent xenophobia."

While communities from New England to the Pacific Northwest are seeing notable growth in the Hispanic population, the most dramatic increases have been in the South, reports the Pew Hispanic Center. Most of those migrants are men who lack legal status, reports Pew.

Since the last census, the Hispanic population in Georgia has grown faster than any other state. The need for laborers to accommodate the residential and commercial building boom around Atlanta is a big part of that. The rate of Hispanic births is twice the official Hispanic population there. Anti-immigration activists opposed to multiculturalism have taken to calling the state "Georgiafornia."

In Washington this year, Congress and the Bush administration are expected to continue wrangling over immigration reform. But most of the action, observers say, is likely to be at the state level: legislation and ballot initiatives.

In 2004, Arizonans approved Proposition 200, which requires proof of citizenship to vote or to apply for state benefits. Up to a dozen states could have similar measures on the ballot this year. Lawmakers in North Carolina and New Hampshire are considering proposals authorizing state and local law officers to enforce federal immigration law. Massachusetts state representatives recently defeated a bill that would have allowed undocumented immigrant students to pay the same discounted college tuition rate as state residents.

In the post-9/11 era, attitudes toward foreign immigration are unique in some ways. But there are similarities to the 1850s and the early 20th century, when violent reactions to immigrants - charges that they took jobs, caused crime, and were not loyal to the US - were common.

"I mean from Germans to Irish Catholics to Jews to Hispanics virtually the same kinds of things have been said," says Mark Potok of Southern Poverty Law Center, who monitors extremist activities in the US. Such sentiment historically abates, says Pitcavage. "The sooner we get this cycle over with, the happier I'll be."

Police Split On Migrant Plan (LAT)

By Richard Winton And Daniel Yi

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2006

The push by two Orange County police agencies to arrange training for some of their officers to help enforce federal immigration laws has opened a rift in Southern California law enforcement circles, with some officials fearing the move will harm crime-fighting efforts.

The Costa Mesa Police Department and Orange County Sheriff's Department are developing plans for their officers to be trained alongside federal immigration agents so they can understand and help enforce immigration laws.

They are among the first in the nation to seek the training, and their effort has generated both interest from other agencies and protests from immigrants' rights groups.

"Dozens of jurisdictions have reached out to us and asked us for copies of this policy," said Jon Fleischman, a spokesman for the Sheriff's Department. "Like with any instrument that provides a resource to find criminals, departments are looking at this to see if this will help fight crime."

But in Los Angeles, the county's two top cops — Sheriff Lee Baca and police Chief William J. Bratton — have come out solidly against such steps, saying it would damage hard-earned efforts to build trust in immigrant communities.

They argue that local police are busy enough dealing with crime and that immigration enforcement should be left to the federal government.

"The Orange County talk is cheap," Baca said. "I want to see how arresting a young 18-year-old girl trying to get a job goes down when robbery and burglary calls for service aren't being responded to. The public will say, 'We've had enough of this.' Let the federal government do its job."

The two Orange County agencies say they would not conduct sweeps but only check the status of suspects they stop.

For nearly three decades, the LAPD has enforced a strict policy prohibiting officers from stopping or questioning someone solely based on their immigration status. The policy, known as Special Order 40 and approved by then-Chief Daryl Gates, was part of an effort to improve relations between officers and illegal immigrants, who officials say were often afraid to report crimes or cooperate as witnesses.

"It's not a matter of politics. It's a matter of practical policing," said LAPD Assistant Chief George Gascon. "If an undocumented woman is raped and doesn't report it, the suspect who raped that woman, remember, could be the suspect who rapes someone else's sister, mother or wife later."

But politics is clearly intertwined in the debate.

Activists fighting illegal immigration, including people involved in the Minuteman Project, have cheered the efforts in Orange County to enforce all laws at the local level. In Los Angeles, immigrant rights groups have been pressing their case to Bratton and Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, who came out last week against training officers for immigration enforcement.

Still, the issue has been getting law enforcement's attention nationally. The International Assn. of Chiefs of Police has opposed any efforts in the U.S. to require local police to enforce immigration laws.

The Orange County Sheriff's Department wants to send 200 deputies for special training by Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and hopes federal approval comes soon. Likewise, Costa Mesa seeks training for up to 40 officers initially, mostly detectives, gang investigators and jail personnel.

The training will be to familiarize officers with immigration law, give them an understanding of the federal immigration bureaucracy and let them observe how federal agents do their jobs.

The training will help the officers work more smoothly with federal agents to verify the immigration status of people they suspect of criminal wrongdoing, said Costa Mesa Mayor Allan Mansoor, a strong supporter of the plan who is also an Orange County sheriff's deputy. If a suspect is found to be an illegal immigrant, police would report that to federal officials, who will ultimately have the power to start deportation proceedings, he said.

Giving local officers the ability to immediately access criminal suspects' immigration status is significant: If an officer finds that a suspect is an illegal immigrant, the suspect can be detained on that charge, even if there is not enough evidence to make an arrest on the crime initially suspected. And if the check finds that the suspect was previously deported and then came back into the United States — a more serious charge — the officers could also immediately make an arrest.

By contrast, LAPD officers are for the most part prohibited from checking a suspect's immigration record at the time of arrest. If a suspect is arrested, the immigration status is usually discovered later, during booking and charging.

Mansoor emphasized that officers wouldn't be looking for illegal immigrants.

"The focus is criminal offenders," he said. "This will make the community safer for everyone, including people who are here illegally but otherwise are law-abiding."

Sheriff's officials said the training would help deputies more easily identify illegal immigrants with convictions in their home country who are now in the United States.

Supporters of the policy also counter objections by Baca and other opponents that the training would make illegal immigrants less likely to cooperate with law enforcement. The supporters point out that many of the criminals who prey on immigrant communities are themselves illegal immigrants. Mansoor and others say residents will understand that the training is designed to take such people off the streets, not pick on the average person.

As for concerns that the new policy would lead to deportation of undocumented immigrants who are initially suspected of crimes but ultimately not charged or found not guilty, Mansoor added: "If someone is here illegally, they can be deported as is, now. There is no expectation that if you are here illegally, you are allowed to stay."

The policy has won the two agencies praise from anti-illegal immigration groups, and at least two other Orange County cities — Westminster and Garden Grove — are considering similar training. But the two agencies have also been dealing with a backlash from some among Orange County's Latinos.

Paty Madueno, a leader with an umbrella group of churches in Orange County, said the policy "has caused fear, panic and hate.... I know there are a lot of families that are very worried."

The debate underscores the sensitive relationship between local police and federal immigration authorities — especially in Southern California, with its large immigrant communities. In Los Angeles, some officers have grumbled that Special Order 40 is too restrictive and makes it difficult for them to identify suspects.

The department last year drew scrutiny from some immigrant groups when it "clarified" Special Order 40.

The clarification allows officers to arrest and initiate immigration checks on suspects they believe to be convicted violent felons who were deported but then reentered the U.S. illegally. The change came after some anti-gang detectives learned that a suspect they helped convict of a violent crime and was later deported to Mexico was back in Los Angeles. They were not sure whether they could arrest him under Special Order 40.

With the moves in Orange County garnering national headlines last week, Los Angeles officials reassured residents that they had no plans to follow suit.

It's a message even some Orange County cities are sending out.

"It doesn't seem to me that local governments' taking on [enforcement of immigration laws] as an initiative is necessarily the best use of local resources," said Irvine Mayor Beth Krom. "Why create an environment that pits neighbor against neighbor or causes a person in line at the grocery store to look suspiciously around?"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Alito Confirmation May Be Tight (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 23, 2006

Federal Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. appears headed for confirmation to the Supreme Court this week with one of the narrowest Senate approvals in history.

Though Judge Alito hasn't lost support from any Republicans, he has won endorsement from only one Democrat. Republicans say they expect the vote to be close to the 55-45 partisan break in the chamber.

Several centrist Democrats who voted to confirm Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and have been courted by the White House during the Alito confirmation process already said they will vote against Judge Alito. Those include Sens. Max Baucus of Montana, Ron Wyden of Oregon and Ken Salazar of Colorado.

Republican leadership aides also say they are worried they may lose one of the Northeast Republicans who represent liberal states. Sens. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Olympia J. Snowe and Susan Collins, both of Maine, have declined to say how they will vote.

Those same centrists, however, have said that a Democrat filibuster of the nominee would be out of order.

Still, Democrat leaders insist, that option remains a possibility.

"Nothing is off the table," Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, said yesterday on CNN's "Late Edition."

Sen. George Allen, Virginia Republican, seemed to almost relish the threat.

"Judge Alito has an outstanding record. He had the unanimous highest recommendation of the [American Bar Association]. He has 15 years as a circuit court judge," said Mr. Allen, adding that "if the Democrats want to filibuster, let them. We'll pull the constitutional trigger."

Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee has made clear that if Democrats filibuster Judge Alito, he will move to change the rules in the Senate to ban such filibusters of judicial nominations.

While Mr. Schumer, who sits on the Judiciary Committee, said the filibuster remains an option, he also seemed wary of going that route.

"A filibuster is a very large thing to do. It's not done very often, and so you've got to give it a lot of thought," he said. "There is no question many are disappointed in some of the answers that Samuel Alito gave, but to vote against him is one thing and to filibuster requires what I think is a much higher standard."

Also yesterday, Sen. John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who lost the 2004 presidential election, said he will vote against confirmation.

He said he opposes Judge Alito, in part, because "he refuses even to go as far as John Roberts in affirming settled law," an apparent reference to Chief Justice Roberts' assertion that federal abortion rights are settled law.

Court observers say Chief Justice Roberts left himself plenty of room during his Supreme Court hearings to overturn abortion rights if given the opportunity.

A vote on Judge Alito by the Senate Judiciary Committee is scheduled for tomorrow with debate on the floor to start Wednesday. A final vote is expected by next Tuesday.

Did Democrats Seal Their Defeat In Alito Hearings? (LAW)

By T.r. Goldman, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 23, 2006

There are any number of ways to fault the performance of Senate Democrats in their campaign to keep Samuel Alito Jr. -- seemingly as rock-ribbed a conservative as you'll find -- off the high court.

During Alito's weeklong confirmation hearings, Senate Judiciary Committee Democrats were, by turns, hostile, pedantic, bombastic and confused. Follow-up questions? No time for that.

There were larger strategic miscalculations as well: notably that the majority of pro-abortion rights Americans would rise up in outraged opposition to a nominee who had so clearly expressed disdain for abortion rights at several points during his legal career. Or that Americans would find credible the shrill discourse of Alito's opponents, which by now had been assimilated as so much background noise.

DOJ_NMG_0010104

And there was last year's "Gang of 14" filibuster deal, one that Democrats initially claimed as a victory but that helped seal their defeat.

The causes are myriad, but the result seems clear: Alito's opponents threw everything they had at him and nothing worked. He is now virtually guaranteed to be confirmed.

THE NUMBERS GAME

There was one thing, of course, Senate Democrats couldn't control: the Republicans' 55-44 majority.

"Alito walked in there with all 10 Republican [committee] votes and 51 votes on the floor, and they knew it," says Jeffrey Berman, who runs the Western region of People For the American Way. "They just set up a four-corners offense and ran out the clock."

In fact, numbers tell the story in almost every judicial nomination. The party in power in the Senate, especially if that party controls the White House, always gets its man -- at least it has since 1930. "I'm proud of the Democratic senators," says Berman, the former chief counsel to committee Democrat Sen. Charles Schumer, N.Y. "They just don't have enough of them."

They do have enough to filibuster, as it technically takes 41 votes, and there are 44 Democrats. But that's not happening, either. In part that's because, in practical terms, it takes several more than 41, says University of Connecticut professor David Yalof, who notes that it's tough to get Democratic senators from GOP-leaning states like Nebraska, Arkansas and Louisiana to go along.

Last year's Gang of 14 compromise over judicial nominees instantly raised the standard for filibustering. That deal, in turn, stemmed from the Democrats' promiscuous use of the filibuster against 10 federal appeals court judges in 2004, which, in the opinion of some, made using it to block Alito's nomination that much harder. And three of those judges still wound up on the federal bench.

"We shot our wad. We filibustered 10 guys, and at the end of the day the worst got on anyway," says a former Judiciary Committee counsel. "If we had not used the filibuster and pissed off the Republicans over the past four years, if it was seriously being entertained for the first time [against Alito], we might have succeeded."

NOT ASKED, NOT ANSWERED

Still, a filibuster wasn't the Democrats' only option. There were the hearings. And it's clear from a close reading of the Alito transcript that his Democratic interrogators did not give him a free pass.

Democrats hammered the 55-year-old federal appeals court judge for three days and more than a dozen hours on a broad range of subjects. They discussed obscure constitutional theories, the scope of executive power, the role of foreign law in Court deliberations, stare decisis and privacy -- again and again and again.

Alito fended them all off with the same sturdy stiff-arm. In the end there was simply no issue on which Democrats found traction.

Indeed, the whole week -- a festival of modern senatorial oratory -- will be remembered largely for one silent image: the tearful exit of Alito's wife, Martha-Ann, from the hearing room after Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., apologized to the Alito family for the hearings' harsh tone.

The Democrats' speechifying, of course, could have been sharper and more pungent, a more prosecutorial cross-examination than political stump speech.

There also could have been a concerted effort to redefine Alito's 1985 job application to the Reagan Justice Department, in which he laid out his conservative jurisprudential philosophy and his opposition to abortion. They could have called it a personal essay, for example, so that his opinions were seen more as bedrock convictions than the kind of posturing one does simply to get a job.

But that's a tough assignment for any panel of questioners, let alone a group of notoriously independent senators just back from recess with little inclination to coordinate their efforts, anyway. And who knows whether better questioning would have led to more satisfying answers.

The back-and-forth is a dance that is becoming increasingly orchestrated, notes Mark Gitenstein, who was chief counsel to the Judiciary Committee in the 1980s.

"The nominees know what the basic questions are -- they don't change much -- and the committee knows what the answers will be," says Gitenstein, a partner at Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw. "But the American people are not finding anything out about these nominees. There's no real jurisprudential debate."

There's also the conundrum of any confirmation hearing: To really dig inside a nominee's mind, senators have to ask questions "so arcane people can't tell what the hell you're talking about," Gitenstein says. "But if you ask general questions, it's easy to give a general answer."

Starting with Chief Justice John Roberts Jr., the responses reached a new level of sophistication, he adds. "Roberts did a very excellent job of giving an answer which sounded like it was saying something and didn't. Alito did the same thing, if not as polished."

THE VANGUARD

To Republicans, there was a disingenuousness to the Democrats' strategy. In an attempt to replicate their crowning success, the defeat of Robert Bork in 1987, they reached into a similar bag of tricks to try to demonize Alito to the American public.

"They stir these things up and the nominee spends all this time trying to rebut them," explained Alabama Republican Sen. Jeff Sessions during a break in the hearings earlier this month. "The nominee hits the hearings a little bit under a cloud -- this is the Supreme Court and everybody's watching. [Sen. Edward] Kennedy is the point of this flying wedge; he's the guy who does the heavy lifting."

The Massachusetts mauler was true to form, repeatedly assailing Alito's credibility on something that, on its face, did not appear that grave -- namely, Alito's failure to put cases involving Vanguard, the mutual fund company in which he owned shares, on his recusal sheet.

True, during his 1990 confirmation hearings for a seat on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Alito explicitly promised the Senate that he would recuse himself from any Vanguard cases. But as he repeatedly pointed out, there was never the slightest possibility that any ruling he made could have affected the price of his mutual fund.

Then there was the Concerned Alumni of Princeton, the defunct group to which Alito once belonged. Democrats hit the issue hard, asking how Alito, an immigrant's son, could have associated himself with a group dedicated to keeping minorities out of Princeton.

But the CAP issue also failed to gather much traction, possibly because no proof could be found that Alito had anything more than a marginal connection to the group.

ABORTION WRONGS

Despite their superior numbers, the White House and its allies in the Senate weren't taking any chances on their man.

Might he fare badly in comparison with Roberts, whose stellar performance four months earlier became a benchmark for all future nominees?

No problem. Make sure early on that everyone believes Alito is not in the same league as Roberts -- whether he is or not.

"They played a great game of lowered expectations," adds the former committee counsel. "Roberts was a rock star; this guy was a high school bandleader."

Republicans also did a better job than Democrats of framing the nominee. "Alito was presented, both by himself and his sponsors, as a conventional person, a middle-of-the-road American," says political scientist Andrew Seligsohn, who teaches at Hartwick College in Oneonta, N.Y. "And we're being asked to believe that this conventional guy will act radically. That's hard to believe."

Democrats, he says, "never put together the case that while this guy may look conventional, the judicial philosophy to which he subscribes is radical."

Even Alito's answers on abortion, which justifiably raised fears among pro-abortion rights senators, failed to make much impact at the hearings. This despite the fact that Gallup Poll data for the past 30 years consistently show that a majority of Americans believe abortion should remain legal.

DOJ_NMG_0010106

It's possible that a certain complacency about abortion has set in. Today virtually no woman of reproductive age in the United States has known a time when abortion was illegal. And a lot of the barriers to abortion don't sound threatening, anyway, adds Patton Boggs partner John Jonas. "You want parental notification; you don't want late-term abortions," he says.

For most people, overturning Roe v. Wade does not seem like a real possibility, notes Jonas, a former Hill staffer. "It's like the draft. 'Oh, they're going to bring back the draft. That's not a credible threat.'"

And while Beltway politicians may be aggrieved that Alito and other recent Supreme Court nominees are able to get away with saying nothing, many Americans don't seem to mind, notes another former Senate staffer.

"We've been through this enough, and to some extent people are getting a little savvier. People don't expect judges to be politicians," he says. "It's a distinction not being lost on the people, although politicians have not yet caught up with it."

There are exceptions, including former Sen. Alan Simpson, R-Wyo., who says he never paid attention to ideology. "I laid my blood on the line for Clarence Thomas, and if the issue is abortion, I must have missed something, because I'm pro-choice."

In fact, says Simpson, he'd prefer a Court with members who hold strongly opposing views. "It would be a wonderful thing to have a Bork and a Tribe on the Court," he says, referring to defeated Supreme Court nominee Robert Bork and liberal Harvard Law professor Laurence Tribe. "You throw guys of this brilliance in a room with their seven colleagues. I can't imagine the richness of the discussion."

Kerry Says He Won't Vote For Alito (BOS)

The Boston Globe, January 23, 2006

WASHINGTON --Sen. John Kerry said Sunday he will vote against Supreme Court nominee Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. because he fears Alito would take the country "backwards."

Kerry, the failed Democratic nominee for president in 2004, also voted against now-Supreme Court Chief Justice John Roberts. But Alito, Kerry said Sunday, goes even farther than Roberts in undermining established legal precedents.

A flash point during Alito's confirmation hearings was a 1985 memo he wrote saying that the "Constitution does not protect a right to an abortion" despite the Supreme Court's 1973 Row v. Wade decision.

"I think he will shut the door of court access to the average person in America ... ," Kerry said Sunday on ABC's "This Week with George Stephanopoulos." "I will vote against him because I think he will take the court backwards."

The Senate Judiciary Committee will vote on Alito's nomination to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor on Tuesday, with the full Senate starting final debate the next day.

Most if not all of the Senate's 55 Republicans are expected to support him, which would give him enough votes for confirmation if the 44 Democrats and independent Sen. Jim Jeffords of Vermont don't attempt a filibuster.

On Sunday Kerry also criticized President Bush's wireless wiretaps, calling the program, "a violation of the law."

A voice recording with new threats from Osama bin Laden released last week underscored a major White House failure in the war on terror, Kerry also said.

"The fact is, when they had a chance to kill or capture Osama bin Laden they didn't do it," Kerry said. "Osama bin Laden is going to die of kidney failure before he's killed by Karl Rove and his crowd."

There have long been unconfirmed rumors that bin Laden is suffering from kidney failure and requires regular medical care.

Kerry also called the corruption surrounding convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff a GOP scandal. The junior senator from Massachusetts pointed to the party that dominates Washington politics.

"They run the House of Representatives. They run the Senate. They have the White House. They're controlling who goes on the judiciary," Kerry, the Democrats' nominee for president in 2004, said on ABC's "This Week."

"They have not done the things necessary in order to press forward on this," Kerry said.

He also did not rule out a 2008 run for president, and rebuffed criticisms from Democratic strategics in an upcoming article in GQ magazine who charged that he was a lackluster candidate for the next presidential election.

Kerry said he doesn't listen to insider Washington chitchat and that another run for president is, "a decision for the future."

"I"m going to listen to my heart and my gut" Kerry said.

Two Justices Who 'get' Religion (USAT)

By Richard W. Garnett

USA Today, January 23, 2006

The conventional wisdom is that Judge Samuel Alito will be confirmed by the Senate to serve on the Supreme Court, despite the energetic opposition of left-leaning interest groups and some senators' aggressive, at times unseemly and misleading, interrogations. This is, of course, as it should be. Alito has a distinguished record of public service and a strikingly sharp legal mind.

Judge Samuel Alito is a fitting replacement for Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, given their shared commitment to religious freedom.

AP photos

It is interesting to note, though, that one of the most important players in Alito's recent Senate confirmation hearings wasn't even in the room: Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a pioneering jurist who has lived "greatly in the law," to take a phrase from Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes in the early 1900s.

Unfortunately, though, her work and legacy were misused and distorted by some of Alito's critics, who appear to worry that his understanding of the Constitution's requirements might not coincide with their own policy preferences. And so, during the confirmation battle, we heard repeatedly that O'Connor has been a "moderate," "swing" justice and tirelessly resisted the efforts of conservatives and the "religious right" to "turn back the clock" or "push the court to the right."

This description is not entirely wrong, but it is incomplete. In fact, and notwithstanding her recent "liberal" votes in several hot-button cases, O'Connor was for two decades a consistent and crucial partner with Chief Justice William Rehnquist in moving the court's constitutional doctrines in a more conservative direction: She believed, among other things, that ours is a national government of limited powers, that the states are sovereign laboratories of democracy, that religious faith and expression are protected by our Constitution and welcomed in the public square, and that our criminal laws best serve human dignity by preventing and punishing crime.

ON RELIGION:

Faith. Religion. Spirituality. Meaning. A weekly column seeks to illuminate the national conversation. Read the series online at religion.usatoday.com.

Alito is an eminently worthy successor to O'Connor. What's more, he is all the more fitting a replacement, given their shared commitment to what has been quite rightly called our "first freedom": The freedom of religion protected by the First Amendment.

Like O'Connor, Alito understands that our Constitution does not regard religious faith with grudging suspicion, or as a bizarre quirk or quaint relic. They both appreciate that, in our traditions and laws, religious freedom is cherished as a basic human right and a non-negotiable aspect of human dignity. This is why both jurists have occasionally come under fire from activists who misunderstand the "separation of church and state."

Our Constitution separates church and state not to confine religious belief or silence religious expression, but to curb the ambitions and reach of governments. The point of the First Amendment is not to "put religion in its place," but instead to protect religion by keeping the government "in its place." The Amendment's Establishment Clause is not a sword, driving private religious expression from the marketplace of ideas; rather, it is a shield that constrains government precisely to protect religiously motivated speech and action.

In case after case, O'Connor has vindicated this understanding. For example, in the 1994 Kiryas Joel case, she insisted that "government impartiality, not animosity, toward religion" is the constitutional touchstone, and that the First Amendment neither requires nor permits "hostility to religion, religious ideas, religious people, or religious schools." Yes, as in the recent Ten Commandments cases, she has disapproved religious activities or expressions that, in her view, exclude some by endorsing the faith of others.

At the same time, though, she has vigorously defended accommodations for religious believers and their right to participate fully and speak openly in the public square. Accordingly, in Rosenberger v. University of Virginia, she agreed that the First Amendment does not permit a state university to exclude a student newspaper from a program designed to fund student activities and publications simply because the paper endorsed and proposed a Christian perspective.

Alito has been equally vigilant and clear in policing discrimination against religious believers, conduct and expression. In a 1999 case, he wrote that the First Amendment did not permit the police department of Newark, N.J., to exempt officers from its no-beards policy on medical grounds while refusing similar accommodations to Muslims.

He said the department had, in effect, made "a value judgment in favor of secular motivations, but not religious motivations." That same year, he upheld Jersey City's holiday display — which included, among other things, a crèche and a menorah — emphasizing that the display was a permissible recognition of citizens' faith and the city's diversity, not an unconstitutional establishment of religion.

More recently, he required the public school district in Stafford Township, N.J., to provide a religious youth group the same access to its literature-distribution program that other community groups enjoyed. Echoing the court's decision in Rosenberger, he insisted that the First Amendment does not permit such exclusion on the basis of the group's religious identity and viewpoint.

At the heart of O'Connor's legacy is an insistence that our Constitution does not mandate a public square scrubbed clean of religious symbols and speech, and that equality and neutrality — not hostility or marginalization — are the watchwords of our First Amendment. With Judge Alito, that legacy is in good hands.

O'Connor's Rightful Heir? (NSWK)

By Evan Thomas And Stuart Taylor Jr.

Newsweek, January 23, 2006

When conservative Washington lawyers who argue before the Supreme Court talk about "the Greenhouse Effect," they don't mean global warming. The Greenhouse in question is Linda Greenhouse, the longtime and esteemed Supreme Court reporter for The New York Times. The "effect" is to subtly push Supreme Court justices to the left. Unless a jurist comes to the court with very strongly held, or even fixed, conservative views, there is a tendency to be seduced by the liberal legal establishment that dominates at elite law schools like Harvard and Yale. Those schools produce a disproportionate number of the law clerks who generally draft opinions for the justices, as well as the sort of professor routinely tapped as a source by Greenhouse, who is regarded as a legal scholar in her own right.

That, at least, is the view of conservatives like U.S. Court of Appeals Judge Laurence Silberman, who popularized the term some years ago. The chief "victim" of the Greenhouse Effect is usually said to be Justice Anthony Kennedy, who has drifted to the left since his appointment almost two decades ago. With the departure of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor from the Supreme Court, Kennedy is seen by liberals and status-quo devotees as the remaining swing vote, a check on the court's rightward tilt as more justices are appointed by Republican presidents.

Kennedy's linchpin role was on display last week, when he wrote the majority opinion in a closely watched case. By a 6-to-3 vote, the court rejected the Bush Justice Department's effort to block a controversial Oregon law that allows physicians to assist the suicide of terminally ill patients. About 30 people a year avail themselves of Oregon's "right to die" law, obtaining a prescription for a lethal dose of drugs. Former attorney general John Ashcroft intervened to stop the practice, but the Supreme Court ruled last week that Ashcroft had overstepped his authority.

Conservatives took some consolation in the vote of Chief Justice John Roberts. In his first significant decision since his confirmation, he joined in dissent with the court's right wing, Justices Clarence Thomas and Antonin Scalia. If, as expected, Judge Samuel Alito is confirmed, conservatives think they will have a reasonably reliable fourth vote. But Kennedy remains at best a wild card; in some important arenas, most notably abortion and gay rights, he has been a winning vote for the court's liberal camp.

Kennedy has "evolved," say the liberals—much like other GOP-appointed justices before him, such as the late Harry Blackmun. Conservative lawyers scoff (though rarely on the record, lest they have to argue before Kennedy) that the justice is squishy and vainglorious, too worried about what the headlines will say about him.

Other hard-liners regard him as a traitor. He was chosen by Ronald Reagan in 1987 after fiery conservative Robert Bork was rejected by the Democratic-controlled Senate and Reagan's next choice, Judge Douglas Ginsburg, dropped out after he admitted to having smoked marijuana as a Harvard law professor. At first Kennedy seemed to be a solid conservative, siding with the state in criminal-rights cases. Some even began calling him "Bork without the beard" and predicting that he'd be chief justice one day. But then in 1992, Kennedy joined the majority opinion upholding a woman's right to abortion. Just before he took the bench the day of the decision, Kennedy told a reporter, "Sometimes you don't know if you're Caesar about to cross the Rubicon or Captain Queeg cutting your own towline." Then he excused himself to "brood." No one was quite sure what he meant by that mixed metaphor, but it was seen as a bad sign for conservatives, who figured they could no longer count on him. Indeed, Kennedy went on to author a landmark 2003 decision that established, for the first time, constitutional protection for homosexual sodomy. "Gay people are entitled to respect for their private lives," wrote Kennedy. "The state cannot demean their existence or control their destiny."

Kennedy is by no means always or even often on the left. He has dissented, for instance, from decisions upholding affirmative action. But for the time being, he may be the one justice standing between conservatives and a predictable Supreme Court majority.

Judge Alito's Radical Views (NYT)

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

If Judge Samuel Alito Jr.'s confirmation hearings lacked drama, apart from his wife's bizarrely over-covered crying jag, it is because they confirmed the obvious. Judge Alito is exactly the kind of legal thinker President Bush wants on the Supreme Court. He has a radically broad view of the president's power, and a radically narrow view of Congress's power. He has long argued that the Constitution does not protect abortion rights. He wants to reduce the rights and liberties of ordinary Americans, and has a history of tilting the scales of justice against the little guy.

As senators prepare to vote on the nomination, they should ask themselves only one question: will replacing Sandra Day O'Connor with Judge Alito be a step forward for the nation, or a step backward? Instead of Justice O'Connor's pragmatic centrism, which has kept American law on a steady and well-respected path, Judge Alito is likely to bring a movement conservative's approach to his role and to the Constitution.

Judge Alito may be a fine man, but he is not the kind of justice the country needs right now. Senators from both parties should oppose his nomination.

It is likely that Judge Alito was chosen for his extreme views on presidential power. The Supreme Court, with Justice O'Connor's support, has played a key role in standing up to the Bush administration's radical view of its power, notably that it can hold, indefinitely and without trial, anyone the president declares an "unlawful enemy combatant."

Judge Alito would no doubt try to change the court's approach. He has supported the fringe "unitary executive" theory, which would give the president greater power to detain Americans and would throw off the checks and balances built into the Constitution. He has also put forth the outlandish idea that if the president makes a statement when he signs a bill into law, a court interpreting the law should give his intent the same weight it gives to Congress's intent in writing and approving the law.

Judge Alito would also work to reduce Congress's power in other ways. In a troubling dissent, he argued that Congress exceeded its authority when it passed a law banning machine guns, and as a government lawyer he insisted Congress did not have the power to protect car buyers from falsified odometers.

There is every reason to believe, based on his long paper trail and the evasive answers he gave at his hearings, that Judge Alito would quickly vote to overturn Roe v. Wade. So it is hard to see how Senators Lincoln Chaffee, Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins, all Republicans, could square support for Judge Alito with their commitment to abortion rights.

Judge Alito has consistently shown a bias in favor of those in power over those who need the law to protect them. Women, racial minorities, the elderly and workers who come to court seeking justice should expect little sympathy. In the same flat bureaucratic tones he used at the hearings, he is likely to insist that the law can do nothing for them.

The White House has tried to create an air of inevitability around this nomination. But there is no reason to believe that Judge Alito is any more popular than the president who nominated him. Outside a small but vocal group of hard-core conservatives, America has greeted the nomination with a shrug - and counted on its senators to make the right decision.

The real risk for senators lies not in opposing Judge Alito, but in voting for him. If the far right takes over the Supreme Court, American law and life could change dramatically. If that happens, many senators who voted for Judge Alito will no doubt come to regret that they did not insist that Justice O'Connor's seat be filled with someone who shared her cautious, centrist approach to the law.

Health Plan To Revive Debate (LAT)

By Peter G. Gosselin

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush is preparing to unveil a series of proposals intended to make the nation's healthcare system more efficient, but he is likely to revive a bitter debate — begun last year over Social Security — about how much of life's biggest risks Americans should bear on their own.

Although many of the proposals, such as limits on medical malpractice lawsuits, are ones the president has failed to get through Congress, he plans to unveil new initiatives as part of his vision for reshaping U.S. healthcare policy, aides and advisors said.

Among the possible initiatives: offering additional tax breaks for the use of Health Savings Accounts, and making most out-of-pocket medical spending by individuals tax-deductible. Currently, individuals must spend 7.5% of their annual incomes on healthcare before they qualify for an income tax deduction.

Bush's supporters say that the changes would help tame rocketing medical costs by encouraging people to buy their own healthcare insurance and become smarter shoppers, rather than relying on employers or government programs such as Medicare and Medicaid to cover their health costs.

Critics argue that Bush's expected proposals would undermine the employer-provided health insurance system that covers most working Americans. And, they say, it would encourage them to switch to the Bush-authored Health Savings Accounts, established in 2003, under which they would bear more of the financial risks of illness and injury.

Just as with Bush's Social Security personal accounts proposal, the president would be seeking to persuade Americans to rely less on government-provided or employer-provided safety nets and more on themselves.

He would also exhibit the kind of combativeness that has become a trademark of his time in Washington. Despite the political drubbing that the administration sustained on Social Security and over the flawed rollout of its Medicare prescription drug benefit, Bush appears eager to return to the fray.

"We may be looking at the start of a fundamental shift in what we mean by health insurance, from a system where we share risks to one where it's up to individuals to make their own deals and bear their own risks," said Drew E. Altman, president of the nonpartisan California-based Kaiser Family Foundation.

"The danger," Altman said, "is that this new arrangement could work out very well for some people, especially the young, the healthy and the affluent, but be very bad for the health system as a whole."

The Health Savings Accounts, known as HSAs, are designed to encourage people to cover a substantial portion of their healthcare costs by opening tax-advantaged accounts from which they can pay routine medical expenses. The account must be paired with a high-deductible insurance policy to cover catastrophic medical costs.

The theory behind the accounts is that people who pay more of their own costs become better consumers and less likely to demand unnecessary care. Proponents say the accounts would encourage people who have no insurance to buy at least some coverage.

Detractors fear that the accounts will attract only the healthiest Americans, leaving traditional employer-provided plans with people who have the highest health costs.

Bush signaled his readiness to act on healthcare in a campaign-style speech in Virginia last week, saying that government must ensure "healthcare is available and affordable." He explicitly linked the proposals he will make in this year's State of the Union address later this month and new budget plan to last year's Social Security fight by discussing healthcare in the same "ownership society" terms that he used in touting Social Security personal accounts.

"I think people ought to be allowed to own their own healthcare account and make decisions for what's best for them," Bush told his audience.

DOJ_NMG_0010111

Last year, Bush made a considerable effort trying to convince Americans that younger workers should be allowed to divert a portion of their Social Security taxes into stock and bond accounts that they would own and control. In return, their traditional Social Security benefit would be reduced. But the plan failed to gain popularity with the public or in Congress amid a debate over whether it would undermine the finances of the overall program and would leave workers too exposed to stock market risk.

Much of the president's recent thinking about healthcare appears to be influenced by former Reagan administration economist John F. Cogan, now at Stanford University, and former Bush chief economic advisor R. Glenn Hubbard, now dean of Columbia University business school.

The two, together with Stanford economist Daniel P. Kessler, have just unveiled a plan for overhauling the nation's healthcare system.

The proposals include new tax breaks for individual health spending, an expanded system of "report cards" on doctors and hospitals, stricter enforcement of antimonopoly laws against health providers and insurers, and a limit on malpractice suits.

Hubbard briefed congressional leaders on the proposals last week, and according to congressional staff members, has been asked by the White House to begin a nationwide speaking tour aimed at drumming up public support for the measures.

In recent interviews and in a new book, "Healthy, Wealthy and Wise," the economists portrayed their ideas as modest first steps that would not drastically alter the current employer-based healthcare system in the next few years and would shave a comparatively small $60 billion from the nation's $1.9 trillion annual healthcare tab.

But the three also say that their proposals could eventually result in HSAs replacing the entire system, including Medicare and Medicaid. "There's no reason to have a separate Medicare and Medicaid arrangement if you had these souped-up HSAs," Hubbard said.

Many analysts believe that the two big government programs or something like them are needed because the elderly, poor and disabled who are covered by them have the most costly care — and, especially in the case of Medicaid, are the least able to afford it. Hubbard said such problems can be handled by government subsidies.

The measures are attracting criticism from a variety of political quarters even before Bush's formal embrace of them.

From the left, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) blasted administration calls for more tax breaks and additional deregulation, saying the president "continues to do the wrong thing on healthcare."

"On top of the Medicare mess, Bush's savings accounts are a tax giveaway to the wealthy and healthy that will drive costs up even further," Kennedy said.

From the moderate right, Douglas Holtz-Eakin, a former Bush economic advisor and Republican-appointed director of the Congressional Budget Office, described the idea of tax deductions for people's out-of-pocket medical expenditures as "really bad tax policy."

Holtz-Eakin, who is a fellow with the Council on Foreign Relations, warned that the deduction would tempt people to treat almost all of their spending as health-related and wreak havoc at the Internal Revenue Service.

"I could make an argument that my running shoes are a health expense," he said. "They're preventive medicine."

However, the problems that Bush would be likely to face in making the case for substantial healthcare change run far deeper than what kind of tax deductions people would claim.

Most conservatives — including those in the administration — believe that the root cause of most problems with the nation's healthcare system is that most Americans are over-insured.

They argue that insurance keeps people from feeling the sting of prices and therefore from being wise consumers. Hence, conservatives' interest in making individuals take more risk and bear more responsibility for healthcare, retirement savings and other social safety nets.

But a wide array of polls reveal that, if anything, people feel underinsured, and have little interest in adding to the financial risks they face.

"The average American isn't interested in having more of his or her skin in the game," said Robert D. Reischauer, president of the Urban Institute, a centrist Washington think tank. "They already think they are paying plenty for healthcare and bearing enough of the risk as it is."

The conservative critique of what's wrong with American healthcare may create a vexing problem for the president.

In the past, Bush has scored crucial political points with swing voters for tackling the nation's tough problems, even if they did not agree with him. This was true in the case of the dividend tax cut and has been especially true of the Iraq war.

It seems unlikely, however, that the president would be able to pull off a similar political maneuver with healthcare.

That is because many conservatives believe that the reason most Americans have too much employer-provided health insurance is that Washington lavishes too many tax breaks on companies to provide it. But instead of cutting back on the breaks offered employers, Bush proposes giving new breaks to individuals. In effect, he is leveling the tax playing field by raising the latter up, rather than cutting the former down.

In an era of giant federal budget deficits, offering one set of tax breaks to counteract another might prove a hard sell.

Cogan and Hubbard acknowledged the problem but argued that proposals such as theirs were the only ones that could win congressional passage.

"There's no question that the right answer is to repeal the tax exclusion for employer-provided health insurance," Hubbard said. "But there's no chance politically that that will happen."

Bush's Third Term (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, January 23, 2006

When visitors ask President Bush how he deals with pressure, he often points to a portrait of Abraham Lincoln gazing beatifically from a wall near his desk in the Oval Office. The painting, by artist George Henry Story, depicts a confident, serene Lincoln circa 1861, when the Union was embroiled in its struggle with the Confederacy. In tough times, Bush imagines what it was like to be commander in chief when the country was tearing itself apart, with brother killing brother and the survival of the United States at stake. Compared with that, Bush likes to say, he has it easy. What Bush admires about Lincoln, and tries to emulate, is the Great Emancipator's resolve and commitment to a cause--the fact that, as Bush told one guest, "he had such a clear vision about keeping this country united, in spite of the incredibly divisive times in which he lived."

Now Bush is trying to apply the lessons of Lincoln more seriously than ever as he embarks on what he hopes will be a fresh start for his presidency. Bush tells friends that despite the many setbacks of the past year, the country still wants him to provide strong leadership, and that's what he aims to do. But that also means being more realistic, Bush has concluded, so he is ready to trim his sails a bit.

"Last year we played big-ball politics, going for home runs," says a key Republican strategist. "This year will probably be drag bunts and singles." Adds a senior White House official: "We are a nation at war, and it's in this president's DNA to lay out a bold, aggressive vision and agenda--but we'll be realistic in what we ask the Congress to do during midterm elections." Some Bush strategists see 2006 as the start of Bush's "third term."They regard his first four years as a period of solid achievement that culminated in his re-election victory. They see 2005 as a "term" of its own, 12 months marked by disappointment. They hope '06 will start an upswing.

First off, White House strategists expect the Senate to easily confirm Samuel Alito for the Supreme Court in the next few weeks--a victory for Bush just when he needs one. But the real kickoff of 2006 will be the State of the Union address January 31. "The State of the Union will provide a good opportunity to focus on the president and his agenda," Republican National Chairman Ken Mehlman told U.S. News .

Bush will continue to argue that progress is being made against the insurgents in Iraq and that the domestic economy is strong. But Republican insiders say he will also emphasize a series of smaller proposals that they predict will find ready acceptance among voters. This replicates an approach that was successful for President Clinton, who regularly announced small-bore but popular initiatives, such as endorsing the use of school uniforms to enhance discipline and encouraging curfews for teenagers. The tactic helped Clinton stay connected to everyday Americans, which boosted his job-approval ratings even when other things went wrong.

The Bush Battle Plan (NSWK)

By Richard Wolffe And Holly Bailey

Newsweek, January 23, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0010113

For any White House aide, it should have been an easy crowd: a group of pro-Bush business lobbyists at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, a short walk from the West Wing. But when chief of staff Andy Card delivered a preview of the president's 2006 agenda earlier this month, the audience grew visibly listless. One checked his BlackBerry for e-mails, while another furtively read her copy of The Washington Post. Several yawned. Instead of concentrating on the issues his business friends care about—like taxes or trade—Card spent most of his time on a single topic. "The war on terror must be won in order to be able to have this sound economy that you're part of," he declared. His allies were unimpressed. "No one is naive enough to say that we shouldn't care about Iraq," said one GOP lobbyist, who declined to be named so as not to annoy the White House. "But there are other priorities that also deserve some tending to."

President George W. Bush hasn't forgotten his friends at the Chamber of Commerce, or their wish list of tax cuts and immigration reform. But after the worst year of his presidency—after a slump in support for his Iraq policy, the ravages of Hurricane Katrina and a wave of worry about corrupt lobbyists—Bush knows he needs something smart to offer the anxious GOP majority on Capitol Hill as its members head home to face the voters this fall. So he's shelved the ambitious domestic agenda he launched a year ago, and gone back to the mantra that's worked so well in the last two election cycles: it's the war, stupid. Karl Rove fired the first shots at the GOP's annual winter meeting last week, and Team Bush will take the strategy to the streets this week in Kansas and at the National Security Agency. The latter site will remind the public of the controversy over Bush's decision to eavesdrop on Americans without a warrant as he keeps an ear out for terrorist activity. But Bush's aides believe they can rebrand the domestic snooping program as "enemy surveillance" vital to protecting the country.

The well-worn plan is premised on the notion that three elections after 9/11, the Democrats still don't have an answer to that line of attack. "There's a national debate on what we're doing to protect the country," said one senior Bush aide, who declined to be named while talking about political strategy in advance of the State of the Union speech, slated for Jan. 31. "It's something we're very comfortable with, while the Democrats are dancing around it pretty gingerly." He's got a point. While some Democrats (like former veep Al Gore) have accused the White House of breaking the law, the party's congressional leaders have thus far merely demanded a full investigation into the program.

But will such a dog-eared playbook be sufficient? After a series of "listening" sessions with Hill allies last month, White House aides told members they wanted to do something "achievable" after last year's failure to overhaul Social Security and the tax code. In his State of the Union speech, Bush will return to his old idea of tax-free health savings accounts, hoping that will appeal to younger voters who can carry their savings from one job to another. And he'll tout the new Medicare prescription-drug benefits, urging seniors to stay the course despite early bureaucratic snafus that have left some without coverage. Tom Cole, a deputy House whip from Oklahoma who attended one meeting, told NEWSWEEK: "The real challenge for the administration in 2006 is to show follow-through, to show the American people that this government is competent and can get things done."

The biggest obstacle on that path may be the GOP's lobbying scandals. Bush called for "high standards for conduct of public officials" last week, and he's likely to talk broadly about reforming the federal budget in his State of the Union—including an attempt to limit pork-barrel spending. But the debate is complicated, his aides say, by a House GOP leadership contest between candidates with close ties of their own to lobbyists.

That may be one reason Andy Card shunned most of the agenda pushed by business lobbyists at the Chamber of Commerce. Instead, before he left, he described a poster of Uncle Sam hanging in the office of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld: "It says WE'RE AT WAR. WHAT ARE YOU DOING TO HELP?" Nobody expects the K Street crowd to swap their business suits for body armor. But Team Bush hopes they will re-enlist—and go once more unto the breach for their embattled commander in chief.

Hey, Big Spender ... (TIME)

By matthew cooper and mike allen

Time, January 23, 2006

The White House's RooseveltÂ Room is wired for PowerPoint presentations, and most officials also bring handouts when they brief George W. Bush and his inner circle. But Budget Director Josh Bolten, who has spent months walking the President through a problem that could dramatically affect his legacy, sticks to colorful charts on old-fashioned easels. The lights stay on, so nobody dozes off, and there's no paper to wander through. It's dense material, after all. "I keep everyone's attention focused on what I want them to focus on," Bolten said.

The President will need all the colorful charts he can muster. After five years of tax cuts and massive spending that brought back deficits and ensured that they will continue for years if not decades, Bush plans to use his State of the Union address on Jan. 31 to portray himself as, well, thrifty. He will talk about the need to rein in programs like Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security, and he'll tout the modest budget cuts that Congress passed at his request last year. His staff wants to make "restraining spending" a defining Bush characteristic, along with spreading democracy around the world and prosecuting the war on terrorism.

Why the change of heart? Bush has always shared the conservative aversion to big government programs, his aides insist. There are also short-term political points at stake. The Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal makes this an ideal time to go after what are known as earmarks--that is, spending placed in legislation, often without public review, for specific projects. That pork is a mainstay of the lobbying industry. And there is little money to spend anyway, so Bush might as well retool himself as a fearless budget cop. "Listen, we got a lot of people in Washington who preach fiscal discipline, and then they go on to vote against spending restraint," Bush told the Economic Club of Chicago just after New Year's.

But Bush himself has a huge credibility problem. The $236 billion Clinton surplus of 2000 has become a $400 billion annual deficit. Setting aside Social Security, about a quarter of what the government has spent since Bush became President has been borrowed. And estimates from the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office (CBO) show that if his tax cuts are made permanent--as he is advocating--deficits will persist for at least 10 years.

Even Bush's supporters criticize his lack of fiscal restraint. They look with dismay at figures showing that the federal workforce of about 2.7 million is roughly the same size it was at the beginning of President Bill Clinton's second term. And they point out that Bush has not vetoed a single bill since taking office. "It's hard to veto something from a Congress dominated by your own party," says Murray Weidenbaum, who was chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under President Ronald Reagan, "but Bush should have been tougher on the spending side. That's been a disappointment."

In Bush's defense, Bolten points to the economy the President inherited. "We ended up in our deficit situation because we had this burst bubble," he said during an interview in his office, which features a Norman Rockwell painting of a runaway train. "Revenues just disappeared, and this was well before the President's tax cuts." But when Bush came into office, the CBO was actually projecting surpluses for years to come, until the tax cuts hit and the deficit started growing. If the tax cuts don't expire, many economists say, the revenue gap will persist.

It's true that the President pushed through some tough budget cuts last year, notably the virtual elimination of popular programs like Clinton's community policing initiatives, which provided money to local government for nontraditional patrols. Bush's plans for 2007 will be slightly tougher still, and the prospect of those cuts has already led some Cabinet Secretaries to push back, hoping to preserve pet programs. A few Secretaries have tried to go behind Bolten's back to undo the potential damage. Instead of sticking to the White House's cumbersome appeals process, which involves meetings with officials of escalating rank, they pleaded for mercy when meeting with Bush on other issues. "The President consistently knocked back the end runs," Bolten recalled with relish. "He always outed them to me--usually, if possible, in their presence. He's willing to take some pretty tough political medicine to make the budget come out right, and he's spread that philosophy across the Cabinet, which is very helpful to me."

Administration officials said they expect the proposals for cuts and eliminations to be similar to those of last year, when Bush asked for $16 billion in savings in 154 programs and Congress wound up passing $6 billion in savings in 89 programs. Bolten said that he "started this conversation with the President toward the end of the summer" and that Bush began by calling for stable or increased funding for priorities like the military. "On the other things, every step along the way, he directed a tight budget," Bolten said. "Toward the middle of the process, I came to him with some areas where we were going to need to take some cuts in programs that are politically popular. In almost every instance, he said, 'Yes, go ahead and do it.' We had in the room the President's legislative, political and communications advisers, some of whom periodically disagreed. But in almost every case, he backed up my recommendation to take a hard line on some of the spending that was not at the top of the priority list."

DOJ_NMG_0010115

In his State of the Union speech, Bush is expected to propose no expensive new initiatives and focus instead on midsize ideas like promoting more rigorous education in basic math and science. But he will suggest changes that won't necessarily save the government money--like expanding Health Savings Accounts, which allow individuals to save for health care in tax-free, 401(k)-style accounts. And when you hear about Katrina and the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, don't assume their final cost figures will be spelled out in the budget Bush is sending to Congress six days after the address. Those will appear in so-called supplemental requests for money, adding further to the deficit.

Yet Bush hopes to earn his credentials as a fiscal disciplinarian when he talks about the long-term challenges posed by the exploding cost of entitlement programs, which together take up half the budget and are immune to White House or congressional tinkering. He wants to use his remaining years in office to persuade Congress to make transformational, money-saving changes in those programs, especially Medicare.

"We need to cut the rate of growth of those programs," Bolten said. No amount of tax increases or spending cuts in the regular budget would be enough to cover the looming costs of baby-boomer retirees, he said. "Medicare must be put on a path toward a more market-oriented system," Bolten said. "We're ultimately going to have to look at whether the system needs to be more means-tested," referring to differences in benefits depending on income.

Leon Panetta, a Democrat who was Budget Director under Clinton and is a former chairman of the House Budget Committee, chuckled when he heard about Bush's plan to project an image of restraint. "What the hell's he using for numbers to map that out?" Panetta asked over the phone from Seaside, Calif., where he runs the Panetta Institute, a nonpartisan center for the study of public policy. "He has put us in a deep hole that's going to be very tough to get out of."

The federal debt has risen from $5.7 trillion when Bush took office to more than $8 trillion today. According to the U.S. Comptroller General, there is already some $40 trillion in unfunded liabilities--promised payments that current revenue streams won't be able to cover--in the Medicare and Social Security systems. Of that, $8 trillion comes from Bush's prescription-drug plan alone--a figure that is equal to all the national debt that has been accumulating since the time of George Washington.

But Bush never promised the U.S. another Ronald Reagan. That President went to Washington declaring that government was the problem and vowing to do away with whole agencies. Bush pointedly never called for eliminating traditional conservative targets like the Department of Education. "Those efforts typically aren't successful, and they weren't at the core of animating this President's view of conservatism," Bolten said. Instead, Bush's "compassionate conservative" philosophy called for more limited but still robust government, including creating an office for faith-based initiatives and backing the No Child Left Behind law.

When Reagan and President George H.W. Bush saw their deficits spinning out of control, they both raised taxes. But this President has adamantly refused to rescind any of his tax cuts. He wants to make permanent many cuts that are due to expire--such as the estate tax and the 15% rate on capital gains.

Democrats and many economists feel that that's a guarantee of more deficits. But Bush insists that failure to extend tax cuts--which he calls a tax increase--won't cure the deficit because it will slow down a fragile economy. "In my judgment," Bush told a crowd of business people at a moving-van lot in northern Virginia last week, "the best way to solve the deficit is to grow the economy--not run up your taxes." But the reality is that with the help of his tax cuts, Bush has already piled on more than a trillion dollars to the national debt.

Prodded by congressional Republicans, Clinton gave the nation diminishing deficits and even a surplus. That allowed Bush, then the Texas Governor, to call for deep tax cuts, with the signature campaign line that "it's the people's money." But he knew the danger. Announcing his tax-cutting plan to the Greater Des Moines Chamber of Commerce in 1999, he warned, "What is risky is when politicians are given charge of a surplus." When George Met Jack (TIME)

By adam zagorin

Time, January 23, 2006

As details poured out aboutÂ the illegal and unseemly activities of Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, White House officials sought to portray the scandal as a Capitol Hill affair with little relevance to them. Peppered for days with questions about Abramoff's visits to the White House, press secretary Scott McClellan said the now disgraced lobbyist had attended two huge holiday receptions and a few "staff-level meetings" that were not worth describing further. "The President does not know him, nor does the President recall ever meeting him," McClellan said.

The President's memory may soon be unhappily refreshed. TIME has seen five photographs of Abramoff and the President that suggest a level of contact between them that Bush's aides have downplayed. While TIME's source refused to provide the pictures for publication, they are likely to see the light of day eventually because celebrity tabloids are on the prowl for them. And that has been a fear of the Bush team's for the past several months: that a picture of the President with the admitted felon could become the iconic image of direct presidential involvement in a burgeoning corruption scandal like the shots of President Bill Clinton at White House coffees for campaign contributors in the mid-1990s.

In one shot that TIME saw, Bush appears with Abramoff, several unidentified people and Raul Garza Sr., a Texan Abramoff represented who was then chairman of the Kickapoo Indians, which owned a casino in southern Texas. Garza, who is wearing jeans and a bolo tie in the picture, told TIME that Bush greeted him as "Jefe," or "chief" in Spanish. Another photo shows Bush shaking hands with Abramoff in front of a window and a blue drape. The shot bears Bush's signature, perhaps made by a machine. Three other photos are of Bush, Abramoff and, in each view, one of the lobbyist's sons (three of his five children are boys). A sixth picture shows several Abramoff children with Bush and House Speaker Dennis Hastert, who is now pushing to tighten lobbying laws after declining to do so last year when the scandal was in its early stages.

Most of the pictures have the formal look of photos taken at presidential receptions. The images of Bush, Abramoff and one of his sons appear to be the rapid-fire shots--known in White House parlance as clicks-- that the President snaps with top supporters before taking the podium at fund-raising receptions. Over five years, Bush has posed for tens of thousands of such shots--many with people he does not know. Last month 9,500 people attended holiday receptions at the White House, and most went two by two through a line for a photo with the President and the First Lady. The White House is generous about providing copies--in some cases, signed by the President--that become centerpieces for "walls of fame" throughout status-conscious Washington.

Abramoff knew the game. In a 2001 e-mail to a lawyer for tribal leader Lovelin Poncho, he crows about an upcoming meeting at the White House that he had arranged for Poncho and says it should be a priceless asset in his client's upcoming re-election campaign as chief of Louisiana's Coushatta Indians. "By all means mention [in the tribal newsletter] that the Chief is being asked to confer with the President and is coming to Washington for this purpose in May," Abramoff writes. "We'll definitely have a photo from the opportunity, which he can use." The lawyer had asked about attire, and Abramoff advises, "As to dress, probably suit and tie would work best."

The e-mail, now part of a wide-ranging federal investigation into lobbying practices and lobbyists' relationships with members of Congress, offers a window into Abramoff's willingness to trade on ties to the White House and to invoke Bush's name to impress clients who were spending tens of millions of dollars on Abramoff's advice.

Abramoff was once in better graces at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, having raised at least $100,000 for the President's re-election campaign. During 2001 and 2002, his support for Republicans and connections to the White House won him invitations to Hanukkah receptions, each attended by 400 to 500 people. McClellan has said Abramoff may have been present at "other widely attended" events. He was also admitted to the White House complex for meetings with several staff members, including one with presidential senior adviser Karl Rove, one of the most coveted invitations in Washington.

Michael Scanlon, who is Abramoff's former partner and has pleaded guilty to conspiring to bribe a Congressman, in 2001 told the New Times of Fort Lauderdale, Fla., that Abramoff had "a relationship" with the President. "He doesn't have a bat phone or anything, but if he wanted an appointment, he would have one," Scanlon said. Nonsense, say others. A former White House official familiar with some Abramoff requests to the White House said Abramoff had some meetings with Administration officials in 2001 and 2002, but he was later frozen out because aides became suspicious of his funding sources and annoyed that the issues he raised did not mesh with their agenda. A top Republican official said it was clear to him that Abramoff couldn't pick up the phone and reach Bush aides because Abramoff had asked the official to serve as an intermediary.

The White House describes the number of Abramoff's meetings with staff members only as "a few," even though senior Bush aides have precise data about them. McClellan will not give details, saying he doesn't "get into discussing staff-level meetings." During a televised briefing, he added, "We're not going to engage in a fishing expedition." Pressed for particulars about Abramoff's White House contacts, McClellan said with brio, "People are insinuating things based on no evidence whatsoever." But he said he cannot "say with absolute certainty that [Abramoff] did not have any other visits" apart from those disclosed. Another White House official said, "The decision was made don't put out any additional information." That reticence has been eagerly seized upon by some Democrats. Senate minority leader Harry Reid of Nevada wrote to Bush last week to demand details, saying Abramoff "may have had undue and improper influence within your Administration."

Garza, the bolo-wearing former chairman of the Kickapoo Traditional Tribe of Texas, has fond memories of his session with Bush, which he said was held in 2001 in the Eisenhower Executive Office Building, next to the White House. According to e-mails in the hands of investigators, the meeting was arranged with the help of Abramoff and Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform. In an April 18, 2001, e-mail to Abramoff, Norquist wrote that he would be "honored" if Abramoff "could come to the White House meeting."

Garza--known in his native Kickapoo language as Makateonenodua, or black buffalo--is under federal indictment for allegedly embezzling more than $300,000 from his tribe. Through his spokesman, Garza said that during the session, Bush talked about policy matters and thanked those present for supporting his agenda, then took questions from the audience of about two dozen people. Garza told TIME, "We were very happy that Jack Abramoff helped us to be with the President. Bush was in a very good mood--very upbeat and positive." No evidence has emerged that the Bush Administration has done anything for the Kickapoo at Abramoff's behest.

Three attendees who spoke to TIME recall that Abramoff was present, and three of them say that's where the picture of Bush, Abramoff and the former Kickapoo chairman was taken. The White House has a different description of the event Garza attended. "The President stopped by a meeting with 21 state legislators and two tribal leaders," spokeswoman Erin Healy said. "Available records show that Mr. Abramoff was not in attendance."

TIME Magazine Says Bush Photographed With Abramoff (REU-Y2)

Reuters, January 23, 2006

At least five photos show U.S. President George W. Bush with the lobbyist at the center of a corruption scandal, TIME magazine reported on Sunday.

The White House has tried to play down any contact with Jack Abramoff, who pleaded guilty to fraud charges this month and agreed to help prosecutors in a congressional corruption investigation.

TIME did not publish the photographs, saying its source refused to provide them for publication. Most look like those taken at presidential receptions, it said.

The White House has said Bush does not know Abramoff and does not recall meeting him, and that the lobbyist attended two Hannukah receptions and a few staff-level meetings at the White House.

"Mr. Abramoff admitted being involved in outrageous wrongdoing," White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said on Sunday.

"The president does not recall meeting him. We have previously indicated, however, it would not be surprising if the president met him at some of the widely attended events we know they both attended," she said. "The president has taken tens upon thousands of pictures at such events."

TIME said in one photograph Bush appears with Abramoff and Raul Garza, then chairman of the Kickapoo Indians, which owned a casino in Texas and were represented by the lobbyist. It also included several other unidentified people.

TIME quotes White House spokeswoman Erin Healy as saying that available records show Abramoff was not at the event attended by Garza.

Another photo shows Bush shaking hands with Abramoff in front of a window and a blue drape, the magazine said. The photo carries Bush's signature, which may have been machine-made, it said.

Three other photos show Bush, Abramoff and one of the lobbyist's sons, the magazine said.

Prosecutors are investigating whether members of Congress gave the lobbyist and his clients favorable treatment in return for campaign contributions or gifts. The scandal broke as Republicans try to retain control of Congress in mid-term elections in November.

DOJ_NMG_0010118

Republican Rep. Bob Ney (news, bio, voting record) of Ohio, who has denied wrongdoing, is under investigation in the scandal. Rep. Tom DeLay, a Texas Republican who stepped down as majority leader, has been under a cloud due to his association with Abramoff.

The Republican National Committee has said Bush's re-election campaign was giving to charity $6,000 in contributions linked to Abramoff.

Reports: Bush, Abramoff Together In Photos (AP)

AP, January 23, 2006

Although President Bush says he doesn't recall meeting convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, the two have reportedly turned up in photos together.

Both Washingtonian and Time magazines have reported the existence of about a half-dozen photos showing the two together.

Time reported on its Web site Sunday that its staff members have seen at least six photos featuring Bush and Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to federal charges stemming from his lobbying practices and has pledged to cooperate with investigators. They appeared to have been taken at White House functions, according to the reports.

The White House has acknowledged that Abramoff attended some events at the Executive Mansion, and spokeswoman Dana Perino said Sunday it's not surprising that the two would have met.

"The president has taken tens upon thousands of pictures at such events," Perino said.

Abramoff met a few times with White House staff and attended Hanukkah receptions in 2001 and 2002, the White House has said, but officials there have refused to disclose how many times he's been into the complex or what business he had there.

The White House also has not released any photos featuring the president and Abramoff, who was declared a Bush "pioneer" for raising at least $100,000 for the Bush-Cheney '04 re-election campaign.

Contributions that came directly from Abramoff, his wife and one of the American Indian tribes he represented — a total of $6,000 — were donated to the American Heart Association by the campaign just days after Abramoff entered his guilty pleas.

The White House, after playing down the Bush-Abramoff photos and the lobbyist's ties to the president, criticized Abramoff for breaking the law. "Mr. Abramoff admitted being involved in outrageous wrongdoing," Perino said.

Bush, Lobbyist Abramoff Appear In 5 Photos, Time Says (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Bob Willis

Bloomberg, January 23, 2006

Jan. 22 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush was photographed at least five times with Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who is at the center of a federal corruption probe, Time magazine reported.

One photograph shows Bush, Abramoff and Raul Garza Sr., who was then chairman of the Kickapoo Indian tribe, an Abramoff client who is under indictment for allegedly embezzling more than $300,000 from his tribe, Time reported. Another photo bears Bush's signature and shows the president shaking hands with Abramoff. Three others are of Bush, Abramoff and one of the lobbyist's three sons.

None of the photographs were released for publication, Time said. The magazine said its reporters viewed them. Time did not say who provided the images, which the magazine reported appear to have been taken at presidential receptions.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino didn't immediately respond to a request for comment. Administration spokesman Scott McClellan said last week that Abramoff attended White House Hanukkah receptions in 2001 and 2002 and ``a few staff-level meetings." McClellan refused to say who Abramoff met with or what the meetings were about.

``We're not going to engage in some sort of fishing expedition," McClellan said Jan. 19. He said previously that Bush doesn't recall meeting Abramoff.

Abramoff, 46, pleaded guilty Jan. 3 to conspiracy to corrupt public officials and has agreed to cooperate in a federal investigation into influence peddling in Washington.

Fund Raising

Abramoff raised at least $100,000 for Bush's 2004 campaign, qualifying him for the ``Pioneer'' donor club. The Republican National Committee said after Abramoff's guilty plea that the campaign donated to charity $6,000 of funds directly linked to the lobbyist, representing three $2,000 contributions made by Abramoff, his wife and the Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe he represented.

According to Time, Garza's meeting with Bush took place in 2001 in the Eisenhower Executive Office Building, next to the White House. Garza said the session was arranged with the help of Abramoff and Grover Norquist, a Republican activist, the magazine reported.

Garza's tribe owned a casino in Bush's home state of Texas, and there is no indication the administration acted to benefit the Kickapoo tribe at Abramoff's behest, Time said.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid last week called on the administration to give details about any meetings White House officials had with Abramoff. In Congress, the Abramoff investigation has ensnared former top aides to ex-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, who is under indictment in Texas for alleged campaign-finance violations in a separate case. Representative Bob Ney, an Ohio Republican, said Jan. 16 he would step aside as chairman of the House Administration Committee because of allegations he received gifts from Abramoff.

Are We Capable Of Crafting A 'Pax Americana'? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2006

In regard to George Melloan's Jan. 17 Global View "Getting Serious About Iran" and "Russia Must Be Strong" by Sergei Invanov, deputy prime minister and minister of defense of the Russian Federation (editorial page, Jan. 11):

I agree with Mr. Melloan's conclusion that we must be prepared, both politically and militarily, to deal with the serious threat to regional and global stability that an unchecked Iran poses. The threat will increase to "critical mass" within a few years if immediate and resolute action is not taken now and we may, again, have to go it alone.

Russia and China are the unknowns in the current response equation. Iran's threat to disrupt its oil production should any sanctions be implemented by the U.N. Security Council has its greatest impact on Russia and China by virtue of their technology and energy contracts, although it is significant for the rest of the world also. I don't believe we can count on either nation to support direct intervention, even if it is multilateral. An abstention from them on the issue before the Security Council would be the best result we could hope for.

Mr. Ivanov makes a very convincing statement that Russia will continue its own threat assessment and preparation for defense. Without specifically mentioning Russia's specific theater of concern (Chechnya), Mr. Ivanov confirms Russia's intent to hegemony in its own backyard. Can this be read as a warning to the West to keep our noses out? He mentions "pre-emption" of emerging threats. Do the Russians acknowledge the rapidly emerging threat Iran represents and are they willing to allow or to participate in pre-emption? Or do they perhaps have a "commitment" they must honor? Iran must not become a member of the nuclear club for the foreseeable future if we are to have any hope of realizing a more peaceful and prosperous Middle East. The fledgling democracy in Iraq and sputtering progress in Israel and Palestine depend on it.

Should Iran's production go off-line, would, or could, other regional oil producing states increase production to ameliorate the serious impact on oil prices that would follow? This will really show us who our friends are.

Are we capable of crafting a Pax Americana? The world is very close to the edge and I believe we are the only ones capable -- with that capability comes the duty to exercise it for the good.

Our Tribe Was a Victim, Not a Client, of Abramoff

In a Jan. 5 editorial-page commentary -- "The Least Transparent Industry in America" -- Fergus Bordewich identified the Alabama-Coushatta Tribe of Texas as a client of Jack Abramoff. Our tribe was never a client of Mr. Abramoff; we've had absolutely no relationship with him, other than being a victim of his unethical actions.

On behalf of one of his clients, Mr. Abramoff worked to prevent our tribe from securing the rights to seek economic opportunities afforded federally recognized tribes under the Indian Gaming Regulatory Act (IGRA). Moreover, he directed another of his tribal clients to request that our tribe make a $50,000 donation to the Capital Athletic Foundation. Members of that tribe have admitted that they misrepresented what the donation was for, telling us that it was to support a congressional fact-finding mission and never mentioning Mr. Abramoff. We now know that Mr. Abramoff used our donation to pay for his trip to Scotland with Rep. Bob Ney.

Mr. Bordewich also wrote that there must be more transparency and accountability in Indian gaming. We agree. In fact, we support Sen. John McCain's effort to amend the Indian Gaming Regulatory Act to require more transparency and accountability. Unfortunately, the Alabama-Coushatta, along with a handful of other federally recognized tribes, are not covered by IGRA. It was the very fact that we were not covered by IGRA that allowed Mr. Abramoff to victimize our tribe. To make Indian gaming more transparent and accountable, Congress must also require that all federally recognized tribes fall under the purview of IGRA.

Mr. Abramoff's manipulation created difficult circumstances for our tribe, but throughout we have adhered to our tribal values, our honesty and our integrity. We hope Congress will act to make sure that in the future all tribes are afforded the protections of IGRA.

In Italy, We're Preparing for the Best Games Ever

Quentin Letts, in his Jan. 13 editorial-page piece "Never Say Neve Again," has some fun ridiculing the Torino 2006 Winter Olympics, and I certainly don't want to deprive him of his laughs. But I would like to point out that on a number of points the picture he paints is a far cry from reality.

Torino 2006 will involve 2,500 athletes from 85 countries performing before a world-wide audience of up to four billion people. Italy is excited about hosting an event of this kind -- witness the 40,000 Italians who have applied to volunteer at the games.

The games will be a showcase of sporting excellence, and although perhaps not sharing the limelight in England of soccer or cricket, winter sports such as slalom, ice hockey and ski jumping are of great significance to many nations, such as Canada, Austria and Japan, and are enjoyed by people of many nations.

The Olympic Games will also bring many social and economic benefits to Italy. Contrary to what Mr. Letts suggests, we are operating within our approved budget of $1.1 billion, which, together with public investments, is expected to generate added value of $17.4 billion to the Italian economy and boost our GDP by 0.2%.

We are also on track with our ticket sales, having reached 81% of budgeted sales. Many more tickets are expected to be sold over the coming six weeks -- Italians are famous for their spontaneity, and as event organizers we have always expected strong domestic sales close to games time.

In addition, all 14 Olympic competition venues have been tested -- some twice -- and we are looking forward to hosting the best Winter Games ever. If we accomplish this, perhaps even Mr. Letts will be persuaded to join the other four billion viewers (or even make an actual visit).

Quentin Letts's snide, condescending views on the Winter Olympics are, quite frankly, appalling. He only exposes his ignorance of true sportsmanship and proves that he is not a sportsman at all, just an irritant.

A Desperate Ploy

Mary Anastasia O'Grady's Jan. 20 Americas column "Ottawa's Ruling Liberals May Suffer Frostbite" was generally on the mark, but it may lead your readers to believe anti-Americanism is playing a much bigger role in the campaign than is actually the case. It's true the Liberal Party is attempting to raise doubts about the fitness of the Conservative candidate Stephen Harper to be prime minister by linking him to what they characterize as right-wing American think tanks. But many voters view this simply as a desperate ploy on the part of a governing party that feels its grip on power slipping away.

The most important issues at play in this election are domestic ones, such as the perennial challenge of ensuring that all regions in Canada are properly represented in national political life. Your readers would likely be surprised at just how little attention has been focused on foreign relations, including the issue of Canada's relations with the U.S.

Do the Right Thing

In many situations, it is difficult to determine what is right and what is wrong. In the case raised in your article "Retired Black Cops Pressure Georgia for Pension Equity" (page one, Jan. 16), there should be no such difficulty. The state of Georgia should immediately act to fund the claims of those black police officers wrongfully excluded from the retirement plan, even though the exclusions occurred years ago. To accept the usual "glacial pace" for righting this wrong would be deplorable. Some things are right. And they should be acted on promptly.

Cutting The Corruption (WP)

By Arthur Levitt Jr.

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

Having served in Washington for eight years, I can't say that the current scandal surrounding lobbyist Jack Abramoff and various members of Congress comes as any great surprise.

During my tenure as chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, I worked with many decent, well-intentioned representatives and senators. Yet on issue after issue, it was clear that the interlocking systems of campaign finance, lobbying and policymaking were breaking down. Indeed, because many of the issues before the SEC were far from the front of the public's mind, the influence of high-priced lobbyists on the system was easy to detect and especially brazen.

From battles over auditing reforms to the expensing of stock options, the concerns of ordinary investors often were subsumed to the interests of industry lobbyists by Republicans and Democrats alike. Every day the SEC would receive letters from lawmakers opposing some proposed regulatory change -- letters that eerily mimicked the rhetoric of one industry trade group or another. In addition to making thousands of dollars in campaign donations, companies would concoct phony "grass-roots" coalitions -- usually made up of executives and compliant employees -- to rally for the cause and pressure lawmakers.

And when all else failed, lobbyists would cash in their chits with members of relevant House and Senate committees to threaten the SEC -- an independent regulatory agency -- with budget cuts to get what they wanted. Regrettably, I occasionally found myself succumbing to this immense pressure in order to save the commission. Many of the reforms that were thwarted in this way could have saved investors some of the pain from the scandals of the past five years.

Now removed from Washington and viewing its problems from the perspective of the private sector, I've come to think that our federal government is plagued by some of the same problems that have been hurting corporate America, primarily a lack of transparency, accountability and independence. As with many of the disgraced corporations of the past few years -- Adelphia, Tyco and WorldCom, for example -- so it is with Congress: Conflicts of interest abound, oversight has been myopic and those given the public's trust have used it to enrich themselves.

The debate about how to clean up Congress has just begun, and undoubtedly it will consume much of that body's time during this election year. But lawmakers need not look far for an example of how to reform themselves. Just as Congress passed the Sarbanes-Oxley Act in 2002 to clean up American industry, it should pass similar legislation to clean up American government.

One of the emphases of Sarbanes-Oxley was improving the disclosure regime in corporate America. New rules expanded what critical information was disclosed and how often, and they required the CEO and chief financial officer to attest to the accuracy of their company's financial reports. As a result, it is possible to know more about the performance of an executive of a company in which you own stock than about your member of Congress.

To remedy that, congressional lobbyists should be required to disclose weekly, online, which members of Congress they contributed to and met with, which staff members they lobbied, and what issues were discussed. Lobbyists also should have to affix their signature to these disclosures and, like CEOs who sign false financial statements, face serious criminal penalties if the disclosures are not accurate.

But disclosure is only part of the solution; independence is also critical. That's why auditing firms are now forbidden from providing non-audit services to auditing clients, why companies can no longer give personal loans to executives or directors, and why a majority of a board of directors must be independent of the company itself. In Washington, any number of conflicts of interest between members of Congress, their staffs, lobbyists and contributors must be untangled. To begin to do this, former members of Congress should be prohibited from visiting the floor of the House, the prohibition on lobbying by former members and their staffs should be extended from one year to four, and all gifts and travel for members and their employees should be banned.

Finally, accountability must be restored. Currently, Congress's ethics committees resemble some of the worst corporate boards from the mid-1990s -- appointed by management and wholly dependent on it for career advancement. Just as corporate boards have been strengthened by rules establishing independent audit committees, Congress would be well-served by scrapping its current ethics committees and replacing them with an independent ethics commission made up of former judges, former members of Congress and other eminent citizens.

Moreover, as with good corporate governance, there needs to be more democracy in American governance. Partisan gerrymandering has created a Congress in which more than 95 percent of the members are assured of keeping their seats for life. Just as shareholders must have access to the proxy to hold corporate board members accountable, citizens must be confident that when they go into the voting booth their votes will be meaningful. It's time to explore ways to lower the barriers of entry for challengers -- through, for instance, free television airtime for all candidates. And to create more competitive congressional districts, we need to follow the leads of states such as Arizona and Iowa and put the responsibility of drawing district boundaries in the hands of nonpartisan boards.

But ultimately, no rule or regulation can transform an organization on its own. What's needed is a cultural change in which those who do the bidding of lobbyists, cash in their positions on Capitol Hill for huge paychecks and accept gifts are scorned, not praised. Accomplishing that requires real leadership, and that's something that only we -- as citizens and voters -- can give to ourselves.

McCain: Reform Efforts Don't Address Core (AP-Y2)

AP2, January 23, 2006

Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record) said efforts by both Democrats and Republicans to reduce the influence of lobbyists are not addressing the core of the problem.

Appearing on "Fox News Sunday," the Arizona Republican renewed his criticism of "earmarks," late additions to bills that often provide millions of dollars for lawmakers' pet projects.

"If we don't fix the earmarking, then I can assure you the corruption will go on," McCain said.

He described an "earmark" as "a single provision in a line that nobody's ever seen or heard of, and most times we don't find out until days or weeks afterwards

"Then you've got a process that breeds corruption," he said. "And it makes good people do bad things."

McCain said lobbying reform promoted last week by both parties doesn't deal with earmarking because many politicians perceive it to be "their bread and butter and preserves their incumbency."

Corruption that stems from lobbying is a bipartisan problem, McCain said. "I think it's a bipartisan scandal because the lobbying is out of control," McCain said.

DOJ_NMG_0010123

Sen. John Kerry called the corruption surrounding convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff a GOP scandal. The Massachusetts Democrat pointed to the party that dominates Washington politics.

"They run the House of Representatives. They run the Senate. They have the White House. They're controlling who goes on the judiciary," Kerry, the Democrats' nominee for president in 2004, said on ABC's "This Week."

"They have not done the things necessary in order to press forward on this," Kerry said.

McCain Speaks Out Against 'earmarks' (USAT)

USA Today, January 23, 2006

Lobbying "is out of control," and efforts to curb it don't address the core problem of "earmarking," Sen. John McCain told Fox News Sunday. McCain, R-Ariz., described an earmark as a "pork barrel project" funded "in the middle of the night" by a single provision "that nobody's ever seen or heard of" inserted in a bill about to be passed. "Then you've got a process that breeds corruption. And it makes good people do bad things," McCain said. He said lobbying changes promoted last week don't deal with earmarking because many politicians perceive it to be "their bread and butter, and (it) preserves their incumbency."

McCain said it was a bipartisan problem, but Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said it is a Republican scandal because the GOP controls Congress and the White House. Republicans "have not done the things necessary in order to press forward on this," Kerry said on ABC's This Week.

'Time': Bush in photos with Abramoff

Although President Bush says he doesn't recall meeting convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Time magazine reported that its staff members have seen five photos of the two apparently taken at White House functions.

The White House has not released photos of the president and Abramoff but has said the lobbyist met a few times with White House staff and attended Hanukkah receptions in 2001 and 2002. Spokeswoman Dana Perino said it's not surprising that the two would have met.

"The president has taken tens upon thousands of pictures at such events," Perino said.

Abramoff was a Bush-Cheney 2004 campaign fundraiser at the "Pioneer" level of at least $100,000. He pleaded guilty Jan. 3 to federal charges stemming from his lobbying practices and has agreed to cooperate with investigators.

'72 Nixon challenger enters Calif. race

Former congressman Paul "Pete" McCloskey said he will challenge Rep. Richard Pombo for the Republican nomination in his Northern California district. McCloskey, 78, challenged President Nixon for renomination in 1972 on an anti-Vietnam War platform. McCloskey said he's getting back into politics because of his concern for the environment and what he sees as a shift away from traditional Republican values in Washington. "Winning isn't the issue. The issue is forcing a debate on which way the Republican Party goes," McCloskey said.

Wayne Johnson, a spokesman for Pombo, said McCloskey is "a stalking horse for the Democratic Party" and has no chance of winning.

The Republican and Democratic versions of lobbyist reform trotted out last week had very different styles. The austere Republican presentation professed desire for bipartisanship. The gaudy Democratic show equated the GOP with original sin. But each fell short of what is called for by the reformer most widely respected by the public, Sen. John McCain.

"I'm very disappointed," McCain told me, "to see the Democrats trying to turn this issue into attacking Republicans." He was no less upset with open avowal by House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert and the House Republican establishment of earmarking funds that McCain considers the seedbed of lobbyist corruption. The Democrats, in their anti-Republican light show, ignored earmarks.

A reform of a system that has grown ever more rotten must have two salient characteristics, in McCain's view. It must be bipartisan, and it must eviscerate, if not eliminate, earmarks. McCain exerts extraordinary influence for a politician without a formal leadership role or a government office, but the magnitude of his task is awesome. He must persuade Democrats to cooperate with Republicans when they now see an opportunity to crush the GOP, and he must wean his own party from its addiction to government pork.

Rep. David Dreier, chairman of the House Rules Committee, discovered the difficulty of McCain's first task two weeks ago when Hastert assigned Dreier to come up with a lobbying reform package. Initially, he approached the ranking Democrat on the Rules Committee, Rep. Louise Slaughter, who, like many House Democrats, has grown acerbic as the party enters its 12th year in the minority. She responded to Dreier's appeal for bipartisanship with cold shoulder and hot tongue.

Dreier next went to House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer, who is viewed by Republicans as the ablest Democrat in the House but one with whom they can do business. Dreier first got the impression Hoyer might cooperate on lobbyist reform. But when that word leaked out, Dreier found Hoyer totally uninterested. "This is not a problem of rules," Hoyer told me he informed Dreier. "It's a problem of conduct, Republican conduct." If so, I suggested, the only solution is a return to Democratic control of Congress, and Hoyer said I got that right.

In Dreier's joint press conference with Hastert last Tuesday, he cited reform-minded Democratic Rep. Martin Meehan as his bipartisan partner. When I called Meehan, he conceded he was flying solo and did not seem too comfortable about it. But when I mentioned that Hastert and Dreier advocated reforming the so-called "527" loophole in campaign reform that permits mainly Democratic non-transparent funding, Meehan brightened. "That's a poison pill," he told me, meaning he could be off the bipartisan hook.

Hastert looked morose talking about lobbyist reform last Tuesday, but enthusiastic Democrats lined up at the Library of Congress the next day were reminiscent of the Newt Gingrich Republicans on the steps of the Capitol in 1994. Democrats finally see a route back to power.

Democrats did not mention earmarks, since even in their minority status they get 45 percent of the pork. Hastert was defiant in defending earmarks: "Quite frankly, we also have to observe the rights of [House] members to represent their districts and to be active in favor of things that they think will help."

Earmarking is the main issue separating three candidates for House majority leader in the Feb. 2 election by the Republican Conference. John Boehner and John Shadegg oppose them. Acting Majority Leader Roy Blunt, the front-runner, supports earmarks but says each should be identified with the sponsoring member of Congress. Actually, that's the way the system works now, with lawmakers, including Blunt, rushing out news releases to advertise what they have done for their district.

Annual earmarks, nonexistent two decades ago, now near 15,000. McCain sees this as the source of lobbyist corruption, the vehicle used to bribe Duke Cunningham and the focus for half of the capital's lobbyists. Both parties are united in silly changes like keeping former congressmen off the House floor and further curtailing how much a lobbyist can spend on a lawmaker's lunch. Will they unite to get rid of the scourge of earmarks?

Politics: No Longer Lying Low, 'Rove Is In The House!' (NSWK)

By Holly Bailey

Newsweek, January 23, 2006

The Republican National Committee organized a forum for conservative bloggers earlier this month, telling attendees they'd be briefed by RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman and other party operatives on the 2006 political outlook. But a surprise guest arrived. "Karl Rove is in the house!!!" wrote Matt Margolis, who was live-blogging the event for his site, Blogs for Bush. While Rove implored the group to keep the substance of his remarks off the record, some bloggers posted photos and snippets of their talk with the president's top political adviser, which included a discussion on the politics of the war and the upcoming midterm elections. Rove told the group that he regularly reads their blogs and spent more than a half hour answering questions. "I think we all found ourselves a little surprised to have received that kind of attention," Ed Morrissey, who wrote about Rove on his blog, Captain's Quarters, told NEWSWEEK. "I think he was taking our temperature a bit, which I found interesting."

After months of staying out of the limelight amid scrutiny in the CIA leak investigation, Rove is back and circulating, as Bush and the GOP prepare for battle on the eve of the 2006 midterm elections. He's traveling on domestic swings with Bush and taking high-profile trips of his own. On Jan. 12, Rove was roasted by the Austin Headliners Club, where he faced friendly jabs from a bipartisan panel. In his roast, Democrat Lowell Lebermann cited parallels between the Monica Lewinsky scandal and the Valerie

Plame case: "They involved two pudgy people in the White House who couldn't keep their mouth shut." Rove, who sat center stage, blushed and laughed. Last Friday, Rove delivered a lunchtime address before several hundred RNC members, defending the president's eavesdropping program and blasting Dems critical of the war on terror. Yet Rove, who is still under scrutiny in the Plame leak, didn't stick around for the lengthy standing ovation he received. Within seconds of concluding the speech, Rove had dashed offstage and out a side entrance, avoiding a group of protesters dressed as plumbers to signify the ongoing leak investigation.

Lobbyists Help Fund Ripon Society Travel (WP)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

Since 1964, the Ripon Society has tried to create a more inclusive GOP through "moderate, progressive policy formation," according to its official mission statement.

In recent years, however, a leading public watchdog group suggests, the Ripon Society has added an unofficial mission: travel agency to lobbyists.

Under president Richard S. Kessler, himself a prominent Washington lobbyist, people who represent corporate interests before Congress have "spent millions taking lawmakers to European capitals and U.S. resorts" under the auspices of the Ripon Society and the affiliated Ripon Educational Fund, the group Public Citizen charged in a new report.

The lure for the lobbyists who fund them is that they also take the trips, and gain "unbridled access" to influential lawmakers, said Frank Clemente, director of Public Citizen's Congress Watch.

The practice is a way of "skirting congressional ethics rules that forbid lobbyists from paying for congressional travel," the report charges.

The activities the report detailed are not illegal, but ethics specialists say they do highlight the difficulty of proscribing certain common Washington practices, if lobbyists and lawmakers are determined to continue them.

Kessler declined to comment on the report but authorized former representative Bill Frenzel (R-Minn.), who has been active in the Ripon Society, to speak on his behalf. He said, "We did what everybody else did," including getting legal counsel to approve all spending decisions, and obtaining letters of approval from the ethics committees of the House and Senate approving the trips.

In addition to his Ripon Society role, Kessler is president of Kessler & Associates. Among its clients, according to the most recent disclosure forms, are Pfizer Inc. and three other major drug companies; Altria Group Inc., the corporate parent of cigarette maker Philip Morris USA; and railroad giant Burlington Northern Santa Fe Corp. Until the start of 2003, he served as finance chairman of the Ripon Education Fund. At the end of 2002, Frenzel said the society and the education fund became two organizations, and he and Kessler left the education fund board.

The Ripon Society has three levels of membership for corporate supporters: founder for $12,500, millennium club for $25,000 and chairman's club for $35,000.

According to Public Citizen, members of Congress have gone on trips costing the Ripon Society and Ripon Education Fund $742,000 since 2000. In addition, Kessler's clients have provided another $273,000 for congressional travel.

During 2003 and 2004, the 19 board members of the two Ripon organizations included 17 registered lobbyists. Ten of those were people who lobby for Kessler clients.

The Ripon Education Fund has provided members of Congress trips to conferences held in a number of European capitals, including London in 2003 and Budapest in 2004.

These trips have drawn notice before. On the August 2003 trip to London, the Education Fund picked up the tab for 20 members of Congress, including Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, and Rep. Michael G. Oxley (R-Ohio), chairman of the House Financial Services Committee. The elected officials were accompanied by more than 100 lobbyists, The Washington Post reported at the time. These included representatives of American Express, Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. and General Motors Corp.

The lobbyists paid their own way, as well as a $9,500 corporate sponsor fee.

DOJ_NMG_0010126

Ripon Society Chief Administrative Officer George McNeill said the organization has held three domestic conferences this year and last, in Key Biscayne, Palm Beach and Dallas. He said he could not estimate the number of lobbyists who attended, paying their own way. The society pays the costs for elected officials and congressional staff, and for academics and other experts addressing the conferences, McNeill said.

McNeill adamantly defended the conferences. "We are not skirting any ethics rules," he said, adding that the society has a "hard and fast," if unwritten, rule that "we don't allow any lobbying."

Sometimes A Book Is Indeed Just A Book. But When? (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

WASHINGTON

When President Bush met with Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany in the Oval Office this month, the talk turned to Ms. Merkel's childhood under Communism, then wandered to the subject of Mr. Bush's latest bedtime reading: "Mao: The Unknown Story," an 814-page biography that presents the Chinese dictator as another Hitler or Stalin.

Participants in the meeting say Mr. Bush spoke glowingly of the book, a 10-year project by Jung Chang, the author of the hugely successful memoir "Wild Swans," and her husband, Jon Halliday, a British historian. "Mao" has been at the top of best-seller lists in Britain and Germany, and was published to mixed reviews late last year in the United States.

The book might at first seem an odd choice for Mr. Bush, whose taste in biography, like that of other American presidents, runs to previous occupants of the Oval Office. But it is not so surprising given that "Mao: The Unknown Story" has been embraced by the right as a searing indictment of Communism.

Other reviewers have praised the book's brutal portrait of Mao as a corrective to sunnier biographies, even as they have questioned some of its prodigious research and accused the authors of a moralistic, good-and-evil version of history. Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, said last week that Laura Bush gave the book to her husband as a gift, and that the president had just finished reading it.

Asked why Mr. Bush liked the book, Mr. McClellan said he would find out, then reported back on Friday that Mr. Bush had told him that "Mao" "really shows how brutal a tyrant he was" and that "he was much more brutal than people assumed."

Mr. Bush also said, Mr. McClellan recounted, that "millions upon millions were killed because of his policies." On that score, the book is both sweeping and specific, with a first chapter that begins with this sentence: "Mao Zedong, who for decades held absolute power over the lives of one-quarter of the world's population, was responsible for well over 70 million deaths in peacetime, more than any other 20th-century leader."

Ms. Chang and Mr. Halliday said in a telephone interview from Paris on Friday, during a long weekend away from their home in London, that they were "thrilled" that Mr. Bush had read the book. Ms. Chang, whose "Wild Swans," about her family's oppression under Mao, sold 10 million copies worldwide, said she surmised that Mr. Bush was drawn to the book because "it's a very dramatic story about a roller-coaster life." She also said that since Mr. Bush was dealing with the current Chinese leadership, "it's not surprising that he should want to know from what roots this regime has grown."

American scholars say that Mr. Bush was no doubt drawn to the narrative but also to a book that is in effect an argument for the president's second-term agenda of spreading democracy around the world. One major revelation of the book, for example, is Stalin's powerful role in Mao's rise.

"The book certainly makes an effective case for the wickedness of dictatorship," said Andrew J. Nathan, a specialist in Chinese politics at Columbia University. "It doesn't talk about democracy, but for a person who believes in democracy, this is a valuable brief."

But Mr. Nathan, who last year in The London Review of Books criticized what he called the authors' vague and inaccessible sourcing, said that the biography presented Mao as a "comic-book monster," with little explanation of the psychological, sociological and historical forces that allowed him to rise. He also said he was skeptical that the book would help in understanding China's current leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0010127

"Today's Communist Party is a highly developed bureaucracy, like IBM or General Motors," Mr. Nathan said. "It's not the Communist Party of Mao's time."

At least one historian said that perhaps people were reading too much into Mr. Bush's choice of reading, and that sometimes a book on Mao is just a book on Mao.

"To be honest, I'm not sure that it's so weird for him to be reading this," said Doris Kearns Goodwin, the author most recently of "Team of Rivals," a best-selling account of Abraham Lincoln's relationship with his cabinet which, Mr. McClellan said, Mr. Bush finished before starting the Mao book.

(Over the past year Mr. Bush's reading has also included, Mr. McClellan said, "Nine Parts of Desire: The Hidden World of Islamic Women," by Geraldine Brooks; "When Trumpets Call: Theodore Roosevelt After the White House," by Patricia O'Toole; and "1776," by David McCullough.)

Ms. Goodwin said that while presidents read about other presidents for guidance and solace, "partly why presidents read is the reason that we all read: to relax, to replenish our energy and to go into another era and another time."

When Lincoln was president, she added, he went to plays more than 100 times. Lincoln was of course assassinated at the theater, but throughout his presidency drama had served as a form of escape.

"He said that when the lights went down, he could imagine he was back in Shakespeare's time, watching kings and queens battle out dramas that were equally as great as the Civil War," Ms. Goodwin said. "And it just allowed him, I think, to remove himself from the pressures of the day."

Diversity Now A Foreign Concept (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice caused a bit of a stir in Foggy Bottom last week when she unveiled plans to redeploy diplomats from Europe to world hot spots.

And no promotions, she said, without service in dangerous posts and fluency in two foreign languages, especially those spoken by people who may fancy grenade launchers and scream "Death to America."

She also talked about the need for a more diverse Foreign Service, something that might improve diplomats' feel for foreign cultures. After all, just because you speak the language doesn't mean you can figure out when someone is lying through his teeth. (There's a reason Afghan-born American diplomat Zalmay Khalilzad gets generally rave reviews for his work in the Middle East.)

Diversity is one area where neither the State Department nor the National Security Council nor the Pentagon, despite decades of talking about it, have claimed much success. The NSC, for example, with about 230 employees, has a total -- by our quick count -- of perhaps nine Latinos, African Americans, Asian Americans and Middle Easterners in mid-level or top positions.

At the State Department, four of six undersecretaries working for Rice are women, but a check of the top 45 or so officials at the assistant secretary level and higher finds fewer than a half-dozen minorities.

And at the Pentagon, although the uniformed folks have made great strides over the years up and down the ladder, minorities in the mid-level or higher civilian policymaking positions are said to be quite scarce, despite oral and written admonitions and pounding on the table by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld , a sponsor of the Voting Rights Act when he was in Congress in the '60s.

"It cannot be that the last three secretaries of state -- the daughter of European immigrants, the son of Jamaican immigrants and a daughter of the American segregated South -- would be more diverse than the Foreign Service with which they work," Rice said.

Alas.A Chief Disagreement

There was something odd last week about the artwork on Amazon.com for Weekly Standard Executive Editor Fred Barnes 's new book on President Bush, titled "Rebel-in-Chief: Inside the Bold and Controversial Presidency of George W. Bush ." Amazon's blurb touts it as "How George W. Bush Is Redefining the Conservative Movement and Transforming America."

The book jacket has a lovely blue and white cover and a photograph of Bush, sleeves rolled up, looking off in a leaderly way.

DOJ_NMG_0010128

But there's a second smaller image of a book that doesn't seem to have the same Barnes touch. There's a picture of an upset Bush being led off in handcuffs and titled: "Felon-in-Chief: How George W. Bush is Redefining Greed and Corruption and Destroying America."

Last week someone posted a picture of the latter "book" right below the real one. It's posted as a "Customer image from J. Wolf ." It was still up as of last night.Party Politics

Don't forget! Wednesday is the big birthday bash for Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.), who's celebrating his 70th at powerhouse lobbying firm Cassidy & Associates. No need to bring a special gift -- no ties, shirts or such -- according to the invite.

Oh, but if you want to host the bash, that'll be $2,000 per political action committee and $1,000 per person. Simple attendance is $1,000 per PAC and only $500 per person.

Good to see venerable Washington-style birthday traditions continue even in these troubled times.Young May Return to His Old Country

As expected, de facto ambassador to Taiwan Douglas Paal resigned last week after three years on the job. An inspector general's report last summer sharply criticized Paal for his management style and the office's low staff morale, the Asian press reported.

The buzz in Taipei is that career diplomat Stephen M. Young , former number two in Taiwan and more recently ambassador to Kyrgyzstan, is heading back to the island to run the U.S. diplomatic operation.Moving On . . .

Susan Aheron Magill , longtime chief of staff to Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), is retiring after 28 years on the Hill, the past 24 working for Warner. Magill, who was executive director of the Joint Congressional Committee for President Bill Clinton's second inauguration, is going private sector, taking a senior executive position in government affairs with the Pew Charitable Trusts.

Nina Shokraii Rees , formerly special assistant for domestic policy in Vice President Cheney's office and more recently the Education Department's highly regarded assistant deputy secretary and head of the department's Office of Innovation and Improvement, has moved to the Knowledge Universe Learning Group.

Report Reveals Low Rates Of Foster Care Visitation, Reliable Record-Keeping (WP)

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

Lacking proof from most of the states, federal officials are concerned that many foster children are not being visited regularly by caseworkers.

Only 19 states and the District were able to produce computer-based reports detailing how often such visits occurred in fiscal 2003, according to a new report by the inspector general for the Department of Health and Human Services.

Seventeen of those states required monthly visits. Yet, five reported that less than half of their foster care children were visited that frequently. Another five states reported a visitation rate of 75 percent or less.

Most states said they lacked the resources to produce such a report or they did not have a computer record-keeping system. The federal government and state governments have spent $2.8 billion developing such systems since 1994.

"We're not surprised at what the inspector general found," said Wade Horn, HHS assistant secretary for children and families. He said he shared concerns that states need to do a better job of tracking caseworker visits.

Child welfare experts say caseworker visits are among the most important tools states can use to protect foster children. "The more frequently a child is visited in foster care, the better the outcome for that child," Horn said.

Nationally, about 500,000 children are in foster care, a number that has been declining in recent years, Horn said.

All states must comply with federal regulations to get federal funding for their foster care programs, but each state determines how services are provided. Forty-three states call for monthly visitation. The others set visitation standards ranging from weekly to quarterly.

The government can financially penalize states that do not show improvement in key areas such as caseworker visits. So far, the Bush administration has resisted that approach. "The goal of the [reviews] has not been to penalize states, but to work with them to improve the effectiveness of their child welfare systems," Horn said.

He said he was prepared to enact sanctions for states that fail to improve. "Our hope is that every state will show progress," he said.

Daniel R. Levinson, the HHS inspector general, recommended that the government promote the development of computer tracking systems, which would improve states' abilities to ensure caseworkers visit foster children.

The federal government provides 75 percent of the funding for such automated systems, Horn said. The IG's report noted that 45 states and the District are in various stages of developing their computer systems but six states, unnamed in the report, have no such systems planned.

For the 31 states that could not produce reports, the IG's office repeated some reasons they were given. "We don't have the manpower to generate reports," an unidentified official from New Mexico told the inspector general.

The IG's office found the following rates for monthly visitation in 2003: Wyoming, 27 percent; West Virginia, 42 percent; the District, 43 percent; Kentucky, 44 percent; New Hampshire, 49 percent; Massachusetts, 50 percent; Tennessee, 53 percent; Arizona, 59 percent; Arkansas, 71 percent; and Texas, 75 percent.

Tom DeLay, Right Or Wrong (PTR)

By Salena Zito

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, January 23, 2006

Hold a rearview mirror up to U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay and ask how he views his past. He'll likely wave you off and say he has his eyes on the windshield, concentrating on what's in front of him.

It's DeLay's nature to move forward, whatever chaos swirls around him.

"My top priorities are my constituents ... homeland-border security, improving our regional transportation infrastructure and NASA," DeLay told me during a campaign rally here this month for Texas Gov. Rick Perry.

In 2005 DeLay helped pass two major border-security and immigration-enforcement bills, a six-year highway-funding bill and NASA's first reauthorization bill since President Bush laid out his vision for space exploration.

Democrats hate DeLay because he beat them, often and hard -- and he enjoyed it. Democrats may be miles apart on issues but they're united when it comes to taking down a wounded Republican, especially this former House majority leader.

Ask DeLay about that, and he flashes a smile: "Politics has to be about the issues ... . (W)hen you personalize political differences, you might occasionally hurt your opponent but you ultimately just destroy yourself. Politics should be about who's right and wrong, not who's good and bad."

DeLay, in his 11th House term and who turns 59 in April, says he'd rather concentrate on keeping Republicans what even many Republicans say they no longer are -- the party of fiscal responsibility and reform.

"It's not enough to keep the conservative majority strong; it needs to be stronger," he says. "And that means focusing on the issues ... five and 10 years down the road.

"For instance, I'm all for tax cuts, but we need to start seriously talking about tax reform ... . (R)egulation and litigation that now hamstring small businesses, competition and job creation do not just need tweaks -- they demand long-term, comprehensive reform."

DeLay wants to reform retirement security, the health-care system and Congress' appropriations process. "It's not enough for conservatives to enact our agenda for 2006. We need to always be moving toward our goals for 2016."

As he moves over to the House Appropriations Committee from his very public descent from the leadership, DeLay is thinking of what it will take to keep spending down.

"Two things -- discipline and reform. ... We need structural, internal reforms to level the playing field for those of us who want to limit government."

He appears to have learned his lesson after being roundly pummeled earlier in the year for saying there was no fat left to cut out of a heavily earmarked budget.

DeLay has planted many thorns in Democrats' sides over the years but none has been sharper than redistricting. The U.S. Supreme Court will examine the constitutionality of the Lone Star State's GOP-orchestrated 2003 redistricting, which gave Republicans a 2-to-1 advantage in congressional seats.

DOJ_NMG_0010130

Although Democrats brilliantly branded "redistricting" as a dirty word, DeLay says the average voter doesn't get what it's all about.

"The redistricting process was put in place by our Founding Fathers and has existed essentially unchanged since 1789.

"For all the hand-wringing people do about partisan politics, the fact of the matter is that the redistricting process pretty accurately reflects the will of the people." It can be nasty and partisan, "but it works, just as the Founders imagined it would."

The bipartisan criticism of Tom DeLay is that his aggressive style was his undoing. Even those members of Congress whom he helped to elect and re-elect grew tired of it, distancing themselves for their own survival.

Of course, DeLay's suspect indictment on trumped-up campaign-finance charges by Ronnie Earle, the partisan Texas prosecutor and media hound, hasn't helped. Neither has his nexus -- real or perceived, ancillary or intimate -- to shady lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The real test for DeLay now rests with folks in the 22nd Congressional District who sent him to Washington 22 years ago. He faces a tough re-election, and recent polls show his troubles have taken their toll.

If he can weather that storm, Tom DeLay will return to Washington wounded but by no means dead. He may no longer be the leader, but as the consummate deal-maker and doer he is, DeLay will continue to exert extraordinary influence.

Obama Might Be Walking On Hot Water (CHIT)

By John Kass

Chicago Tribune, January 23, 2006

Everybody knows that when U.S. Sen. Barack Obama walks, lilacs bloom from his every footstep, even in parking lots.

He can cross the Potomac without bridge or boat. When his fellow Democrats became hungry, he feeds them by the thousands with two perch and a bag of Cheetos. And what about that nice Shiraz flowing from the Senate water cooler?

According to his glowing media, there is nothing he can't do. And when he saved Sen. Hillary Clinton from her own big mouth--she told a black audience that Congress was a "plantation, and you know what I'm talking about"--I became a believer too.

But now he's trying to pull off a real miracle.

Obama, the Chicago Democrat, is the lead public thwacker of Republicans on the corruption issue involving self-admitted crooked Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Obama was scheduled for more public thwacking on NBC's "Meet the Press" on Sunday. But that's not the miracle.

The miracle is that he's trying to do this and push ethics legislation, while avoiding mention of the corruption among Democrats in Illinois. Federal investigations are crawling through the administrations of Chicago Mayor Richard Daley and Gov. Rod Blagojevich while Obama skips the mess back home.

I like Obama, and I've told you so. And I called to tell him, respectfully, that I thought he made a big mistake by being maneuvered into the role of designated hitter.

"This stuff is always hard and it's always messy because no party's got clean hands," Obama told me over the phone. "But you know, if you've got an opportunity to at least move the ball forward a little bit, then I figure you should take the opportunity. Everybody in Washington at least seems embarrassed enough now that it's possible to move the ball forward. And that's what I'm going to try to do."

But he can't discuss virtue in Washington without speaking to the sleaze in Chicago. If he does, he'll be just another suit mouthing hollow words. Barack Obama is better than that.

He didn't call a news conference condemning City Hall for corruption. For example, he didn't condemn the Duffs, the mayor's white friends who received $100 million in affirmative action contracts from the Daley administration that should have gone to minorities.

"As you know, it's not my habit to hold press conferences to chase headlines," Obama said. "If somebody's asking my opinion, I'll tell it."

The senator has been asked. In August of 2005, with the patronage scandal and Hired Truck scandal swamping Mayor Daley, Obama said corruption bothered him. He was asked if he'd support Daley if the mayor seeks re-election in 2007.

"I think that what has happened ... gives me huge pause," Obama said.

Later, a reporter asked him if it were true that Daley's scandals had given him pause in considering an endorsement. According to the Tribune article of Aug. 5, 2005, Obama snapped: "That's not what I said. ... Don't put words in my mouth."

But since he accepted the job of Sen. Thwackum in a Democratic Party news conference last week, he can't avoid the issue. (One of those Democrats was U.S. Rep. Jan Schakowsky (D-Ill.), whose husband, political activist Robert Creamer, will be sentenced soon after being convicted of a check-kiting scam.)

"I had to participate in the news conference," Obama told me on Friday. "But my main goal is going to be to see if I can get Democrats and Republicans to sit down and try to figure out if there's a solution to this thing."

That's not what Democratic Party leaders want. They want him to kick Republican political behinds on national TV. Yet the first time someone close to Obama screws up with a campaign check, he'll be called a hypocrite. That's the trap.

And while the temptation among his Washington media champions who share his politics will be to ignore the Chicago corruption, there's an unavoidable connection.

U.S. Rep. Rahm Emmanuel (D-Ill.), who runs the national party's effort to elect more Democrats to the House, was himself elected to Congress with the help of corrupt city water department boss Don Tomczak, who ran a patronage army for Daley that is under federal investigation. Tomczak, who pleaded guilty, is cooperating with prosecutors.

Emmanuel has said he was unaware of Tomczak's political help. Obama didn't want to touch this one.

"Well, a lot of this stuff is going to play itself out," he said. "My goal is just to see if there's some low hanging fruit that we should go ahead and take care of, and that's what I want to do."

Former House Majority Leader Tom Delay of Texas, the most prominent Republican scorched so far, complains prosecutors are out to "criminalize politics." That's the same line used by the Daleys.

"No party has a monopoly on virtue," Obama said. "And I think there are some things that are clearly out of bounds. Are there gray areas? Sure. But my goal is just to get it to where the stuff that is clearly black and white is off the table."

Poll: Most Find Medicare Program Confusing (AP)

By Will Lester

The Associated Press, January 23, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Confusion by consumers may be one of the biggest problems at the startup of the new Medicare prescription drug program, an AP-Ipsos poll suggests.

Most people find the new Medicare prescription drug program hard to navigate, especially older people and those who have enrolled to get the drug benefit.

The program requires people to choose from among dozens of competing private insurance plans. Along with seniors and those who have enrolled, those most likely to acknowledge difficulties live in rural areas or are college graduates.

More than half, 52 percent, of respondents say they think the program that began enrolling people on Jan. 1 is tough to understand, the poll found.

Two-thirds of older people surveyed and two-thirds of those who have signed up say they are confused by the program, which is intended to help many save money on their prescription drugs.

"We're getting a pretty steady stream of questions," said insurance counselor Edith Goodin Thompson, of the Aging and Disability Resource Center for Broward County in south Florida.

"The typical call is 'I need a plan. I have gone on my computer and done the research and I don't understand."

The multiple plans and varied rules can confuse the well educated.

"I pretty much completed a master's degree in psychology and I can't understand it," said Raymond Lloyd, a Republican-leaning retiree from Silt, Colo. "For the elderly who don't have their full faculties and the poor people who are not well educated, God help 'em."

One-third said they had not decided what they think of the new program and 16 percent said they have little trouble figuring out the program.

DOJ_NMG_0010132

One who finds it easy to understand is Kathy Herndon of Savannah, Ga., who has worked for three decades in a dentist's office.

"I'm sure it would be confusing unless you're used to dealing with it," she said.

The poorest people in the program have a specific plan chosen at first for them; those with higher incomes have to pick one. People who struggle with a selection often turn to their pharmacists.

Marlene Brantley, a pharmacist in Arnaudville, La., said that serving Hurricane Katrina evacuees seemed like "a walk in the park" when compared with helping Medicare beneficiaries in recent weeks.

She said there are too many plans and too many lists of available drugs, forcing pharmacists to spend a lot of time trying to determine if people are eligible for a particular plan.

"If we don't get help, I see us all throwing up our hands and quitting," Brantley said last week at a Democratic-sponsored forum on Capitol Hill.

Soon after enrollment opened, it became apparent there was widespread confusion, so the government increased from 150 to 4,000 the number of workers at a pharmacy help line.

Questions also can go through the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services -- 1-800-Medicare or http://www.cms.hhs.gov -- or local aging agencies.

The public's understanding of the program is one of several problems that have plagued the Bush administration initiative.

Tens of thousands of elderly poor people have had trouble getting their medicine after they were canceled from Medicaid prescription drug coverage but not properly listed as eligible for the new program.

"Most of these people are vulnerable and frail," said Jean Finberg of the National Senior Citizens Law Center. "Our government is not protecting these people, and the new plan is too complicated."

Medicare spokesman Gary Karr said millions of people are getting their prescription drugs through the new program, despite the glitches.

"We certainly acknowledge there have been some problems," Karr said. "This is a $30-$40 billion program. It's a big transition for many people."

About 3.6 million people have enrolled, in addition to the 6.4 million elderly poor shifted from Medicaid, the government health care program for the poor that had provided their drug coverage.

But the public has doubts about the savings now.

Of those people who have enrolled in the program or have family members enrolled, six in 10 in the poll said they have noticed no significant savings.

Half of the Republicans surveyed say the drug program is hard to understand while six in 10 Democrats say they feel that way.

Time, January 23, 2006

A month ago, Tracy Patterson wasÂ simply a woman with more than her fair share of sickness. With multiple birth defects, chronic pain, asthma and bipolar disorder, Patterson, 35, struggled to get by on $832 a month in disability assistance. But at least one thing in her life was taken care of. California's Medicaid program paid for more than a dozen medications every month. "I always got my meds on time," she says. That changed on Jan. 1, when Medicare's prescription-drug benefit went into effect. Patterson was one of 6.2 million people automatically shifted into the program from Medicaid, and her story has become part of an urgent, nationwide call to fix what both Republicans and Democrats say was a botched transition to the controversial new plan.

Patterson says the abrupt switch has pushed her to the edge. She spent a week without medication, trying to figure out the new plan, called Medicare Part D, and then learned that under the terms of her policy, she would have to pay $308.68 for a month's supply of morphine, which she takes for her chronic pain. "I flipped out," she says. "First I was shocked, then I started crying. Now I'm just numb. I'm bipolar. I'm kind of getting depressed." Patterson sobs at the idea of borrowing money she can't pay back. "Whoever voted this into policy was a bunch of jerks, and they never knew what it was like to live on a fixed income and have to have medication."

Any policymakers who once might have glossed over her frustration as a side effect of sudden change are thinking twice. "Katrina showed government's failure to respond, and we can't afford those failures again," says Republican Senator Norm Coleman of Minnesota. A quarter of the 24 million people now enrolled in Medicare Part D are "dual eligibles," people who qualify for both Medicaid and Medicare. In other words, they are among the poorest and frailest people in the country. More than 70% of them make less than $10,000 a year; 372,000 of them have Alzheimer's. Republicans realize that after Katrina, they cannot risk another crisis in which the government appears to be abandoning its most vulnerable citizens. Some are already making that connection. Aniela Toscano, 56, a New Yorker living in a shelter, has run up $885 in credit-card debt thanks to a brand-new bill for drugs and is worried that she can no longer afford her seizure medication. "What happened in New Orleans?" she says. "They let those people die. Why not us?"

Thankfully, no one is waiting for another slow-motion catastrophe to unfold. Governors of more than 20 states have pledged emergency funds to help people, at least temporarily, pay for drugs they are having trouble getting. Insurers say they expect to have any remaining problems fixed in the next two weeks, although patient advocates are skeptical. And in response to the bipartisan outrage, House Republican leaders are considering a proposal, initially suggested by Democrats, to extend the deadline for signing up for the new benefit from May 15 to Dec. 31, a House G.O.P. aide tells TIME. The difficult transition, though, is more than just a product of bureaucratic fumbling. It is a significant step in the march of U.S. health care toward a free-market system governed by choice and risk. President George W. Bush is expected to make that movement a central element in his State of the Union address next week and to emphasize its promise. The patients, families and pharmacists caught up in Part D know its price, at least in the short term.

The fundamental goal of Medicare Part D is hard to argue with. Medicare has no drug benefit; Part D provides one. When Medicare was established in 1965 as a Great Society health-care program for seniors, prescription drugs were a minor planet in the universe of medical treatment. They now account for 11% of every health-care dollar spent. But more than a quarter of the 42 million people on Medicare had no drug coverage at all last year.

The law that was passed in 2003 is not really an expansion of Medicare, which is an entitlement with standardized care. Part D, although funded by Medicare, is actually private insurance, similar in design to high-deductible health policies that shift more of the costs to members in an effort to make them more conscious of what they're spending. "People are used to it being an entitlement, but [Part D] wasn't the same sort of generous benefit that Medicare is," says David Scrase, president of Presbyterian Health Plan, a Part D provider in Albuquerque, N.M.

The array of selections available under Part D--even Alaska, with only 53,000 eligible recipients, has almost 30 plans, all with different premiums, deductibles, co-pays and covered drugs--has bewildered seniors trying to choose. But that confusion is only part of what has gone wrong. The main reason for the problems of the past three weeks is that the vast majority of enrollees--20.4 million of 24 million--already had some kind of drug benefit, in many cases Medicaid, and were automatically switched to Part D. Their information had to make its way through several layers of private and public bureaucracy for the new system to work. Medicare allowed people to sign up for Part D until Dec. 31 for coverage on Jan. 1, but insurers couldn't process their enrollment cards fast enough to be ready by then. People eligible for both Medicaid and Medicare were assigned to plans randomly, in many cases to plans that did not cover the drugs they took. Insurers are supposed to cover 30-day emergency supplies of medicines that are not included in their plan, but many companies are stonewalling on fulfilling that guarantee. So many seniors have had to pay out of pocket for their drugs or go without. Medicare promised subsidies to poor people for their co-payments and deductibles, but insurers still do not have complete information on who is eligible for the extra help.

Some insurers blame pharmacists for lacking the right software or failing to carry out stated policies, while pharmacists say Part D has been a disaster for them too. Many of them have been handing out prescriptions but don't expect reimbursements from Medicare until early February. That cash-flow crunch is putting some pharmacies in danger. Art Whitney of Rockland, Calif., borrowed $500,000 to cover what he owes his wholesaler. "I've been in business since '87, and I've never borrowed a nickel," he says.

Why shift so many people, particularly those least equipped to handle a chaotic change, all at once into a system with so many moving parts? Health-care advocates have been asking that question for at least two years. In January 2004, the Kaiser Family Foundation, a nonpartisan health-care research group, published a report predicting that dual eligibles would be "overwhelmed" by a sudden change to Part D. The report of a Kaiser gathering of Medicaid directors from 11 states held last November to discuss concerns about the Part D transition reads like a screenplay for the horror stories that followed. "It wasn't that they didn't know," says Drew Altman, president of the foundation.

In an interview with TIME last week, Mark McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said most people entered the new system without encountering trouble. He attributed much of the difficulty of those who did to the huge number of people who enrolled or switched plans at the end of December. Although assigned to plans, dual eligibles had the right to change by Dec. 31 to one that best suited their needs. The Medicare bureaucracy is still catching up with all that data, McClellan says. "Those are the issues that we're working through right now."

McClellan, along with the insurers, is closely watching whether the bad publicity from the start of Part D will affect enrollment. The pace of voluntary enrollment so far is picking up, with 2.6 million people signing up since Dec. 13. High enrollment is crucial to the program's success. Any insurance program relies on pooling the risk of a large group of people, and insurers that can't capture enough members will eventually have to shut down.

Any talk of turning Medicare into market share, of course, is catnip to Democrats, who are ready to use the Medicare mess against Republicans in the November midterm elections. Seniors tend to turn out for midterms in higher numbers than younger people, "so there's a real opportunity here," says Democratic pollster Mark Mellman. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee is advising candidates to visit senior centers and press the argument that the drug benefit was written by and for the health-care lobby. Those candidates hope to point out, for example, that drug manufacturers lobbied to avoid negotiating drug prices directly with Medicare. Instead, Medicare provides funds to insurers, which use intermediaries called pharmacy benefit managers, who then negotiate with the drugmakers. That system breaks Medicare into smaller purchasing pools, and drugmakers get higher prices. Insurers, meanwhile, successfully lobbied for a provision that limits potential losses in the first two years.

Republicans insist that January's rough transition will be all but forgotten by November. And they will remind voters that Democrats were unable to get any drug benefit, however flawed, passed while they were in power. "Seniors would have nothing if it weren't for Republicans passing this plan," says Amy Call, spokeswoman for Senate majority leader Bill Frist. G.O.P. leaders have so far rejected the major changes proposed by Democrats, including allowing direct negotiation with drugmakers and easing the rules on reimportation of drugs from Canada.

They are taking seriously the bipartisan calls from states to be reimbursed for the tens of millions of dollars in emergency funds states have set aside to cover the gaps in Part D coverage. Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt spent last week on damage-control patrol, trying to placate anxious seniors and state lawmakers angry about footing the bill for Medicare's mistakes. Maine Republican Senator Olympia Snowe said Leavitt reassured her on Friday that the Federal Government would use its authority to compel insurance plans to reimburse the states directly. Maine has spent $5 million.

Ultimately, the future of Medicare Part D will depend not just on Republicans or Democrats, insurers or drugmakers, pharmacists or health-care experts. It will hinge on the willingness of the millions of people eligible for Medicare to submit to this experiment in free-market health care. Americans could decide that the health of the old, the sick and the needy deserves a system separate from the one that rules whether Internet companies and T shirt makers live or die. But if enough people agree to endure the smaller upheavals that are sure to come, Part D gives them a drug benefit based on the American ideal of unlimited choice. Some plans will change their rules or increase their prices; others won't survive, and their members will again have to navigate a new plan. For those without any drug coverage at all, that may be a risk worth taking.

The Eye Of A Medicare Hurricane (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0010135

If a health plan pays a pharmacy for medicine it dispensed to an elderly patient, before realizing that the person already had switched to a different health plan, how do the insurance companies settle up? If a pharmacy run by a federally funded health clinic wants to cover some costs that its Medicare patients are supposed to pay on their own, is that legal? And how much of a refund should patients get if they have chipped in to cover part of the price of their medicine before the government determined they are so poor that they should not have had to pay in the first place?

Such brainteasers would have been unimaginable through most of the four decades that Medicare has provided health insurance to the nation's elderly. But since Jan. 1, when the program's new drug benefit began, such questions surface routinely. Often as not, they land on Tracey McCutcheon's desk.

As acting deputy director of the Medicare Drug Policy Group at the Center for Medicare and Medicare Services (CMS), McCutcheon is deep in the weeds of the largest, most complex and -- judging from its first three weeks -- messiest expansion of the program in its history. From a first-floor office in an immense government building in a western suburb of Baltimore, she works 12-hour days, taking conference calls, combing through statutory language and rethinking the fine print of 60 pages of federal regulations she helped to write.

"Lots of moving parts," is the way she describes her job, with understatement.

McCutcheon, 52, is not a longtime federal bureaucrat. She had worked for several of the Washington area's major hospital systems and health plans, most recently for a disease management offshoot of Inova Health System. When she began thinking about what she wanted to do next, she realized, "I may have sort of a regulatory bent" -- drawn, as she was, to solving problems, making systems work and complying with government rules.

She began to commute from her home in Silver Spring to a job as "health insurance specialist" at CMS headquarters in February 2003. She remembers that, in the first days, her boss remarked that Congress was starting to look serious about prescription drug legislation it had been debating for years. The bill passed late that year.

Today, McCutcheon is a GS-15 with a staff of about 50, now that she has been promoted to acting deputy of a group within the agency that sets policy for health plans. Her speech and writing are sprinkled with obscure abbreviations: TrOOP (true out-of-pocket cost, or the sum Medicare patients must pay in deductibles and co-pays before the drug coverage begins) and LIS (low-income subsidy for poor older people).

Shortly before the benefit took effect, McCutcheon found herself debating what the word "person" means. The context was an aspect of the Medicare law that says out-of-pocket costs are to be paid by the beneficiary or other person on their behalf. The challenge was to find a way to allow charitable organizations to chip in.

Currently, she and her staff are rethinking a rule that allows health plans to "co-brand," when they place on the prescription drug card they give patients the name of a second company, such as a drug store. The worry is that patients might mistakenly believe they can fill prescriptions only at the store named on the card.

Such matters are arcane, but they also have broad implications for whether insurers remain in the program, whether pharmacists are willing to fill prescriptions and -- most of all -- whether the nation's older patients come to believe the federal insurance for medicine is worthwhile.

As complaints and confusion about the drug benefit have spread around the country this month, McCutcheon said, "some of the specific issues that come up have been surprising." Still, she said, "you never bring up a huge program and have everything perfect."

Celebrities Capitalize On Star Power In D.C. (LAT)

By Jube Shiver Jr., Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — In four decades as a guitarist with such iconic rock bands as the Byrds and Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young, David Crosby played in front of millions of fans at such venues as Woodstock, the Fillmore East, the Hollywood Bowl and London's Wembley Stadium.

Lately, one of his regular gigs has been at one of the nation's most elite clubs: the U.S. Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0010136

Last year, the shaggy-haired, 64-year-old musician donned a suit in lieu of his usual bluejeans to lobby the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, seeking to thwart plans to expand Chumash casinos and commercial developments near his home in the tranquil Santa Ynez Valley in Santa Barbara County. On another occasion, Crosby opined to lawmakers on campaign finance reform.

"Being a celebrity cuts both ways in Washington," Crosby said. "In some ways it gets you access. But in other ways it makes people dismiss you. You have to be insanely careful about what you say."

Crosby is part of a growing parade of celebrities trekking up Capitol Hill to talk to the nation's lawmakers about issues that rarely have anything to do with their day jobs. Trying to get attention for pet causes easily lost in the clutter of public policy debates, stars hope their cachet can make the difference in opening doors, getting media attention and scoring face time on C-SPAN.

During the last year, Washington's show has starred actress Salma Hayek testifying before the Senate Judiciary Committee on domestic violence about how she became familiar with the issue researching a movie role. Jazz musician and New Orleans native Wynton Marsalis told the House Subcommittee on Economic Development, Public Buildings and Emergency Management how important it was to rebuild after Hurricane Katrina.

Actress and AIDS activist Ashley Judd spoke to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the need to develop an HIV vaccine for Africa. Actor Don Cheadle, who starred in the movie "Hotel Rwanda" set in that country's 1994 civil war, joined five members of Congress on a fact-finding mission to learn about refugees in Sudan.

When it comes to hobnobbing with lawmakers, U2 frontman Bono ranks as Washington's reigning celebrity lobbyist. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) is a frequent guest at the band's concerts. In October, Bono lunched for 90 minutes with President Bush at the White House, where the two discussed debt relief, AIDS, malaria and world trade, White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan said.

"More and more celebrities are lobbying for particular causes," said Darrell West, a professor of political science at Brown University and author of the book "Celebrity Politics." "They attract the TV cameras, and celebrities are great fundraisers."

For celebrities, testifying and lobbying in the nation's capital offers the ego stroke of being taken seriously on important issues, and a chance to make headlines for something other than their latest loves or public mishaps.

In an e-mail to the Los Angeles Times, actress Mary Tyler Moore said her lobbying on behalf of the Diabetes Research Foundation stemmed from her own experiences as a diabetic. Having the disease "has fueled my desire to help … find a cure," Moore said.

After actor Michael J. Fox testified on Capitol Hill in 1999 about his battles with Parkinson's disease, lawmakers urged the National Institutes of Health to intensify the government's search for better treatments. Since then research grants for Parkinson's have jumped more than tenfold from $25 million to as much as $300 million this year, said Robin Elliott, executive director of the Parkinson's Disease Foundation.

"In a television culture, celebrity has become crucial to advancing all kinds of causes," Elliott said.

But it also can often backfire when it appears a celebrity is simply fronting for an issue in which he or she has no special expertise.

In 2002, Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) walked out of a Senate subcommittee hearing on the environmental effect of mountain mining when Kevin Richardson, a Kentucky native and member of the Backstreet Boys singing group, was called as a witness. Voinovich told reporters the proceedings had turned into "a joke."

Lou Diamond Phillips, star of such films as "La Bamba" and "Young Guns," said it was unfair to assume celebrities were unqualified to testify. Phillips said he met resistance when he testified in 2002 about extending veterans benefits to Filipinos who had fought in World War II. Phillips is part Filipino and the son of a war veteran.

"It upsets me that people don't think we have the right to speak out," Phillips said in an interview. "We are citizens like everybody else. I made it certain to the senators that I was no carpetbagger."

When Crosby testified last summer on the tribal development plans, Connecticut blogger Edward Janusz questioned his qualifications.

DOJ_NMG_0010137

"Mr. Crosby seems like an intelligent person," Janusz said in an interview. "But I'm more inclined to listen to people who are personally involved and have some expertise."

Congressional hearings for decades were mostly dominated by nondescript government, industry and academic experts. Stars called to testify typically were asked about issues directly related to the entertainment industry, such as when the House Un-American Activities Committee in the 1940s investigated alleged Communist infiltration of Hollywood.

Credit former top Hollywood lobbyist Jack Valenti and Washington lawyer Michael Gardner with helping demonstrate during the 1980s the clout celebrities could have on Capitol Hill. They mobilized some of Hollywood's biggest names to counter government efforts to end financial syndication rules that forbade broadcasters from owning any of the TV programs they aired.

Valenti squired Warren Beatty, Stefanie Powers, Charlton Heston and Kirk Douglas to Washington to testify, lobby and pose for snapshots with star-struck lawmakers.

Gardner took Mary Tyler Moore, Alan Alda and Jean Stapleton to make the rounds of federal regulators who were siding with the TV networks in favor of the rule change.

In the end, the beleaguered television networks were outmatched by Hollywood's star power.

Financial syndication rules were preserved for nearly a decade before a judicial ruling ended them in the early 1990s.

Valenti, who retired in 2004 as head of the Motion Picture Assn. of America after 38 years, has a relatively simple explanation for why celebrity testimony can be so effective: Congressional hearings are dreadfully dull.

"Most people come in and duck their heads and read their testimony and leave no lasting impression," he said.

But by virtue of their star power and training, Valenti said, "actors can give Oscar-winning performances."

Oil Again Flirting With $70 A Barrel (WSJ)

By Leah Mcgrath Goodman

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2006

Crude oil has its sights set firmly on record territory again.

Crude-oil futures settled at a 20-week high of $68.35 a barrel Friday on the New York Mercantile Exchange, up $1.52, sparking talk that oil could soon challenge its nominal record just above $70.

That is a significant milestone and a telling indication of sentiment in the market: The only time oil prices have traded above $70 was Aug. 30, 2005, just after Hurricane Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast, blazing a trail of destruction through the oil industry.

Months after Katrina and Hurricane Rita, which followed, three refineries remain offline, representing 5% of total U.S. capacity. But now, a host of other factors have conspired to push oil toward its hurricane peak, making it harder to attribute price increases to one extraordinary event and underscoring the fact that prices have staked out a persistently high place.

"Geopolitical fears and technical momentum continue to target the $70-a-barrel mark," said Michael Guido, director of commodity strategy for Société Générale in New York.

Fears of potential disruptions, never far beneath the surface, bubbled up last week as civil unrest in Nigeria, a major oil exporter, cut crude-oil exports by about 200,000 barrels a day, or 10%.

Tensions over Iran's nuclear ambitions flared, too, as the U.S. sought to rally international support for halting Tehran's work on nuclear-power projects, which could be converted into nuclear-weapon capabilities.

On top of that, heavy maintenance work at U.S. refineries and signs of strong demand for oil this year have helped cement the gains.

The leap in oil, which climbed steadily last week, has gained the attention of other markets. Though earnings jitters may have played a large role behind big declines in U.S. stock indexes last week, analysts cited the oil rally as hurting stocks, except those of energy companies.

Natural-gas futures saw substantial gains, too, Friday for the second session in a row, in tandem with a broad-based rally in the petroleum complex.

DOJ_NMG_0010138

The rise in oil has come despite gains in U.S. petroleum inventories this year, as traders continue to worry about signs of rising global demand in 2006 with little improvement to supplies.

Growing supply worries were reflected in weekly data released Friday from the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, which reported oil speculators maintained only a thin net-short position of 1,676 contracts in crude futures as of Tuesday.

While that was slightly higher than the prior week's net-short position, speculators continued to load up on bets that oil prices would rise.

The rally in oil also has prompted big banks to revise their oil forecasts higher. Goldman Sachs, which caused a splash last year with its super-spike oil call, raised its 2006 crude-oil price forecast last week, seeing prices above $70 a barrel by the fourth quarter but adding that significant supply disruptions could push prices above that level much sooner.

Oil Prices Climb To Katrina Levels (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, January 23, 2006

NEW YORK - This may sound eerily familiar: oil prices are spiking, sending shivers from Wall Street to Main Street.

Since the new year began, crude oil has soared more than $7 a barrel to $68.35 - the highest level since late August when hurricane Katrina roiled energy markets. This time, the main impetus appears to be a bad case of international jitters, ranging from Iran to Nigeria to Osama bin Laden. If the tensions don't cool off, energy analysts warn, consumers should brace themselves to pay more at the gas pump in weeks ahead. "It's been one thing after another," says Phil Flynn of Alaron Trading in Chicago.

On Friday, rising oil prices and disappointing earnings sent the Dow Jones Industrial Average into a 213 point dive, one of the sharpest declines since spring 2003. One reason for Wall Street's concern: if the price of oil stays high, it will take money out of people's pockets in a year when consumers are expected to moderate spending anyway.

"Consumer spending may slow down a bit more than thought," says David Wyss, chief economist at Standard & Poor's in New York. "But, it won't drive us into a recession - that would probably take oil going well over $100 a barrel."

Rising oil prices could increase the prices Americans pay for everything from pizza delivery - yes, there is an extra $1 fuel surcharge - to how much money it will cost to get the kids back and forth to hockey practice.

So far, however, many companies have absorbed their higher energy costs. Last year, food and energy added just 1.2 percentage points to the inflation rate, which averaged 3.4 percent.

Still, energy costs are one of the factors the Federal Reserve monitors. The Fed will meet next Tuesday and is expected to raise rates for the fourteenth consecutive time by a quarter percentage point.

Beyond that, how the Fed acts will depend on inflation prospects and its own analysis of the economy.

Typically, oil prices start to retreat by this time in January since there are only about six weeks left to the worst part of the home heating oil season. Other than early December, this winter has been milder in the US than some meteorologists expected. Last Friday, the temperature reached 61 degrees in New York.

While winter in the US has been relatively mild, parts of Europe have faced bitter conditions. This has lead to much higher use of heating oil and natural gas. Last week, fierce winter conditions led Russia to curtail production of oil in its Arctic regions.

But geopolitical uncertainty has shaken up energy markets even more than cold weather in Europe.

Iran, faced with the prospect of economic sanctions for restarting its nuclear program, has warned that the price of oil might rise if the West intervenes. The country's leaders have been vague in explaining how that might happen. Iran exports 2.5 million barrels of oil per day, a significant amount going to Asia.

The other trouble spot is Nigeria which exports about 2.25 million barrels of crude per day, most of it suitable for producing gasoline. Tribal frictions have cut production by about 100,000 to 200,000 barrels of oil per day.

"It's not sizable but any amount has gotten people nervous," says John Felmy, chief economist at the American Petroleum Institute in Washington.

Sunday, the situation in Nigeria remained murky, at best. Four foreign oil workers have been kidnapped by guerrilla forces demanding the release of some tribal leaders. Nigerian newspapers are warning that there could be more attacks in the Niger Delta but the government says it is negotiating in order to calm the region.

DOJ_NMG_0010139

Some analysts say the markets will retreat in the weeks ahead. "Once the market realizes there is no real threat of an immediate conflict, the market will calm down and we will see oil prices back in the $50s or $60s per barrel," says Eugenio Aleman, a senior economist at Wells Fargo Banks in Minneapolis. "This is highly political."

Before the jitters in the market, some analysts thought the price would head lower. OPEC oil ministers are still talking about reducing oil production this spring, to avoid a supply glut. The Energy Information Administration (EIA) is forecasting the average price for oil will be $63.30 this year.

"If there was no anxiety about Iran and Nigeria and other countries, we think prices would be much lower than they are now," says Mark Rodekohr, an EIA analyst.

Even though Mr. Rodekohr says that the price of oil should be going lower during the year, he says he would not be surprised to see the price rise to the $70 range, back where it was soon after hurricane Katrina struck. "The key is how long - will it be a day or two or is there enough anxiety to drive it for a little while longer?"

If the price of oil stays high in the weeks ahead, it will likely be reflected in the price at the pump. So far, gasoline price gains have remained relatively modest given the rise in oil prices. Nationally, gasoline is about $2.30 a gallon, up from $2.09 a gallon only a few months ago.

"Oil prices at this level are not factored into the price of gasoline," says Rodekohr.

For 2006, EIA expects a price range of $2.25 to $2.50 a gallon. "We don't see any reason to think it will go below $2," he says. And, if oil moves above $70 a barrel for a sustained period, he says, prices at the pump will move quite a bit higher-even before the spring driving season begins.

There's Little Margin For Error (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2006

For the past six months, Henry Herrmann's view of stocks has tracked the price of oil pretty closely. He isn't alone in that, so unless the oil outlook does a smart about-face, the stock market could be facing some rough going.

Mr. Herrmann oversees $41 billion in investments as chief executive at money-management group Waddell & Reed in Overland Park, Kan. With oil prices soaring last summer after hurricanes hobbled oil facilities in the Gulf, he worried about economic damage and had his fund managers pull back a bit from stocks. They kept some money in cash rather than invest it.

Then, as oil prices moderated in the fall and U.S. economic reports came in strong, he became more bullish, putting money into more speculative areas such as technology stocks.

Now, with oil back near $70 a barrel, Mr. Herrmann is beginning to hunker down again. So are a lot of other investors. That helps explain why the Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 213.32 points Friday for its biggest one-day percentage decline since 2003. With the current bull market now more than three years old, the question is whether the economy can improve enough to get people like Mr. Herrmann to feel good enough to start buying stocks again.

"We don't have much margin for error," Mr. Herrmann says. "We can't afford to lose two million barrels a day being exported out of Iran."

What worries him is that the problems weighing on the economy "won't go away real soon." It isn't just that expensive oil serves as a tax on consumers and businesses alike. Interest rates have been rising as well, and the two together are damping growth. "I don't think $70 oil translates into a huge economic problem," he says. "But who says it can't go to $80? Who says it can't go to $90?"

At the start of the year, such worries were far from investors' minds. Amid optimism that the Federal Reserve would soon stop raising short-term interest rates and that corporate profit and economic growth would remain robust, investors bid stocks up strongly.

But then, two bad things happened: Oil prices surged again amid concerns over rebel activity in oil-producing Nigeria and the West's showdown with Iran over its nuclear program. Then, prominent companies such as Intel, Citigroup and General Electric announced quarterly results that missed Wall Street expectations. That double whammy raised questions, in Mr. Herrmann's words, about whether investor expectations had gotten too high and stock prices had become "frothy." Seeing the market soaring at the start of January, he and some other investment pros began to worry that stocks were getting ahead of themselves. Just over a week ago, they began slowly to pull back from their more speculative investments. Their selling accelerated Friday, when the Dow Jones Industrial Average lost 1.96% to close at 10667.39. The Nasdaq Composite Index fell 54.11, or 2.35%, to 2247.7, and the Standard & Poor's Composite Index of 500 stocks declined 23.55, or 1.83%, to 1261.49.

That day's market downturn was due in part to the fear of the unknown concerning Iran.

If investors adjust this week to the Iran worries, some of that selling pressure could ease. But a more fundamental reason that investors are nervous is that they fear that some of the market's underpinnings have weakened, making it harder for stocks to hold up in the face of the oil and profit worries.

"The bulls have gotten ground up for burgers," says Ken Tower, chief market strategist at CyberTrader, an arm of brokerage firm Charles Schwab. Because this bull market is getting on in years, he says, there may not be a lot of people left who are interested in stocks and have much extra money still to invest. "It is probably too soon to declare that the bull market is dead, but I think this is just a risky period for bullish investors," Mr. Tower says.

Bull markets have varied enormously in length historically, but over the past 60 years, the typical one has lasted around three years.

Mr. Tower stresses that he isn't saying stocks have entered a bear market now.

While the Dow industrials are down 0.5% for 2006, after a decline of 0.6% last year, the S&P 500 and the Nasdaq Composite Index both were up last year and still are showing gains this year. But Mr. Tower does worry that a bear market could begin some time this year, as investors become disenchanted with corporate performance and some are enticed away by higher interest rates in money-market funds and bonds.

That still isn't the prevailing view, however.

"If we started to get a string of bad days for the market and a string of earnings that appeared to be low-quality or meaningful misses, I might get more worried," says John Waterman, chief investment officer at Rittenhouse Asset Management in Radnor, Pa., an arm of financial-services group Nuveen Investments.

But while the pace of profit gains may slow a bit this year, he says, he expects a resilient economy to keep profits growing. "I'm not sure Friday's selloff was as much the result of oil prices as it was the visibility of the Iran issue, the fear of a supply cutoff," as well as worry about some kind of military action, he says.

He hopes the Iran situation won't spin out of control and that investors once again will shift their attention to the economy's underlying strength.

Mr. Waterman does see a risk that profits may not match bullish Wall Street expectations calling for double-digit growth overall in profit at companies in the S&P 500. But he thinks profits will be able to rise 6% to 8%. That may not be good enough to support some of the highfliers, such as Google, which tumbled 14% last week. But while energy and technology companies may face headwinds, he says, other big stocks may still be able to rise.

So, is the bull market running on empty or is it about to speed up again? More fourth-quarter earnings results in the days ahead will provide clearer indications.

If big companies avoid too many disappointments along the lines of GE's and Citigroup's, if the world political situation calms down and if, after its meeting on Jan. 31, the Fed indicates again that it is getting near the end of its rate-increase cycle, stocks could find better support. If those things don't happen, investors will pay more attention to concerns such as those that bother Messrs. Herrmann and Tower.

Thrill Of Dow 11,000 Already Gone Market Started Off Year Strong But Is Fizzling Fast (USAT)

By Adam Shell And Matt Krantz

USA Today, January 23, 2006

When the Dow closed above 11,000 on Jan. 9 for the first time in 4½ years, Wall Street viewed it as a harbinger of better things to come. The euphoria was short-lived.

The Dow Jones industrial average's fast start is history. And the bright outlook for stocks in 2006 has suddenly turned cloudy.

DOJ_NMG_0010141

A 213-point sell-off Friday, the Dow's biggest one-day point decline since March 24, 2003, not only erased the Dow's 3% year-to-date gain and left it 333 points below the key 11,000 level, it also chipped away at investors' confidence.

"We're seeing optimism fading," says Janna Sampson, a portfolio manager at OakBrook Investments.

Heading into the year, investors were in a bullish frame of mind due to their belief that the Federal Reserve will stop raising interest rates soon. But a lethal mix of negative news last week, including disappointing earnings reports from blue-chip companies, new threats from Osama bin Laden, a spike in oil prices above $68 a barrel and angst over Iran's nuclear ambitions, put investors on the defensive.

The Dow's sharp reversal could offset the psychological boost that accompanied the Dow's topping of 11,000. Wall Street was hoping that the upbeat headlines would increase investors' comfort level and make them more willing to commit fresh money to stocks. Now there's concern they will remain on the sidelines.

"If we don't see individual investors come in, that could be a sign that it will be tough to break out of the trading range to the upside," says Jeff Kleintop, chief investment strategist at PNC Advisors.

The Dow's relapse also raises the odds that the stock market will finish lower in January, despite a fast start. That's not good news. Historically, stocks have tended to finish the full year lower after declines in January.

The biggest drag on the Dow was disappointing earnings from key companies, says Todd Leone, head trader at SG Cowen. Earnings season was supposed to give investors a vote of confidence. But instead, they've been barraged by a flurry of disappointments from bellwethers, such as Yahoo, Intel and Citigroup. So far, 24% of the 95 companies in the Standard & Poor's 500 that have reported earnings have missed estimates, Thomson Financial says. That's up slightly from the historical average of 20%. But since another 141 S&P 500 members report next week, it's too early to make any judgments.

The disappointments haven't been severe enough to completely derail what's expected to be a positive earnings season. Companies in the S&P 500 are expected to post 13.1% growth, making it the 15th-consecutive quarter of double-digit growth, says John Butters, analyst at Thomson Financial.

Greenspan's Exit From The Fed Will Be Low-key After 18 Years, He'll Leave The Limelight To His Successor, Bernanke (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, January 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — Alan Greenspan has little more than a week to go as chairman of the Federal Reserve, and he's going out just as quietly as he came in more than 18 years ago.

No speeches are planned for investors to parse his every word. No testimony is scheduled on Capitol Hill for lawmakers to hear the chairman's opinion on pet issues. And he's not accepting interview requests from the media. He will quietly walk out the door on the evening of Jan. 31 with very little fanfare.

"It's a natural part of the transition," says Tom Gallagher, political economist for ISI Group, an economic consulting firm. "Once his successor was named, it made sense that he kind of take a step back."

Says former Fed governor Lyle Gramley, "Greenspan quite understandably doesn't want to upstage the new chairman."

Former Fed governor and White House economic adviser Ben Bernanke was chosen by President Bush to replace the retiring Greenspan. He has been approved by a Senate panel and is expected to be confirmed soon by the Senate. Bernanke is staying at the Council of Economic Advisers until he takes over Feb. 1.

Greenspan's last day at the Fed will be marked by a luncheon with other policymakers, and a staff reception is scheduled. Small, private parties are also being held around Washington to mark his departure.

Greenspan's quiet departure follows similar exits by other Fed chairmen. Greenspan replaced Paul Volcker in 1987. Volcker, like Greenspan, had a larger-than-life reputation after receiving credit for arresting runaway inflation. He, too, left the Fed with little hoopla.

"There are observances of the occasion occurring at the Fed on a modest scale," former Fed research director Michael Prell says. "I'm not surprised that there isn't anything more."

DOJ_NMG_0010142

But JP Morgan Chase senior economist James Glassman says Greenspan has missed an opportunity to stress his opinions on a variety of matters while still chairman. For example, he could have stressed his views of the positive impacts of globalization in an effort to ease some anti-trade opinions in Congress.

"He should have done a victory lap," Glassman says. But "he somehow just seems to be fading out."

Just because Greenspan is silent now doesn't mean he'll be quiet forever. He has many options, such as writing a book, going on the speaker's circuit or consulting. That would help Greenspan, who made millions as a consultant before joining the Fed, build up his bank account a bit.

"I can't conceive of this guy not continuing his avid interest in what's going on in the world, and if that happens, why shouldn't he sell it?" Gramley says "He deserves to be able to benefit from the fact that he's been in public service for 18 years and has been vastly underpaid during the whole period."

Greenspan's salary in 2005 was $180,100, less than a quarter what he earned in salary, speeches and company director fees the year before he joined the Fed, according to his financial filings at the time.

Iconic Fed Chief Prepares His Departure (AP)

By Nancy Benac

The Associated Press, January 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — America has embraced Alan Greenspan with irrational exuberance. The slight, aging economist with the supersize glasses and claymation facial expressions has inspired a symphonic overture, a country music paean and a red-hot gallery exhibition of "Alan as Art." Queen Elizabeth awarded him honorary knighthood.

"Our contemporary Greek oracle," says linguist Robin Lakoff from California.

"Larger than life," says lawyer Lanny Davis from Washington.

"This guy has become famous for being really, really brilliant and really, really smart about something, but most people have no idea what it is he does," says pop culture expert Robert Thompson from New York.

What he has done, it turns out, is manage the U.S. economy with great assurance for the past 18 years, presiding over an era of remarkable prosperity (interrupted by two mild recessions).

He has done this as chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, a powerful and somewhat mystical institution that guides U.S. monetary policy.

From that vantage, Greenspan has steered the economy through multiple international and domestic crises while keeping inflation and unemployment in check and helping the country adapt to the tectonic shifts of globalization and technology. His influence extends even into the lexicon.

Irrational exuberance? Credit Greenspan for the captivating phrase.

He said it once — in 1996, hoping to temper the zeal of stock investors willing to pay any price. The phrase soon became part of American culture.

When Dickinson College music professor Robert Pound heard it, he decided the phrase would be the perfect title for an overture with an erratic, wild quality that he had been itching to write.

Now, as the 79-year-old Greenspan prepares to retire from the Fed at month's end, Pound has sent him a signed copy of the overture's score to honor Greenspan's work as Fed chairman.

Retrospectives, farewells and tributes to the "Greenspan era" have proliferated since the Fed chief made it known that he is retiring on Jan. 31. His successor will be Ben Bernanke, chairman of the White House Council of Economic Advisers.

Bernanke's first order of business after being nominated was to reassure the world that his priority as Fed head would be to continue the policies of the "Greenspan years." That sent the stock market soaring.

In a 93-page analysis of the "Greenspan Standard" that was released last summer, Princeton University economists Alan Blinder and Ricardo Reis concluded, "We think he has a legitimate claim to being the greatest central banker who ever lived."

Saying goodbye to Greenspan will not be easy.

Vice President Dick Cheney, trying to offer reassurance about the days ahead, spoke well of Bernanke in a Fox News interview, then added: "Besides, Chairman Greenspan is only a phone call away."

DOJ_NMG_0010143

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., reflected the country's infatuation with the Fed chief when he was asked in 1999 whether Greenspan should be appointed to another term.

"I would not only reappoint Mr. Greenspan," McCain said, "if Mr. Greenspan should happen to die — God forbid — I would do like we did in the movie, 'Weekend at Bernie's.' I'd prop him up and put a pair of dark glasses on him and keep him as long as we could."

As Economy Thrived Under Greenspan, So Did Debt (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

Beverly Wilmore is bracing for the tuition bills about to start rolling in after her 19-year-old daughter starts at Towson University this week. But she's not too worried -- she figures she and her husband can borrow against their four-bedroom Gaithersburg home, which has appreciated from $250,000 when they bought it in 2000 to about $400,000 now.

And as the home's value rose, two years ago the Wilmores refinanced their mortgage, cutting their monthly home-loan payments by hundreds of dollars, she recalled.

Like many families who caught the housing boom, the Wilmores now have more debt than before they bought their home, but they also are wealthier. "I'm thankful for the low interest rate," said Wilmore, 42, a special-education teacher.

The Wilmores are among the millions of Americans who have prospered during Alan Greenspan's 18 years as chairman of the Federal Reserve. They lived through nearly two decades of generally stable economic growth with low inflation, low unemployment and modest interest rates. Under Greenspan's watch, the economy thrived despite stock market crashes, international financial crises, terrorist attacks, wars and other shocks. No wonder, as Greenspan prepares to retire next week, economists have lauded him as the greatest central banker ever.

Still, his legacy will be judged not just by his record at the Fed, but also by the economy he bequeaths. And when he leaves office Jan. 31, Greenspan leaves a nation awash in debt -- record household debt and a record trade gap.

Many analysts say his low interest rate policies contributed to these huge imbalances, which threaten the economy he nurtured.

"The jury is out on his legacy in large part because of the debt" and the trade deficit, said Stephen S. Roach, chief economist at Morgan Stanley. "You will not be able to truly judge his accomplishments until we see how this plays out in the post-Greenspan era."Creating Debt

Greenspan and his Fed colleagues agree that part of the growth in household debt and the trade gap is the side effect of policies that helped steady the U.S. economy after the stock bubble burst in 2000. The Fed's low interest rates encouraged consumers to borrow and spend on houses, autos and other goods, spurring economic growth for several years when businesses were cutting jobs and reluctant to invest. And it was no surprise that consumers spent much of their borrowed money on imports, causing the trade deficit to swell. But in the view of central bank policymakers, the alternative would have been worse -- a longer and more painful downturn.

Greenspan's Fed didn't do it alone, economists agree. Other factors helped fuel the borrowing binge, including global financial trends that have helped keep mortgage rates low and prompted lenders to extend more credit to more people.

The result is a prosperity built on borrowing, say many economists, pointing to a string of recent records and firsts:

· U.S. household debt hit a record $11.4 trillion in last year's third quarter, which ended Sept. 30, after shooting up at the fastest rate since 1985, according to Fed data.

· U.S. households spent a record 13.75 percent of their after-tax, or disposable, income on servicing their debts in the third quarter, the Fed reported.

· The trade deficit for last year is estimated to have swollen to another record high, above $700 billion, increasing America's indebtedness to foreigners.

"The economy's increasing reliance on unprecedented levels of debt is clearly unsustainable and extremely troubling," said Charles W. McMillion, chief economist with MBG Information Services, a financial analysis firm. "The only serious questions are when and how will current imbalances be addressed and what will be the consequences."

DOJ_NMG_0010144

The Fed chairman told Congress in June: "I think we've learned very early on in economic history that debt in modest quantities does enhance the rate of growth of an economy and does create higher standards of living, but in excess, creates very serious problems."

Greenspan didn't define "excess," but economists see troubling possibilities: A sudden reversal in housing prices could trigger a recession if consumers cut back on spending and households have trouble paying their mortgages. The trade gap could swell to a point that forces a sharp fall in the dollar and surge in interest rates, also causing a recession.

Even without a crisis, the debt load will weigh on the economy simply because of the interest to be paid on it, which leaves less money to spend on other things and prevents living standards from rising as fast as they would otherwise, some analysts believe.The Past Five Years

To understand how all this debt built up, recall how things looked in early 2001.

In January 2001, Beverly and Kevin Wilmore were excitedly overseeing construction of their home, looking forward to moving in with their two children the following year.

But from his office at the Fed's marble headquarters on Constitution Avenue NW, Greenspan saw that the economy was sputtering. Stock prices had been sliding for nearly a year after peaking in early 2000 at the height of the tech boom. Retail sales had soured. Businesses were throttling back on production and investment.

On Jan. 3, 2001, Greenspan convened a conference call meeting of the central bank's top policymakers. They agreed to cut the Fed's benchmark short-term interest rate for the first time in more than two years, to 6 percent from 6.5 percent.

That action marked the beginning of an aggressive campaign by Greenspan and his colleagues to prevent the bursting of the stock market bubble from devastating the U.S. economy.

Greenspan had studied the Great Depression of the 1930s and believed it resulted largely from the Fed's mistakes in tightening credit after the 1929 stock market crash. He also had seen Japan's central bank ease credit too cautiously after that country's property bubble burst in the early 1990s, triggering a decade-long economic slump. He would do the opposite, dramatically easing credit -- by cutting interest rates -- to cushion the economy's landing.

The Greenspan Fed lowered its benchmark rate another 12 times over the next 2 1/2 years as the economy struggled to regain its footing, cutting the rate to 1 percent by June 2003, the lowest level since 1959.

The benchmark federal funds rate, the overnight rate on loans between banks, influences many other longer-term rates in the economy, including those on mortgages, car loans and business loans. Low interest rates encourage consumers and businesses to borrow and spend, stimulating economic growth.

The Fed's rate cuts had little effect on corporate America, which had overinvested in equipment, software and factories during the late 1990s boom; businesses retrenched, slashing both payrolls and spending plans, tipping the economy into recession from March through November of 2001.

But low interest rates worked like an intoxicant on consumers, who snapped up new cars and trucks with no-interest loans and seized on low mortgage rates to buy new homes and refinance old home loans. Those sales and refinancings freed up more cash to spend. Households used much of that extra money to pay off credit cards, student loans and other, higher-interest rate debt -- "cleaning up their balance sheets," in economists' terms. They also kept shopping through the recession, the terrorist attacks and the rocky economic recovery that followed.

The tonic worked. Household spending rose in 2001, 2002, and 2004, even as the wealth and income of the typical household fell or remained flat in the same period, according to an analysis by Moody's Economy.com. The recession was one of the mildest on record. The economy has been growing since November 2001 and was strong enough by mid-2004 for the Fed to start raising the benchmark rate.

Fed officials expected then that longer-term rates, such as mortgages, would rise as well, causing consumers to borrow less and save more.

But it didn't work out that way. For several reasons -- low inflation, economic stability and foreign investors pouring their savings into U.S. stocks, bonds and other assets -- long-term interest rates fell for a year after the Fed started raising the benchmark rate and have stayed relatively low.

DOJ_NMG_0010145

Mortgage rates also fell, prompting homeowners to refinance repeatedly. Changes in the financial industry made it easier for homeowners to tap their home equity through refinancing. Lenders provided adjustable-rate mortgages that enabled home buyers to pay higher prices while temporarily making low monthly loan payments.

The housing market kept booming. Consumer debt and spending kept climbing.Living With the Debt

Many households are happy with the results. Homeownership climbed above 69 percent in late 2004, which means millions more people gained a store of wealth that can grow and be available in hard times.

And home values have skyrocketed, pumping up household wealth to a record $51 trillion in the third quarter, according to Fed data.

But household debt rose faster in recent years than wealth or disposable income, reaching an unprecedented 126.1 percent of after-tax income in the third quarter, double its 1980 level.

All this debt isn't straining households so far. Late payments on credit card loans and other forms of consumer debt declined in the third quarter, the American Bankers Association reports. Although delinquency rates probably rose in the last three months of the year because of the delayed effects of the hurricanes, those rates are likely to fall this year because of the strong economy, said ABA chief economist James Chessen. "I think it will be a pretty good year for consumer debt and the ability to pay your loans," he said

These national figures combine all U.S. households, but debt tends to weigh most heavily on low-income families, other analysts note.

Many households with incomes below $50,000 a year, the bottom half of the income distribution, have mortgages at higher interest rates, plus car loans, student loans and credit card debt, said Mark Zandi, chief economist at Economy.com. "Their balance sheets are a mess," and they will have a harder time as interest rates rise, he said.

Indeed, U.S. households collectively spent more than their combined income in the second and third quarters of last year. The only way to do that is by selling assets, dipping into savings or borrowing.

When questioned on Capitol Hill in June about criticism that the Fed's strategy had helped inflate a housing bubble, Greenspan suggested that such imbalances were an acceptable price for avoiding another depression or a Japan-like economic stagnation.

"We knew that in the process of what we were doing -- that is, addressing the consequence of a very severe deflation of a [stock] bubble -- carried with it potential side effects," Greenspan said. "As best we can judge, things have turned out reasonably as we had expected, both positively and negatively, but in our judgment, the positive effects of the policy far exceeded the negative ones."

If Greenspan's strategy of raising rates in small, steady steps works, rising interest rates will cause the housing market to simmer gradually, households will save more, and the trade gap will narrow without great damage to the overall economy.

If so, Greenspan will go down in history with his reputation untarnished.

As Beverly Wilmore put it, as she recounted her family's recent experience, "We've prospered."

Runway Reports Often Unreliable Braking Conditions Not Always What Pilots Told (USAT)

By Alan Levin

USA Today, January 23, 2006

An antiquated warning system for the nation's pilots has led dozens of them to receive unreliable information about slippery runways and to land in dangerous conditions, according to a USA TODAY review of accidents and pilot reports during the past decade.

In at least 42 cases since 1995, pilots of commercial and corporate aircraft reported skidding off runways after receiving reports that the runways were safe, according to NASA's Aviation Safety Reporting System.

The reports shed light on the weaknesses of a warning system in which pilots rely on other pilots who have landed recently on slick runways to report conditions on a scale that ranks braking from “good” to “nil.” The reports, relayed by air traffic controllers, are subjective, and the braking abilities of different types of planes vary.

Icy conditions came into play in last month's crash of a Southwest Airlines jet, which skidded off a snowy runway at Chicago's Midway Airport and onto a nearby road. The jet struck a passing car, killing a 6-year-old boy.

Among the issues being investigated are the condition of the runway and the information passed to pilots by controllers, says Keith Holloway, a spokesman for the National Transportation Safety Board.

Pilots and investigators have long complained that pilots aren't given enough information about slippery runways, accident records show. It "can be a life-and-death matter," says Bernard Loeb, ex-chief of the NTSB's aviation division.

Most of the cases reviewed by USA TODAY occurred during winter months. No one was injured.

The NTSB has issued recommendations for a better system since 1982, when two passengers died at Boston's Logan International Airport when a World Airways DC-10 skidded off the end of an icy runway and broke apart.

"We don't really have a good standardized method to determine if the runway is contaminated," says Capt. Mitchell Serber, a pilot who specializes in runway safety for the Air Line Pilots Association.

The Federal Aviation Administration, which regulates airlines and airports, has sought better ways to inform pilots about slippery runways, spokeswoman Laura Brown says. She says there is no practical way with current technology to create a more standardized system.

Youths Support Abstinence As Sex Education (WT)

By Jennifer Harper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 22, 2006

Critics of abstinence-only sex-education programs may be too hasty in judgment. There is support for the method among age groups that count -- the young.

According to a new Harris Poll, 56 percent of people ages 18 to 24, and 60 percent of those 25 to 29 think abstinence programs effectively reduce or prevent the occurrence of HIV/AIDS. Another 49 percent of people ages 18 to 24 and 52 percent of those ages 25 to 29 say the programs reduce or prevent unwanted pregnancies.

Among six age groups and three political groups, younger respondents showed the strongest support for abstinence over safe-sex programs.

"The most striking, and surely the most important differences among various demographic groups are the differences between younger and older adults," the poll states. "Adults under the age of 30 are more likely to believe that abstinence programs are effective, and it is of course these adults who are the main targets for the programs."

Indeed, the poll found that 43 percent of 30- to 39-year-olds felt abstinence programs were effective against HIV/AIDS; the number fell to 41 percent among those 40 to 49, 37 percent among those 50 to 64 and 31 percent for those older than 65.

Older people less often agreed that the programs were effective against pregnancy -- ranging between 30 percent to 33 percent among those from 40-plus to more than 65 years.

The findings also had a partisan divide.

Among Republicans, 50 percent felt abstinence programs were effective against HIV/AIDS and 46 percent felt they countered unwanted pregnancies. Among Democrats, the numbers were 39 percent and 28 percent, respectively. Among independents, the numbers were 34 and 32.

The poll of 1,961 adults was conducted Dec. 8-14..

The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services set aside $31 million two years ago to help 50 communities in 22 states and the District develop abstinence-only education programs. A first-year review by HHS revealed a cultural change: Majorities of the participants had experienced a change in attitude.

The agency found that students had become more supportive of abstinence and less supportive of teen sex, with a keener awareness of the consequences for risky behavior.

Researchers at Ohio's Case Western Reserve University School of Medicine had similar findings after they examined the effectiveness of For Keeps, an abstinence-until-marriage program for 25,000 students in Cleveland.

"Abstinence-only intervention can influence knowledge, beliefs and intentions, and among sexually experienced students may reduce the prevalence of casual sex," said epidemiologist Elaine Borawski.

DOJ_NMG_0010147

"Kissing is Good," an investigation of youthful sexual behavior released last month by the University of Tennessee, found that teens who only kissed had "better relationships" with one another -- and in future romances.

Illinois Amputee Among 10 Post-9/11 Veterans Making Runs For Congress (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, January 23, 2006

ELK GROVE VILLAGE, Ill. — The lunchtime crowd is thinning at Portillo's Hot Dogs near O'Hare Airport when the candidate arrives. Leaning on a cane, she moves slowly on her $120,000 bionic legs with a stooped and halting stride. "Hi! I'm Tammy Duckworth, the Iraq war veteran running for Congress. You might have heard of me?" she says, extending her mangled right arm to shake hands.

Indeed, many here in Chicago's western suburbs have already heard of the Illinois National Guard helicopter pilot who lost both legs and full use of her right arm when a rocket-propelled grenade hit her Blackhawk in a 2004 attack in Iraq.

Maj. Ladda "Tammy" Duckworth, 37, spent nearly a year at Washington's Walter Reed Army Medical Center, and her rehabilitation has been chronicled in national media, including USA TODAY.

Duckworth is the only seriously wounded combat veteran running this year for Congress, whose ranks of members with military experience are at their lowest since World War II, according to Congressional Quarterly.

But at least nine other veterans who served in the post-Sept. 11 military have announced House bids. All but one — Republican Van Taylor in Texas — are Democrats who have criticized the Bush administration's conduct of the war. They join dozens of older veterans from both parties touting military credentials as U.S. troops head into a fourth year in Iraq.

Veterans have long returned from battle to continue their public service in politics, but the current field of candidates with military experience may be the largest since World War II.

The new candidates reflect their times. Support for the war, and the Republican administration behind it, is at its lowest: 61% disapprove of President Bush's handling of Iraq, according to a mid-December USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll.

Duckworth says it was "a bad decision" to invade Iraq. So she is competing on another field of battle: politics. She hopes to succeed retiring Rep. Henry Hyde, a Republican who has held a House seat for more than 30 years. Duckworth must first beat two other Democrats in a primary and then take on Peter Roskam, a Republican state senator in the GOP-leaning district.

Duckworth says politics doesn't compare to what she's already overcome. She recalled the "nightmare" of Nov. 12, 2004, when crewmates struggled to carry her maimed body to safety, dropping her because her gushing blood made her too slippery.

"They gave me a second chance at life," she said, choking back tears, during an interview. "I've just got to do something — just to be more."

John Szeliga, 29, a salesman here, is the kind of voter Duckworth and her fellow veterans-turned-candidates hope to attract. "Her story is pretty cool," he said. "Being a veteran, crashing a helicopter, now running for Congress. Not too many people do that."

At least not lately. One in four House members and fewer than one in three senators have served in the military, Congressional Quarterly says. In the USA, 12% are veterans, the Census Bureau says.

After World War II, future presidents John Kennedy and Richard Nixon were among veterans who ran for Congress almost as soon as they got home. It took more than a decade for Vietnam veterans, many of whom were reviled for their role in the unpopular war, to get into national politics. Today, their ranks include Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and John Kerry, D-Mass.

Republicans tried in 1992 to recruit Persian Gulf War veterans to challenge Democrats who opposed ousting Saddam Hussein from Kuwait. Few answered the call.

Today, Democrats lead the recruiting drive, focusing on GOP-majority districts where being strong on defense plays well.

The numbers of veterans running as Democrats are all the more remarkable given a Military Times Poll late last year that found 56% of active-duty troops consider themselves Republicans and 13% are Democrats.

"Since Vietnam, the Democratic Party has been viewed as the weaker on national security issues," University of Virginia political scientist Larry Sabato says. "Who better to make the case than veterans of the war? It's hard to accuse them of a lack of patriotism."

DOJ_NMG_0010148

Democrats thought they inoculated themselves when they nominated Kerry, a Vietnam combat veteran, for president in 2004, only to see his military record picked apart over his later anti-war activities.

Being a veteran isn't enough, says Stuart Rothenberg, editor of the independent Rothenberg Political Report. He says some Democrats have rallied around political novices with military experience after they couldn't attract more experienced candidates.

"A strategy based merely on recruiting veterans, even Iraq war veterans, overemphasizes a single credential," Rothenberg says.

Carl Forti, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, agrees. "You also have to be a good candidate," he says.

Still, some Democrats took heart from a special House election in August, when Iraq combat veteran Paul Hackett lost by fewer than 4,000 votes in an Ohio district that went 64% for Bush in 2004.

The Republican who beat him, Jean Schmidt, helped rally Democrats in November during a heated House floor speech. She said a constituent asked her to tell Rep. Jack Murtha, D-Pa., a decorated veteran who has called for troop withdrawals in Iraq, that "cowards cut and run, Marines never do."

"When Schmidt called Jack Murtha a coward, she called each and every one of us a coward," says Eric Massa, a former military aide to Gen. Wesley Clark, who is challenging Rep. Randy Kuhl, R-N.Y.

Massa and Duckworth are among the "Fighting Democrats" party leaders hope will help recapture the House after 12 years of GOP rule. Some have formed a political action committee (www.bandofbrothers2006.org) to support veteran-candidates and fight back against conservative campaigns like the ones that targeted Sen. Max Cleland. The Georgia Democrat, who lost three limbs in Vietnam, was defeated in 2002 by Republican Saxby Chambliss, who ran ads picturing Cleland with Osama bin Laden.

Cleland says there is "a disquiet in the gut" of returning veterans. "They want to come back and tell the truth about Iraq," he says.

The Democratic veterans differ on domestic issues but contend the Bush administration failed to provide enough troops, armor and planning in Iraq and has no strategy to get out. Some, such as Duckworth, say troops should be withdrawn gradually. Others, such as Patrick Murphy, a military lawyer who served in Baghdad and is challenging Rep. Michael Fitzpatrick, R-Pa., favor a timeline for withdrawal.

"They can't give us a snow job," says Murphy, 32. "We've seen with our own eyes."

The candidates insist they are not one-issue politicians. Chris Carney, a Naval reservist who served as a special adviser at the Pentagon two years ago, says he decided to run against Rep. Don Sherwood, R-Pa., last March at the height of the right-to-die controversy over Terri Schiavo.

"I didn't think it was Congress' business" to get involved with the brain-damaged woman's fate, he says. "That was the final straw of politics at the extreme."

It was no accident, either, that Duckworth's first campaign speech was on a subject of great interest in her upper-middle-class district: taxes targeting the affluent. "If I suck you in here because of my legs, that's great," she said. "Now let's talk about the really important stuff to people in my district."

Rothenberg calls Duckworth "one of the stronger" veterans running. Her story and charismatic personality first caught Democrats' attention soon after she arrived at the Army rehab hospital in Washington. It was there that Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the Democrats' No. 2 leader, first met her and invited her to attend last year's State of the Union address.

"Seeing the pageantry of what I had just given up my legs for was very emotional," she recalls. Duckworth returned to Capitol Hill in March to testify about veterans' care and was struck by "the need to have more people serving in Congress who've been there."

When Durbin asked her to run last summer, she thought, "It's my generation's turn to step forward."

The national party's enthusiasm for Duckworth wasn't matched, at least initially, among local Democrats, who noted she lives 3 miles outside the district. The Constitution requires only that representatives live in the state, and Duckworth says she is "emotionally attached" to her house, which was modified for her wheelchair.

DOJ_NMG_0010149

Before Duckworth got in the race, local Democrats had backed Christine Cegelis, a computer consultant who won 44% of the vote against Hyde in 2004. But Cegelis has raised little money and lacks Duckworth's "star power," University of Illinois-Springfield political scientist Kent Redfield says.

Wheaton College professor Lindy Scott is also running in the primary.

Roskam says that after "knocking on 3,500 doors," he believes Iraq isn't a "resonant theme" for voters.

But at a recent meeting in Schaumburg, Democratic activists sat raptly as Duckworth rattled off stories about Iraq, including how U.S. forces gave body armor to Iraqi troops just before missions so they wouldn't sell it to insurgents.

The next day, even Cegelis admitted Duckworth's war stories were "extremely compelling," noting they opened her eyes to what is happening in Iraq. Still, she says the move to field veterans instead of more liberal candidates who she believes would appeal to the party's base is "about symbols, and that's very disappointing."

Democratic committeeman Rocco Terranova says that although many "were a little disenchanted" when Duckworth was drafted into the race, they've adjusted.

"She's a war hero," he says, "and the war's on everybody's mind."

Fixing Children's Services (NYT)

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

In a city that has seen child abuse fatalities before, the death of Nixzmary Brown, just 7 years old, was a particularly horrifying one. She endured what may have been months of torture and starvation while in the care of her stepfather and mother, finally succumbing after a beating that police said was prompted by a missing container of yogurt. What raised the level of outrage was the disclosure that city workers inexplicably ignored or bungled opportunities to save her.

It's reassuring that Mayor Michael Bloomberg acknowledged the city's failures, and that child welfare workers and supervisors involved in the case have been suspended or reassigned. Some may lose their jobs. A larger investigation will take place and thousands of cases are being reviewed. The self-examination, though, cannot stop there.

Within about two months of Nixzmary's death, three other children, also known to New York's department of child welfare, died in the care of their parents. All four lived in Brooklyn. Three - including Nixzmary - were handled by the Administration for Children's Services office in Bedford-Stuyvesant. One toddler drowned in a bathtub while his mother listened to music in the next room. Police say another child was fatally beaten by her father, and in another case a baby was reportedly squeezed until his ribs broke. It all recalls a time a decade ago when Elisa Izquierdo, a 6-year-old who had been repeatedly abused, was killed by her mother, and the city, in response to the outcry, created Children's Services.

The public is always rightfully enraged when one of these awful deaths occurs because the government was indifferent to the needs of its most fragile citizens. But perhaps it is even worse - certainly it is more frustrating - when the city seems to have been trying hard to meet its obligations. Since the death of Elisa Izquierdo, New York has devoted an increasing amount of attention and money to protecting children at risk. The Bloomberg administration - which has shielded Children's Services from budget cuts it demanded from other city agencies last fall - says that caseworkers are not overburdened. Each handles a load of fewer than 12 cases at a time, the city says, well below a national standard of about 15.

Some employees at Children's Services point to the city's very strong policy of trying to keep even very troubled families intact as a source of tension. The idea that even parents who are potential abusers may be allowed to keep their children is troubling, except to those who remember the many ruined lives that emerged from the foster care system back when city workers were urged to remove children from any doubtful home. Perhaps the balance needs to be readjusted, but there are no perfect solutions when it comes to this kind of choice.

However hard New York has tried, the very fact that City Hall has announced it will be hiring 525 additional child-protection workers suggests more can be done. And while Children's Services was progressing, the improvement seemed to bypass the office in Bedford-Stuyvesant. That is an old story: a troubled corner of an agency with a high-stress mission, a place where bad workers are dumped while most good employees flee as soon as possible. And the last chapter is almost always a terrible one.

Iran Warns Against UN Referral (FT)

By Roula Khalaf And Gareth Smyth In Tehran

DOJ_NMG_0010150

Financial Times, January 23, 2006

Iran's top nuclear official on Sunday warned Tehran would resume efforts to enrich uranium on an industrial scale if its case was reported to the UN Security Council, further raising the stakes in the crisis over its nuclear programme.

Tehran earlier this month moved to resume nuclear research, including some small-scale enrichment. But Ali Larijani, secretary of the Supreme National Security Council, which handles the nuclear issue, said in an interview with the Financial Times that a referral to the United Nations would force Tehran to broaden significantly the scale of such work.

"If the case goes to the Security Council, we're obliged . . . to lift all voluntary measures," he said, specifying that this included industrial-scale uranium enrichment.

The European Union and US have been pushing to get Iran's case reported to the UN Security Council since Tehran announced it would restart its nuclear research two weeks ago. The US and European governments consider the move a breach of a 2004 agreement with Iran.

A referral could come as soon as next week at an extraordinary session of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the governing board of the UN's nuclear watchdog. Such a move could lead eventually to sanctions.

The US and EU argue that involving the Security Council would strengthen the IAEA's hand. But Mr Larijani's warning appears designed to show that greater diplomatic pressure would instead undermine both the IAEA's work and attempts to curtail Iran's programme.

Iran has always intended to develop industrial-scale uranium enrichment, which can be used for nuclear reactors or atomic weapons, but stopped all preparatory work during two-year talks with Europeans.

Nuclear experts say assembling enough centrifuges and preparing for industrial production could still take years.

Mr Larijani spoke at the start of a week of intense diplomacy. European officials will visit capitals represented on the 35-member IAEA governing board to lobby for an EU-backed resolution on referral.

Meanwhile, Mr Larijani is likely to be in Moscow to discuss a Russian proposal to find a compromise, an effort to forestall the Europeans or at least temper the tone of any IAEA resolution.

Moscow has proposed a joint venture to enrich uranium on Russian soil for use in Iranian reactors. In his interview Mr Larijani said the proposal "had to become complete. Gaps have to be filled.

"We have to see what potential this idea has for being productive," he said.

"There are two issues to be considered: one is Iran's right to enrichment, and the other is non-diversion [of nuclear material to weapons].

"Any solution should be consistent with these two considerations. The scale, extent and timing can all be discussed."

Iran Mocks West Over 'N-weapon Design' Request (FT)

Financial Times, January 23, 2006

Iraq's top security official on Sunday ridiculed western governments' request for a document said to show a weapons design obtained from the illegal nuclear procurement network of Pakistani scientist A.Q. Khan, and suggested Tehran would not hand it over to UN inspectors.

"If you can find anyone in the world who can make a bomb with one and a half pages, we will cover their whole body with gold," Ali Larijani, secretary of the Supreme National Security Council, told the FT.

According to the International Atomic Energy Agency, the UN watchdog, in January 2005 Iran showed the agency a document it received in 1987 on casting enriched uranium into "hemispherical forms", a design consistent with weapons production.

Iran says the document was offered by the procurement network without Iran requesting it.

European diplomats argue the document, which Iran refused to give to UN inspectors, backs up suspicions Tehran has nuclear weapons ambitions – something it has always denied. The request for the document was included in letters sent by the five permanent members of the UN Security Council to Iran earlier this month. But Mr Larijani said the document was "not important" and those seeking it merely wanted to use it as "propaganda" against Tehran.

The spat over the document reflects the frustration of IAEA inspectors at the pace of Iranian co-operation.

DOJ_NMG_0010151

Mr Larijani – who travelled to Vienna last week to meet Mohamed ElBaradei, the IAEA director – said Iran was determined to keep close relations with the agency. But he said "there should be a limit" to demands for access to military sites, particularly as Iran had already allowed inspectors into "more than 20" military installations.

Mr Larijani argued Iran was not to blame for the breakdown in talks with the so-called EU3 – France, Germany and the UK. He said the aim of the negotiations had been finding "objective guarantees" Iran could not divert material from its nuclear programme for weapons use, and that Tehran had therefore agreed to suspend all uranium enrichment activities while talks continued.

"After two and a half years, the Europeans came up with a proposal that covered everything apart from nuclear fuel production," he said. "At this point, we distrusted them."

European officials say the talks' failure and Iran's recent resumption of nuclear research have left them no choice but to report the case to the Security Council, where they want a more authoritative call on Tehran to co-operate with the IAEA and resume the suspension.

But Mr Larijani said there was "no international consensus" against Iran, despite European confidence of a majority at the 35-member IAEA board meeting due on February 2-3. He suggested Europe would lose as much as Iran from escalation. While playing down reports Iran was moving financial assets out of European banks – he said such transfers occured all the time – Mr Larijani said Europe could put at risk economic interests in Iran, including in the energy sector. "Isolation is not without problems [for us], but it also makes problems for others," he said. "This is a lose-lose game and we don't recommend it."

West Talks Tough With Iran, Treads Lightly (WSJ)

By Carla Anne Robbins, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As U.S. and European officials press to have Iran brought before the United Nations Security Council, they are also promising that Tehran won't face serious punishment there -- for quite a while.

Iran has few friends left after deciding to resume efforts to enrich uranium, a process that could advance it a big step closer to being able to build a nuclear weapon. But there are reasons the move toward international penalties might not be swift. As the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries' second-largest producer, Iran has considerable economic leverage. It also may benefit from the "Iraq effect." There is widespread anxiety that any U.N. action -- unless carefully constrained -- could open the door for another U.S.-led war.

Even as they press for a showdown with Tehran, American officials privately acknowledge that they aren't sure how to calibrate political or economic sanctions to bring maximum pressure on Iran's leadership without alienating the country's pro-reform and pro-American public. In recent weeks, officials in Washington and London have begun thinking about an aggressive public-relations campaign, beamed into Iran, to counteract Tehran's certain efforts to incite a strong nationalist backlash.

Explicit and perceived threats have been ping-ponging across the Mideast and Europe, with the Bush administration sounding comparatively more restrained.

Iran said Friday that it is pressing OPEC to cut oil production, and its officials have offered conflicting accounts of whether they have started pulling currency from overseas banks to avoid sanctions. In a speech on France's nuclear deterrent last week, President Jacques Chirac warned that any state considering using "terrorist means against us" might face a nuclear response -- a threat some saw as directed at Tehran. And Israel's defense minister warned that his country "will not be able to accept an Iranian nuclear capability."

U.S. and European officials say they expect to win a solid majority of votes for a referral to the U.N. when the 35-member board of the International Atomic Energy Agency meets in Vienna early next month. The Russians are still arguing for postponing action at least until March, and Western diplomats say they have yet to decide whether it would be better to wait for Moscow's vote with no guarantee that it will ever materialize.

Hoping to calm anxieties, British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw has repeatedly pledged that military action against Iran is "not an option" for either Britain or the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0010152

American officials have been less definitive, but they, too, have been emphasizing that pressure on Iran will be applied "gradually" and "incrementally," and that any real discussion of sanctions is likely still months down the road.

How Iran will react is hard to predict. For two years, it has managed to sidestep a referral with a series of last-minute concessions. And the Russians are still offering -- with U.S. and European support -- a compromise that would have Iran's uranium processed into low-enriched power-plant fuel on Russian soil.

Iran says its program is peaceful. But hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has made clear his disdain for international opinion and shown little interest in Moscow's proposal. His government, which earned billions of dollars in oil revenue last year, is also getting richer, as each defiant statement drives up prices on the international oil market. If the crisis gets hotter, Iran runs the risk of driving away other business. In a possible sign of that, a spokesman for UBS AG said the Swiss bank would cease doing business with customers in Iran.

Abbas Milani, an expert on Iran's politics at Stanford University's Hoover Institution, says Iranian government officials believe "they've already bought the Chinese and Russians" with oil and other financial deals. And "they believe if the price of oil goes high enough, the Europeans will back down."

U.S. and European officials have begun preliminary discussions about strategy once Iran's case is referred to the Security Council. The pace of any action, they say, will likely be driven by Tehran's response: whether it signals an interest in compromise, or makes good on its threats to stop cooperating with U.N. arms inspectors or to begin large-scale enrichment.

In the current environment, the likely first step would be either a presidential statement (less formal but requires the consensus of all 15 Security Council members) or a resolution (which requires nine votes and no veto). Either would call on Iran to suspend uranium enrichment, return to negotiations with the Europeans, and provide fuller access and answers to IAEA inspectors.

Given the nervousness of veto-wielding members China and Russia, this first effort is unlikely to include any, even generic, threat of punishment. But U.S. and European diplomats say they are likely to press for the first resolution to be brought under the U.N. Charter's Chapter VII, which gives the Security Council power to compel action by member states to "restore international peace and security." With memories of the Iraq debate ever present, Russia, China or other council members may resist, fearful that Chapter VII could be the first step toward an "all-necessary-means" resolution, opening the door to military action.

If Iran fails to comply, officials say, there could still be one or more resolutions warning of possible punishments, without imposing any. One senior U.S. official notes that it took eight months and two resolutions for the Security Council to threaten Syria last fall with possible "further action," if it failed to cooperate with the investigation into the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. The council has yet to impose any punishments in that case.

As for what sanctions the U.S. and Europe might press for, officials say they could start with a travel ban for key government leaders and a ban on sales to Iran's nuclear and missile programs and any front companies. A difficult question, however, would be whether to prohibit further Russian involvement in Iran's nearly completed civilian nuclear-power plant at Bushehr. Beyond Moscow's likely resistance, diplomats say, the move would play into Tehran's claim that the West is trying to deprive the country of peaceful nuclear power.

The U.S. and Europe might also argue for a freeze of financial assets for key government figures, and a ban on sales of military and dual-use items. Stiffer penalties might include bans on investments in Iran's oil industry or even sales of oil and gas equipment.

Whether Russia or China would go along is unknown. Three years after the IAEA referred North Korea to the Security Council, the council has yet to act because of Chinese opposition. U.S. and European officials also acknowledge they don't know which, if any, of these pressures is likely to get Tehran to blink.

Mr. Milani from the Hoover Institution is arguing for "smart sanctions": cracking down on the government's finances, and military- and nuclear-related trade, while encouraging significantly more contact and trade with Iran's civil society, in hopes of sparking a democratic movement. He acknowledges that such a policy would be politically difficult for the U.S. to put into practice, especially amid the standoff, and it could take years to produce results.

He is skeptical that any outside pressure, short of a full ban on Iran's gasoline imports and oil and gas exports, would persuade Mr. Ahmadinejad and the clerical establishment to curtail their nuclear ambitions.

Iraq's Sadr Says His Militia Will Support Iran (REU)

Reuters, January 23, 2006

TEHRAN, Jan 22 (Reuters) - Firebrand Iraqi cleric Moqtada al-Sadr has assured Iran that his Shi'ite Muslim militiamen will support the Islamic Republic if it comes under attack, the official IRNA news agency reported on Sunday.

Although the United States and Israel have said they prefer diplomacy as a means to solve a dispute over Iran's atomic programme, they have not ruled out military options.

Washington accuses Iran of seeking nuclear weapons, a charge Tehran denies.

"If neighbouring Islamic countries, including Iran, should come under attack, then the Mehdi Army will support them," Sadr said on a visit to Tehran.

Sadr's Mehdi Army militia rose up against U.S. occupying forces in Iraq in 2004.

In Iran, Sadr has met Ali Larijani, secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, and Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki.

In Iran, Power Written In Stone (WP)

By Karl Vick

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

PERSEPOLIS, Iran -- Wearing a stocking cap and an air of indignation, Mohammad Ahmadi pointed to the wall in front of him. It bore a splendid frieze dating from early in the millennia-long span of Iran's existence -- as a nation, an empire or simply a group of people who speak the same language.

"These are Armenians," Ahmadi said of three figures carved in vivid profile, one leading a horse. "They were bringing gifts to the king of Iran 2,500 years ago. And now they have a nuclear power plant.

"Do you want to see the Indians?" he said, indicating a lower column. "They didn't have shoes. Now they have nine nuclear plants.

"I am not a political person. I only finished high school, and I do not have much knowledge. But if I think like this, imagine how the others think."

If any doubt remains that Iranians support their government in its quest to harness the atom, the answer comes quickly and emphatically in Persepolis, the magnificent ruins that symbolize the ancient pride and fading glory bound up with the nuclear issue here.

Ordinary Iranians overwhelmingly favor their country's nuclear ambitions, interviews and surveys show. The support runs deep in the population of 68 million, cutting across differences of education, age and, most significantly, attitudes toward the fundamentalist government that the Bush administration says is intent on using an energy program as a cover for developing atomic weapons.

"Look at all this civilization!" said Mehrdad Khanban, 23, the sweep of his arm taking in the towering pillars and regal staircases of the stone city founded by Darius the Great in about 518 B.C. in the southern corner of Iran first known as Persia. "What has George Bush got? And he's telling Iranians what to do?"

Interviews with Iranians touring the ruins on a holiday weekend here suggest the breadth of the challenge facing Western powers determined to freeze Iran's recently reactivated nuclear program. The Tehran government this month ended a two-year moratorium on nuclear research by removing seals placed on uranium enrichment equipment by the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. watchdog on nuclear power. In the diplomatic flurry that followed, European and U.S. officials began maneuvering toward referring Tehran to the U.N. Security Council, which could impose sanctions.

The threat has had no visible effect here.

"We will cope," Khanban said with a shrug. A soccer coach from the city of Karaj, near Tehran, he said he was no fan of Iran's ruling clerics or its hard-line president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, whose fiery rhetoric against Israel has alarmed many outside the country. But Khanban separated Iran's government from its aspiration to produce nuclear power -- bad news for Western diplomats who hope to cleave Iran's government from its people on the nuclear issue, perhaps through so-called smart sanctions such as restrictions on official travel abroad.

DOJ_NMG_0010154

"There are so many people who don't like our government, who do not like it at all," Khanban said. "But they do not want this country to be ruled by foreigners. Like Iraq, for example."

"Everyone is united on this," said Rahimeh Goodarzi, 52, clutching her enveloping black chador to her chin at an exhibit of artifacts. "We love our country."

Many Iranians also emphasized that their enthusiasm was for nuclear power, not weapons.

"We really want it. Every country should have it. But I don't think it should be used for military purposes," said Parisa, 28, who was visiting from nearby Shiraz. Enjoying the sun on a stone slab, she declined to provide her surname after criticizing the government. "Everybody I know says they want it, but they want it for peaceful purposes."

Iran's copious oil and gas reserves will eventually run out, Parisa said, and in any case petroleum has brought little good to the people. "It's black magic," she said. Per capita statistics show ordinary Iranians are less well off than they were 30 years ago, and many see investment in technology, including nuclear research, as a revival of development that had slowed in Iran in recent decades.

"If you look at this place, you realize that 2,500 years ago Iranians were very advanced, more than other people," said Abolghasem Fotoohi, 32, an engineer from the eastern city of Mashhad. "Any Iranian would like his country to improve, and then we would not need other countries. We could stand by ourselves."

Arta Menhadji, who studied metallurgy but works as a soccer coach, found an example in the museum tucked in the center of the ruins, guarded by huge sculptures of a beast with the body of a bull, the wings of a bird and the head of a bearded man. One exhibit showed a bowl used for melting metal in ancient times.

"At the moment, we haven't got much to talk about in metallurgy, especially compared to America. A nuclear industry would involve some things related to that," he said.

"Yes, it's obvious," Khanban said. "I mean, look at this place. At the time it was built, there was no America. See where we were then and where we are now. And see where they were then and where they are now."

Inside the museum, Aboozar Ghalenoi, 24, pointed out a framed declaration. Translated from cuneiform, it was attributed to Xerxes, the son of Darius who ushered Persepolis to a glory that survived only until the city was sacked by Alexander the Great in 330 B.C.

"I am not hot-tempered," the text declared. "What things develop my anger, I hold firmly under control by my thinking power. I am firmly ruling over my impulses."

"Did you read that and know that Iranians are not after nuclear weapons?" Ghalenoi asked. "All the great people of Iran have always spoken about peace. We need nuclear power for electricity and for medical uses.

"But countries like Israel, that's not what they want," he went on. "They want to use it against people. Unfortunately, the Americans support them."

The shift from civilian to military came easily, at least in conversation.

"You see, Israel has got so many of them," said Mohsen Seddighi, carrying his daughter on his shoulders. "And even Jacques Chirac is saying: If any country attacks us, we're going to use it. So why shouldn't we have it?"

At the company he works for, a domestic airline, "99 percent, even 100 percent of people are together on this," Seddighi said. "For civilian use."

Iran: Israel Engaged In 'Childish Game' (AP)

By Nasser Karimi, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 23, 2006

Iran said Sunday that Israel would be making a "fatal mistake" if it takes military action against Tehran's nuclear program and dismissed veiled threats from the Jewish state as a "childish game."

On Saturday, Israel repeated that it would not accept a nuclear Iran under any circumstances and was preparing for the possible failure of diplomatic efforts.

While Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz stopped short of an outright threat of military action, he said Israel "must have the capability to defend itself...and this we are preparing."

DOJ_NMG_0010155

Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Hamid Reza Asefi said Israel was only trying to add to Western pressure on Iran to give up its nuclear program.

"We consider Mofaz's comments a form of psychological warfare. Israel knows just how much of a fatal mistake it would be (to attack Iran)," Asefi told reporters. "This is just a childish game by Israel."

Israel views Iran as its biggest threat and has joined Washington in accusing Tehran of trying to building nuclear weapons. Iran says its nuclear program is for electricity generation.

German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier cautioned Sunday against a "militarization of thinking" on how to keep Iran from developing nuclear weapons.

"Rather, we should see that we use and exhaust to the best of our powers the diplomatic solutions that remain available," Steinmeier said in an ARD television interview.

Israel, whose warplanes destroyed an unfinished Iraqi reactor in 1981, maintains a nuclear monopoly in the Middle East. While it neither acknowledges nor denies nuclear arms, Israel is thought to have about 200 nuclear warheads deployed on ballistic missiles, aircraft and submarines, according to the Washington-based Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

Asefi's threats were not limited to Israel, and he warned European powers to resume talks.

"We advise them (Europe) not to choose any path except dialogue. If there is a retribution to be paid, that will include Europe too," Asefi said, adding that Iran plans to continue cooperation with the UN nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Last week, European powers drafted a resolution calling for Iran's referral to the U.N Security Council to resolve its nuclear issue. The resolution stopped short of calling for sanctions.

Several days later, French President Jacques Chirac said France could respond with nuclear weapons against any state-sponsored terror attack — comments seen by some as a reference to Iran.

Iran's nuclear dispute with the West intensified when it removed U.N. seals from its main uranium enrichment facility in Natanz, central Iran, on Jan. 10 and resumed research on nuclear fuel — including small-scale enrichment — after a 2 1/2-year freeze.

The removal of the seals alarmed Western capitals, where Iran is suspected of using its civilian nuclear program as a cover to develop an atomic bomb.

Iran has repeatedly said it is willing to offer guarantees that its nuclear program will not be used to manufacture weapons but it has so far refused to give up its right under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty to enrich uranium and produce nuclear fuel — usable either in reactors or weapons.

Also Sunday, an estimated 1,000 athletes and staff from the government's physical education organization formed a human chain at a nuclear fuel research center in central city of Isfahan, declaring support for Iran's nuclear program.

For the second time in two days, Iran on Sunday denied that it was withdrawing foreign currency reserves from European banks.

"Iran's foreign currency reserves will be kept in all banks we trust in the world, including European and non-European banks," the Central Bank said.

On Friday, Iran's Students News Agency reported that Iran's Central Bank governor said Iran had begun moving its foreign currency reserves to an undisclosed location — a move seen as an attempt by Tehran to protect is resources against possible U.N. Security Council sanctions.

Estimates put Iranian funds in Europe at as much as $50 billion.

Mofaz Threatens To Halt Iran's Nuke Plans (WT)

By Abraham Rabinovich, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 23, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Israel's defense minister hinted strongly over the weekend that his country would act unilaterally if necessary to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0010156

Shaul Mofaz, who hails from the same hometown as Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, also warned the Iranian leader that his policies risked bringing destruction to his own people.

"I want to address President Ahmadinejad, who is from the city where I was born," said Mr. Mofaz at the opening session Saturday of the Herzliya Conference, an annual strategic seminar.

"I address you as someone who leads his country with an ideology of hate, terror and anti-Semitism. I suggest you look at history and see what happened to others who tried to wipe out the Jewish people. In the end, they brought destruction on their own people."

Mr. Mofaz said Israel was relying "at present" on international efforts to forestall Iran's nuclear efforts, but suggested that it would take the matter into its own hands if necessary.

"Israel is not prepared to accept the nuclear arming of Iran and it must prepare to defend itself, with all that that implies," he said.

The warning was the sharpest yet by an Israeli leader. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who remains in a coma after a stroke three weeks ago, had been circumspect on the subject, saying the issue was not one on which Israel was taking the lead.

Maj. Gen. Dan Halutz, head of the Israeli armed forces, was cautious when asked to respond to Mr. Mofaz' remarks.

"I am not going to deal with the solutions to the Iranian nuclear problem," he said. "Israel is not helpless -- that it is enough of an answer."

Iran's state-controlled news agency quoted Foreign Ministry spokesman Hamid Reza Asefi as dismissing the Israeli remarks as part of "a psychological war" and as "child's play."

Both Mr. Mofaz and Mr. Ahmadinejad hail from the city of Garmsar, southeast of Tehran, which Mr. Mofaz left at age 9 with his family in 1957 to emigrate to Israel. Mr. Ahmadinejad was born there in 1956, so the pair apparently resided in proximity for a year.

Mr. Mofaz's mention of his Iranian roots might have been intended to counter Mr. Ahmadinejad's call for Israelis to be "sent back" to Europe. Half of Israeli Jews hail from the Muslim world, including Iran.

In addition to Mr. Mofaz, Israeli President Moshe Katsav was born in Iran, as was a former Air Force commander, Eitan Ben-Eliyahu. Gen. Halutz, the present chief of staff, has partial Iranian roots as well.

Mr. Mofaz's remarks were sharply criticized by some Israelis, including a former Likud Defense Minister Moshe Arens.

"This issue is too sensitive for public threats," he said.

The Likud chairman of the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee, Yuval Steinitz, accused Mr. Mofaz of electioneering.

A Slow Iran Squeeze (TIME)

By elaine shannon

Time, January 23, 2006

As Iran shows noÂ signs of giving in to global calls to cease its nuclear-research activities, Western nations have been mapping out a careful, incremental plan to stop Tehran. The West's plan is informally known to diplomats as the frog strategy-- with no disrespect to the French, who are among its key tacticians. The name refers to the old saw that if you want to boil a frog, you put the unsuspecting amphibian in a pot of cold water. "This time it will be an Iranian frog," says a European diplomat. "The strategy is to heat slowly but steadily and try to keep the frog inside."

The plan was crafted by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her French, German and British counterparts. The E.U. trio requested a meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency, now set for Feb. 2, to consider referring Iran to the U.N. Security Council. If the case goes there, the allies plan a three-step approach: first, a mild resolution exhorting Tehran to end its questionable atomic activity voluntarily. If after two or three months Iran remains intransigent, they would then propose a stronger Security Council order based on the U.N.'s authority to combat threats to international peace. Step three would call for targeted sanctions, such as a freeze on government bank accounts a possibility for which Tehran apparently began planning last week when it started to shift its foreign-currency reserves from E.U. banks.

DOJ_NMG_0010157

The frog strategy may infuriate U.S. hard-liners who argue that it does little to hinder Iran's nuclear work right now. But proponents say that only the go-slow approach can win support from Russia and China. "The diplomacy with the Russians and the Chinese is very intense," says a key official. Rice, scheduled to travel to London next week for a conference on Afghanistan, may stop first in Moscow for talks with Russian officials. She needs Moscow's backing to win Beijing's--and ultimately to gain Iran's compliance. As for a step four to the strategy, there is no clear one yet: an uncooperative frog is something nobody wants to talk about.

UBS Halts Iran Business, Citing Risks Facing Nation (WSJ)

A Wall Street Journal News Roundup

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2006

UBS AG said yesterday that it will stop doing business with Iran because of the Swiss bank's economic and risk analysis of the situation in the country.

UBS will no longer deal with individuals, companies or state institutions such as Iran's central bank, said bank spokesman Serge Steiner. A similar policy is being implemented in Syria, he said.

Mr. Steiner said that political motives didn't drive the decision. "It's purely a business decision that is taking many factors into account," Mr. Steiner said. The move comes as a global conflict about Iran's nuclear policy heats up.

All existing business with customers in Iran will be canceled, but Iranians in exile aren't affected by the decision, Mr. Steiner said, confirming an article in Swiss weekly SonntagsZeitung.

"It is a carefully prepared measure that has been under consideration since last fall," Mr. Steiner said.

Mr. Steiner declined to specify the volume of business affected by the bank's decision. He said UBS's decision to pull out of Iran had been made after finding that high compliance costs weren't likely to be outweighed by benefits it expected from business with clients in the country.

He rejected the idea that the bank made the decision in order to protect ties with the U.S., one of Tehran's fiercest opponents in the global political arena. UBS does a large part of its business in the U.S.

UBS is the world's largest asset manager, and its rivals will closely watch its decision. Credit Suisse Group, Switzerland's second-biggest bank after UBS, also indicated yesterday that it is considering terminating relationships with Iran. "We are closely looking at the developments and we're increasingly worried," a spokesman said.

Iran faces referral to the United Nations Security Council for possible sanctions, after failing to convince the world its atomic program is peaceful, and the country said on Friday it was moving foreign holdings out of Europe.

U.S. Funds Enter Fray In Palestinian Elections (WP)

By Scott Wilson And Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 22, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- The Bush administration is spending foreign aid money to increase the popularity of the Palestinian Authority on the eve of crucial elections in which the governing party faces a serious challenge from the radical Islamic group Hamas.

The approximately $2 million program is being led by a division of the U.S. Agency for International Development. But no U.S. government logos appear with the projects or events being undertaken as part of the campaign, which bears no evidence of U.S. involvement and does not fall within the definitions of traditional development work.

U.S. officials say their low profile is meant to ensure that the Palestinian Authority receives public credit for a collection of small, popular projects and events to be unveiled before Palestinians select their first parliament in a decade. Internal documents outlining the program describe the effort as "a temporary paradigm shift" in the way the aid agency operates. The plan was designed with the help of a former U.S. Army Special Forces officer who worked in postwar Afghanistan on democracy-building projects.

U.S. and Palestinian officials say they fear the election, scheduled for Wednesday, will result in a large Hamas presence in the 132-seat legislature. Hamas, formally known as the Islamic Resistance Movement, is at war with Israel and is classified by the U.S. government as a terrorist organization. But its reputation for competence and accountability in providing social services has made it a stiff rival of the secular Fatah movement, which runs the Palestinian Authority and has long been the largest party in the Palestinian territories.

The plan's $2 million budget, although a tiny fraction of USAID's work here, is likely more than what any Palestinian party will have spent by election day. A media consultant for Hamas said the organization would likely spend less than $1 million on its campaign.

Elements of the U.S.-funded program include a street-cleaning campaign, distributing free food and water to Palestinians at border crossings, donating computers to community centers and sponsoring a national youth soccer tournament. U.S. officials are coordinating the program through Rafiq Husseini, chief of staff to Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority and leader of Fatah.

In recent days, Arabic-language papers have been filled with U.S.-funded advertisements announcing the events in the name of the Palestinian Authority, which the public closely identifies with Fatah. Some of the events, such as a U.S.-financed tree-planting ceremony here in Ramallah that Abbas attended last week, have resembled Fatah rallies, with participants wearing the trademark black-and-white kaffiyehs emblazoned with the party logo, walls plastered with Fatah candidates' posters, and banks of TV cameras invited to record the event.

"Public outreach is integrated into the design of each project to highlight the role of the P.A. in meeting citizens needs," said a progress report distributed this month to USAID and State Department officials. "The plan is to have events running every day of the coming week, beginning 13 January, such that there is a constant stream of announcements and public outreach about positive happenings all over Palestinian areas in the critical week before the elections."'Window of Opportunity'

The program highlights the central challenge facing the Bush administration as it promotes democracy in the Middle East. Free elections in the Arab world, where most countries have been run for years by unelected autocracies or unchallenged parties like Fatah, often result in strong showings by radical Islamic movements opposed to the policies of the United States and to its chief regional ally, Israel. But in attempting to manage the results, the administration risks undermining the democratic goals it is promoting.

U.S. officials and consultants involved in the program acknowledge that it generated debate inside the aid agency and the two firms hired to manage the project. But U.S. officials said the goal of limiting Hamas's influence in the next Palestinian government overshadowed concerns about the decision not to disclose the U.S. government's role in the campaign.

"We are not favoring any particular party," said James A. Bever, the USAID mission director for the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. "But we do not support parties that are on the terrorism list. We are here to support the democratic process."

Another U.S. official involved in the program said: "I'm not going to apologize for it. I'm proud of the work we've done."

"We weren't trying to be some black-box SWAT operation," said the official, who declined to be named because he was not authorized to speak for the record. "But we want to be able to say we did everything we could to support peaceful coexistence here. There's no tomorrow if we end up with a worsening conflict" after the elections.

Hamas is reaping the benefits of years of grass-roots social work and political organizing in the West Bank and Gaza as it prepares for its first national election. It opposes Israel's right to exist and has vowed to maintain its armed wing, which has carried out attacks and suicide bombings inside Israel and the territories.

The Palestinian Authority, meanwhile, is suffering from a reputation for corruption, divisions within Fatah and a continuing Israeli occupation of the West Bank that has made Abbas's pursuit of a negotiated peace settlement unappealing to many Palestinians. Public opinion polls have shown the race tightening in recent weeks, with Hamas now running even with Fatah.

According to interviews with U.S. and Palestinian officials here and in Washington as well as project documents obtained by The Washington Post, the plan to help promote the Palestinian Authority, and by extension Fatah, began emerging as Israel ended its 38-year occupation of Gaza in August.

"In light of the Israeli disengagement from Gaza, a critical window of opportunity has emerged," stated an October document outlining the scope of the Gaza Action Plan Support Unit, as the program is known. The document, prepared by ARD, a consulting firm based in Burlington, Vt., that was hired to manage the project, said the goal was to "help lay the foundation for successful, moderate leadership in Gaza as well as the West Bank." It listed the Palestinian Authority as its "direct beneficiary."

DOJ_NMG_0010159

Most U.S. development assistance here, which last year totaled roughly $400 million, consists of water pipelines, sewage treatment plants, public libraries and roads, which bear the USAID logo alongside the seal of the Palestinian Authority. But Bever said the agency, which previously wanted to showcase U.S. aid, recently decided to emphasize the Palestinian Authority's role to a greater degree after polls showed a majority of Palestinians are aware of the overall extent of U.S. assistance.Downplaying U.S. Credit

The project is supervised by USAID's Office of Transition Initiatives, which specializes in promoting U.S. interests during times of political change in foreign countries and has the ability to spend money faster than other departments, according to agency officials.

The office hired ARD, which in turn subcontracted the project to a Washington-based firm, Strategic Assessments Initiative, or SAI, known for its largely academic work on issues such as Palestinian security reform. SAI had no experience in development work and had never worked for USAID.

Amjad Atallah, the company's president, said he was not authorized to talk about the project, though he said it raised concerns within his organization. Atallah said he agreed to work on the contract only after USAID agreed to his requests that Palestinian teams work in the field and that the program be coordinated through the office of President Abbas, who is not a candidate in the election.

USAID also brought in an independent consultant, Larry Sampler, to "help us think about how to do this," the U.S. official involved in the program said. Sampler was described by people who know him as an earnest, intense man who served 15 years in the Army Special Forces and worked as a U.S. contractor in Afghanistan.

According to documents from a planning presentation Sampler gave to U.S. officials in Washington and Tel Aviv in October, he raised several questions about how closely the U.S. government should be identified with the project. The documents also suggest that U.S. officials expected the project to become involved in party politics.

"To whom should credit accrue?" Sampler asked in one slide of the presentation. "Issues of branding and how closely associated candidates and parties want to be or should be associated with the USG [U.S. government]. What should be the nature of that relationship?"

Plans called for roughly 40 small projects or events, ranging in cost from $5,000 to $50,000 each, that would benefit the Palestinian Authority. No USAID logos would be used.

Asked if the decision not to use the USAID brand was a way to hide its involvement, Bever said, "I could see it could look that way." He said some of the projects might bear the agency logo, although it was not apparent on those visited by reporters from The Post or in ads published this week.

"We wanted to give maximum credit to the Palestinian Authority and to the freely elected president, Mahmoud Abbas, for taking the initiative and for inviting us to help get the message out to the Palestinian people," Bever said.

The point man in Abbas's office was his chief of staff, Husseini, a member of a prominent Jerusalem family. In an interview last week, Husseini said U.S. officials told him they had about $2 million to spend on 30 or so projects before the elections. He said his office provided them with "names of people who could do this best."

"It was some small money to help us quickly affect the lives of people. It was to show that the Palestinian Authority cares," Husseini said. "They were very responsive and understood we needed to have a better impact."

"Campaigning may come into this, but only marginally," Husseini said. "It is not political campaigning, but campaigning for the Palestinian national cause, as Mahmoud Abbas sees it."

In recent days, the newspapers Al-Ayam and Al-Quds have featured ads for projects described in the Action Plan Support Unit's most recent progress report. On some days, three such ads -- all bearing the seal of the Palestinian Authority but no USAID logo -- appeared on a single page.

"Why so many ads at the same time?" said Saad Abdul Hadi, whose Ramallah-based public relations company, Al-Nasher, is doing the advertising. "Because we are in a very sensitive time, in the elections. That's why now."

In Jericho last week, 10 teams gathered in the municipal stadium in the hopes of winning the first-ever Olive Cup, the U.S.-funded championship of Palestinian youth soccer. As boys darted across the patchy field in uniforms purchased with money from

USAID, banners bearing the emblem of the Palestinian Authority and a new logo created for the U.S.-funded projects celebrated the event, which was attended by several hundred Palestinians.

Ibrahim Sabbah, 40, director of the sports division of the Ministry of Youth and Sports, said he had been asking Palestinian leaders for years to finance such a tournament. This month, Husseini's office told him $10,000 was available immediately.

"I was very surprised," Sabbah said. "And very happy. We were able to do this very quickly because we had been planning it for years. But we'd never had the money until now."

Sabbah said he knew only that the funds came from the Palestinian Authority president's office. It didn't matter who paid for the event, he said happily, as teams from Jenin and Nablus took the field. In a few hours, representatives from Husseini's office would arrive with the Olive Cup trophy and medals for the winners.

U.S. Spent $1.9 Million To Aid Fatah In Palestinian Elections (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

JERUSALEM, Jan. 22 - The United States spent about $1.9 million of its yearly $400 million in aid to the Palestinians on dozens of quick projects before elections this week to bolster the governing Fatah faction's image with voters and strengthen its hand in competing with the militant faction Hamas, American and Palestinian officials said Sunday.

The spending was intended "to work with the Palestinian Authority to enhance democratic institutions and support democratic actors, not just Fatah," said Micaela Schweitzer-Bluhm, a spokeswoman for the American consulate in East Jerusalem. The program, run by the United States Agency for International Development, was described Sunday in The Washington Post.

American and Palestinian officials who spoke anonymously because they were not authorized to speak to reporters said that the program, which started in August, was intended to help defeat Hamas and that the government had done a detailed political analysis to try to focus on constituencies where Hamas was doing well. The international development agency's Office of Transition Initiatives was allowed as much as $30,000 in discretionary spending for each project instead of the $10,000 usually allotted.

The projects - including tree planting, schoolroom additions, a soccer tournament, street cleaning and computers at community centers - were coordinated with President Mahmoud Abbas and meant to be associated with him and the Palestinian Authority, which is run by Fatah. Although American aid was always acknowledged publicly, Ms. Schweitzer-Bluhm said, "our logo was not always on the banner."

A senior Palestinian official said many of the 45 projects aimed at Gaza were not carried out; the procurement bureaucracy proved difficult; and the projects had little or no impact on municipal voting, where Hamas did very well. Mr. Abbas was reluctant to show up to claim credit for the projects, the official said.

"Working with democracies and democratic parties is normal for the U.S. government all around the world," Ms. Schweiter-Bluhm said.

In Jerusalem on Sunday, the Israeli cabinet met to discuss policy toward the Palestinian Authority should Hamas do well or even win in elections on Wednesday for the Palestinian Legislative Council.

Israel says it will refuse to deal with Hamas, which it, the United States and the European Union consider a terrorist group that seeks the destruction of Israel. If Hamas wins, Israel might even stop paying the Palestinian Authority the taxes it collects on its behalf, the daily Yediot Aharonot reported.

Hamas, running for the first time in Palestinian Authority elections, says that it is prepared to consider a long-term truce with Israel within its 1967 boundaries. But it rejects the 1993 Oslo accords and a permanent two-state solution.

Israel's chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, warned Sunday that violence could follow the Palestinian vote, especially if Hamas won, suggesting that the ruling Fatah faction might resist the results. "We have to prepare for the possibility of an escalation with the Palestinians, for the next round of violence," he said in a speech to a security conference in Herzliya.

DOJ_NMG_0010161

On Saturday night, Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz said Israel could act alone if the elections produced a Palestinian Authority that was not "a legitimate and effective partner" for peace talks. If so, Israel would continue to seek "to establish defensible borders, strengthen settlement blocs, keep Jerusalem undivided, including its surrounding area, and demilitarize the Palestinian territory," code for Israeli Army sweeps.

Mr. Mofaz also warned Iran that Israel would not tolerate an Iran with nuclear arms: "We are giving priority at this stage to diplomatic action. But in any case we cannot tolerate a nuclear option for Iran, and we must prepare ourselves."

Israel has nuclear weapons but does not say so. Mr. Mofaz, who was born in Iran, is a member of the Kadima Party, which is led by Ehud Olmert, the acting prime minister.

In the Palestinian election, Marwan Barghouti, the imprisoned leader of the Fatah list, was allowed by Israel to give interviews to the Arab satellite stations Al Jazeera and Al Arabiya, each popular with Palestinians. He called for a large turnout and repeated his prediction that Hamas and Fatah "are heading toward being partners in the field, and in Parliament." He called for "a broad national reform government with the participation of all."

But Nabil Shaath, a Fatah veteran, suggested that it would form a coalition with independents, leaving Hamas in opposition. "With Hamas, it will be very difficult to reach a joint program" that includes negotiations with Israel, he said.

In Gaza City, at least one person was killed and two were wounded when a car exploded Sunday. A militant group accused Israel of trying to kill its fighters, but the Israeli Army denied involvement in the blast. It said that it had carried out an airstrike on three gunmen it believed had been trying to enter Israel near Karni, and that at least one man had been killed.

Israeli Leaders Brace For Hamas Landslide (AP)

By Josef Federman, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 23, 2006

Acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert met with top military and political officials Sunday to discuss the growing likelihood that the militant group Hamas could dominate this week's Palestinian elections.

The ascendance of Hamas has alarmed Israel, which appears to have been caught off guard by the group's surging popularity before Wednesday's vote. Hamas has killed hundreds of Israelis in suicide bombings and remains committed to Israel's destruction.

"What Israel has to do is the big question," Cabinet minister Tzachi Hanegbi said before Sunday's meeting. "We have to think hard and explore all the options."

The United States and European Union also have been scrambling to figure out how to deal with Hamas. U.S. officials confirmed Sunday they have been directing money to promote democratic parties in the election but denied the move was aimed against Hamas.

Hamas, best known for its suicide attacks, has won over the Palestinian public in its first run for the legislature by focusing on domestic concerns, halting corruption and restoring law and order to the chaotic West Bank and Gaza Strip.

In contrast, the ruling Fatah Party has been unable to shed its corrupt image or overcome infighting. Recent opinion polls show the two movements running even.

While some security officials privately support a dialogue with Hamas, top leaders, including military chief Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz and Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz, say the group must disarm and revoke its charter calling for Israel's elimination.

"Regarding the elections in the Palestinian authority, there are three options: that Fatah wins, that Hamas wins or anarchy wins. One of these results could put all progress back several years," Halutz told an academic conference Sunday, apparently referring to Hamas and warning that violence could follow the election.

Commentators said Olmert's meeting Sunday — which included the army chief, head of the Shin Bet security agency, and the justice and defense ministers — reflected a failure by Israel to detect Hamas' growing popularity, despite its strong performance in Palestinian municipal voting in recent months.

"Their assumption was Fatah will handily win any election," said Mouin Rabbani, an analyst with the International Crisis Group based in Jordan.

DOJ_NMG_0010162

Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas has said he hopes Hamas would tame its positions once it formally joins the political system, but other Fatah officials sent mixed signals over whether they would work with the Islamic group. Palestinian Information Minister Nabil Shaath, a top Fatah official, said Hamas must accept the principle of peace with Israel if it wants to share power.

However, Fatah's top candidate, the jailed Palestinian uprising leader Marwan Barghouti, said Sunday that "Hamas will be part and parcel of the Palestinian Authority" after the vote. Barghouti was interviewed in an Israeli prison by the Arab satellite TV station Al-Jazeera.

The United States and EU both consider Hamas a terrorist group, and both have said millions of dollars in aid to the Palestinians could be jeopardized.

"As a matter of policy, we don't deal with Hamas," said Stewart Tuttle, the U.S. Embassy spokesman in Tel Aviv. "If Hamas members win seats ... we are not going to deal with those individuals."

The U.S. Agency for International Development has used a special $1.9 million budget to promote democratic parties in the Palestinian election, said a U.S. Consulate spokeswoman in Jerusalem, Micaela Schweitzer-Bluhm.

She denied that the money, used in part to clean streets, distribute free food and water and to help fund a youth soccer tournament, was used to boost Fatah's prospects.

Behind the scenes, U.S. officials are considering the possibility of distinguishing between Hamas legislators tied to violence and those who are not — a position Israel rejects. European diplomats said they would decide what to do after election results are in.

The West Bank and Gaza Strip have been plagued by chaos and lawlessness in recent months, and some armed groups have threatened to disrupt the voting.

Visiting election commission offices on Sunday, Abbas was resolute. "Orders have been issued to security forces to strike with an iron fist against anyone who would try to sabotage this election," he said.

In other developments, an Israeli aircraft fired at three Palestinian gunmen trying to enter Israel from the Gaza Strip, killing one man and wounding two, according to the army and Palestinian officials. The Popular Resistance Committees, a tiny militant group not running in the election, vowed revenge.

Separately, Benjamin Netanyahu, the leader of the battered Likud Party, said Sunday that he would be willing to make "significant concessions" in a final peace deal with the Palestinians if his party wins elections March 28.

However, he spelled out a tough negotiating line, saying Israel's final borders would include east Jerusalem, the Jordan Valley and other parts of the West Bank — areas the Palestinians want for a future state — if a government run by Netanyahu signs a peace accord with the Palestinians.

In A Stronghold, Fatah Fights To Beat Back A Rising Hamas (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

NABLUS, West Bank - Nasser Joumaa, pale and thin, was facing some tough questions from his own Fatah members.

"Our generation is being ignored," said a tall, bearded man in a small house, packed and cloudy with cigarette smoke, as more young men listened at the windows. "Where are the respected people to vote for on Fatah's list? Not you, Nasser, but there are corrupted people in this list."

Mr. Joumaa, 39 and respected here for his military and political prowess, looked pained. "I share your concerns," he said. "People are angry with Fatah and its performance, and so am I. I'm one of the angry members of Fatah. But we express our anger inside. We face a bigger challenge now from Hamas, and in a difficult situation we stand together."

Fatah, the mainstay of the Palestinian Authority and the Palestine Liberation Organization, is in trouble, even here in Nablus, one of the West Bank's toughest and largest cities, and a longtime stronghold for the group. Fatah is struggling to beat back the radical Islamic movement Hamas - which won an astonishing 13 of Nablus's 15 local council seats a month ago, and elected an efficient, worldly yet devout mayor, Adli Yaish.

DOJ_NMG_0010163

Palestinians vote Wednesday in elections for a new legislature, the first such vote in a decade. The United States, which lists Hamas as a terrorist organization, has quietly spent almost $2 million on dozens of quick projects to strengthen Fatah's hand, American and Palestinian officials say. [Page 10]

The coming vote is the first time that Hamas has run in elections for roles within the Palestinian Authority - because the authority was set up in the 1993 Oslo accords with Israel, which Hamas is committed to destroy.

But Mr. Joumaa is convinced that Hamas means to destroy Fatah first, if not now then by stages, and he warns Fatah members not to lose sight of the longer battle.

"Hamas talks of partnership with Fatah, but it wants to replace Fatah," he said. "We have power and authority, and we can't just give it up. We don't know Hamas's real program or goals, or to whom they will be subject. We cannot leave ourselves in Hamas's control."

Nablus is a stunning city, set in a steep valley, founded by the Romans in A.D. 72 and proud of its ancient aqueducts. It is the second-largest city in the West Bank, with some 325,000 people. But it has also been severely affected by the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, especially in the last five years, with the highest number of casualties, most severe physical damage and most intensive restrictions on movement in the West Bank, according to a report issued by the United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs in December. Fatah and the Palestinian Authority are paying the price for the economy and the border closures, as well as for Fatah's reputation for corruption.

Palestinian opinion polls vary, but all show that Fatah still leads Hamas, but not by much, and Hamas seems to be gaining. Fatah has 42 percent to Hamas's 35 percent, according to pollster Khalil Shikaki of the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research; it has 35 percent to Hamas's 30 percent, with a larger number of undecided voters, according to Nader Said, a poll director for Birzeit University in Ramallah. Both polls have margins of error of at least 2 percent, but both show Fatah holding onto a majority, especially in coalition with other secular candidate lists like the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, that of the independent Mustafa Barghouti, and another independent list called the Third Way, headed by the former finance minister Salam Fayyad, the likely next prime minister.

Both independent lists are getting aid from European and American supporters. But Fatah and Mr. Joumaa are worried that those competing independents, especially in constituencies, where many are also using the Fatah symbol, could allow Hamas candidates to win with small pluralities. Each voter will cast two ballots. Half of the 132 seats will be determined by votes for party lists, and half by votes in 16 local districts, which are harder to predict through polling.

Abbas Under Radar As Elections Loom (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, January 23, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- A kaleidoscope of campaign banners floats above traffic-choked el-Manara Square: Images of the late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat smile against the background of Jerusalem, while jailed militant Marwan Barghouti waves his shackled hands in defiance of Israel.

But nowhere to be seen is the likeness of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

With his Fatah Party dangerously close to losing Wednesday's parliamentary elections to the Islamic militants of Hamas, the Palestinian moderate has taken a surprisingly low profile in a contest that many see as a referendum on his tenure.

Aides say election laws forbid campaigning by the president, who is not up for re-election. But others say Palestinians are so disappointed with Mr. Abbas that he would only hurt his party.

"He represents an image that can be harmful to the campaign," said Basem Ezbidi, a political science professor at Ramallah's Birzeit University.

"On a popular level, people do not see him really as someone whom they can trust to deliver because they've given him a full year to deliver, and he didn't. There's an ironic thing: Here the Palestinian public and the Israeli government meet."

Mr. Abbas was elected in January 2005 with 62 percent of the vote, buoying hopes that he would be able to rein in Palestinian gunmen and resume peace talks with Israel. But he has achieved neither.

DOJ_NMG_0010164

With the political party bequeathed to him by Mr. Arafat disintegrating, Mr. Abbas' authority is being widely questioned. If Fatah performs poorly on Wednesday, he will be seen as a lame-duck president with no mandate to lead.

Mr. Abbas "will be in bad shape if Fatah gets less than what is expected or loses the majority," said Mohammed Yaghi, a columnist for the Al-Ayyam newspaper. "Hamas will haggle with him on everything."

The president backed these elections in hopes that, with Hamas as a part of the Palestinian parliament, he could exert more leverage over the Islamist militants. But Fatah members now are questioning the wisdom of that strategy.

"Many are skeptical that he is really for Fatah," Mr. Yaghi said. "Many are saying that he doesn't care, that he only has a [diplomatic] program and that is his main concern."

There are other signs of disarray. Gangs from Fatah's military wing, the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, have threatened to disrupt voting because their patrons are not on the ballot. And Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia embarrassed the president this month by suggesting the vote be delayed.

The implosion of Fatah is one of the main reasons why Hamas is poised to do much better than anyone expected a few months ago. According to a Birzeit University survey last week, Fatah's popularity stands at 35 percent, while Hamas' has surged to 31 percent.

The pressure is starting to show on Mr. Abbas, who is seldom pictured smiling in Palestinian newspapers these days and has offered to step down if he cannot carry out his agenda.

There is still some sympathy for Mr. Abbas in the streets of Ramallah, where he is perceived as an honest politician. "You can tell he is a good person, and he gave it his best shot," said Nasser Ibrahim, a lifelong Fatah supporter who will not vote for the party this year.

But Mr. Abbas' colleagues in Fatah aren't likely to be forgiving if the party performs poorly on Wednesday, enhancing his reputation as a weak leader, said Mr. Ezbidi, the professor at Birzeit University.

"Such an image will continue to exist for some time," he said. "I do not see Mahmoud Abbas part of the political scene eight months from now. I see him disappearing somehow and resigning."

NABLUS, West Bank, Jan. 20 - Nasser Joumaa, pale and thin, was facing some tough questions from his own Fatah members.

"Our generation is being ignored," said a tall, bearded man in a small house, packed and cloudy with cigarette smoke, as more young men listened at the windows. "Where are the respected people to vote for on Fatah's list? Not you, Nasser, but there are corrupted people in this list."

Mr. Joumaa, 39 and respected here for his military and political prowess, looked pained. "I share your concerns," he said. "People are angry with Fatah and its performance, and so am I. I'm one of the angry members of Fatah. But we express our anger inside. We face a bigger challenge now from Hamas, and in a difficult situation we stand together."

Fatah, the mainstay of the Palestinian Authority and the Palestine Liberation Organization, is in trouble, even here in Nablus, one of the West Bank's toughest and largest cities, and a longtime stronghold for the group. Fatah is struggling to beat back the radical Islamic movement Hamas - which won an astonishing 13 of Nablus's 15 local council seats a month ago, and elected an efficient, worldly yet devout mayor, Adli Yaish.

Palestinians vote Wednesday in elections for a new legislature, the first such vote in a decade. The United States, which lists Hamas as a terrorist organization, has quietly spent almost $2 million on dozens of quick projects to strengthen Fatah's hand, American and Palestinian officials say. [Page 10]

The coming vote is the first time that Hamas has run in elections for roles within the Palestinian Authority - because the authority was set up in the 1993 Oslo accords with Israel, which Hamas is committed to destroy.

But Mr. Joumaa is convinced that Hamas means to destroy Fatah first, if not now then by stages, and he warns Fatah members not to lose sight of the longer battle.

DOJ_NMG_0010165

"Hamas talks of partnership with Fatah, but it wants to replace Fatah," he said. "We have power and authority, and we can't just give it up. We don't know Hamas's real program or goals, or to whom they will be subject. We cannot leave ourselves in Hamas's control."

Nablus is a stunning city, set in a steep valley, founded by the Romans in A.D. 72 and proud of its ancient aqueducts. It is the second-largest city in the West Bank, with some 325,000 people. But it has also been severely affected by the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, especially in the last five years, with the highest number of casualties, most severe physical damage and most intensive restrictions on movement in the West Bank, according to a report issued by the United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs in December. Fatah and the Palestinian Authority are paying the price for the economy and the border closures, as well as for Fatah's reputation for corruption.

Palestinian opinion polls vary, but all show that Fatah still leads Hamas, but not by much, and Hamas seems to be gaining. Fatah has 42 percent to Hamas's 35 percent, according to pollster Khalil Shikaki of the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research; it has 35 percent to Hamas's 30 percent, with a larger number of undecided voters, according to Nader Said, a poll director for Birzeit University in Ramallah. Both polls have margins of error of at least 2 percent, but both show Fatah holding onto a majority, especially in coalition with other secular candidate lists like the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, that of the independent Mustafa Barghouti, and another independent list called the Third Way, headed by the former finance minister Salam Fayyad, the likely next prime minister.

Both independent lists are getting aid from European and American supporters. But Fatah and Mr. Joumaa are worried that those competing independents, especially in constituencies, where many are also using the Fatah symbol, could allow Hamas candidates to win with small pluralities. Each voter will cast two ballots. Half of the 132 seats will be determined by votes for party lists, and half by votes in 16 local districts, which are harder to predict through polling.

So Fatah is trying to overcome its internal hatreds and unite, at the end, to face down Hamas, including pressing Fatah members running independently to withdraw. It is not easy for some in Fatah, upset that Hamas is even being allowed to take part. Fatah activists in the Balata refugee camp in Nablus insist they will not allow the elections to proceed, and there are worries of election-day violence.

Mr. Joumaa has reasons to be angry with Fatah's leader, President Mahmoud Abbas, who mismanaged its party primaries, finally scrapping them. Mr. Joumaa was a top member of a rival slate of 40-somethings led by the jailed leader Marwan Barghouti and was unhappy when that slate was merged with the official Fatah one. He is No. 18 on the list, so will be elected to the new legislature (as will Marwan Barghouti, who is No. 1), and his posters show him with Mr. Barghouti and the slogan: "Only the shoulders of the fighters can raise the torches of freedom. Vote for Fatah."

It has been an extraordinary personal journey for Mr. Joumaa, who spent 14 months in a Palestinian prison beginning in 1996, when older Fatah figures accused him of disloyalty. He was tortured there, and watched his best friend die there from torture, but then became the commander of Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades in Nablus. He was wanted by the Israelis and kept hidden, even as his mother was dying, 15 months ago, from cancer. When her body was laid out in a crowded mosque, however, he slipped in to pay last respects.

With the cease-fire brokered by Mr. Abbas early in 2005, Mr. Joumaa is no longer being hunted. He has laid aside his arms - for good, he hopes - and turned to Fatah politics, one of the young men toughened by a life under Israeli occupation and by Palestinian misrule. Between Sept. 29, 2000, and Oct. 31, 2005, 522 Palestinians were killed in Nablus, including 80 children and 28 women - 27.8 percent of all West Bank Palestinians killed, according to the December United Nations report.

A center for Palestinian militancy, Nablus is surrounded by six Israeli checkpoints and 53 other physical obstacles to travel, and by 14 Israeli settlements and 26 settlement outposts. But with the cease-fire, the number of military incursions and curfews has dropped and some of the obstacles have been removed, and the number of deaths and injuries has dropped considerably from 2004.

So there is some new optimism here, but not much confidence, and many men still have difficulty getting permission to travel out of Nablus.

Mr. Yaish, the new Hamas mayor here, only three weeks in office, is an example of why the group is doing well. He is devout, but wealthy from auto parts and a Mercedes agency. He studied mechanical engineering in England from 1970 to 1975 and speaks English fluently; he speaks the modern language of efficiency and budget oversight; he keeps a picture of Yasir Arafat in his office and not Sheik Ahmed Yassin, the Hamas leader killed by Israel in March 2004.

"This is a government office," Mr. Yaish said. "President Abbas said to leave the photos of Arafat in offices, so we left it. Sheik Yassin was not elected, and this is not my house."

Mr. Yaish agrees that some people will vote differently on national and local issues, and he expects Hamas to get nowhere close to the 73 percent of the local vote it received a month ago. "We want partnership with Fatah," he said. "Democracy is competition and makes us stronger."

Hamas in the legislature will monitor government work, especially finances and accounts, to prevent corruption, he said, and to improve tax collection. "The same party as judge and jury is not good," he said. "If there is no oversight, even a good man can be tempted."

Hamas opposes negotiations with Israel, but Mr. Yaish thinks its presence in the legislature will stiffen the Palestinian Authority's back in dealings with Israel. "I don't like the Palestinian Authority to negotiate from a weak position," Mr. Yaish said, pragmatically. "We're occupied, and I want my government to talk harder to Israel."

Mouna Mansour is another Hamas candidate, 44 years old, a physics teacher and the widow of a famous local Hamas leader, Jamal Mansour, who was assassinated in 2001 by an Israeli missile strike on his office. His colleague and six others, including two children, also died in what the State Department then called "excessive" and "a new and dangerous escalation."

Today, Mrs. Mansour lives in a building named for her husband in an apartment filled with his "martyrdom" posters. She is practical and straightforward. "Hamas wants to be in the legislature to protect the resistance against occupation," she said. "It is our strategic choice. Our political role is to back the resistance."

But resistance is not just arms and bombs, she insists. "Resistance is also the farmer steadfast on his land, or the factory worker hiring as many as he can and making local products," she said.

"We will be partners with Fatah," she said. "The role of the legislature is accountability."

Should the cease-fire with Israel continue? "It's needed for a period of time, because our people are exhausted by the occupation," she said, and then added, smiling: "It's a time for the warriors to rest up."

That is exactly what Israel warns, that Hamas has not changed its goals.

Mr. Yaish says benignly: "I say to the world with open heart: 'Don't worry so much.' "

Mr. Joumaa thinks differently. "Hamas wants to infiltrate the institutions and take over," he said. "I think a Palestinian state now is farther away."

Wolfowitz Triggers Graft Storm At World Bank (FT)

By Andrew Balls And Edward Alden In Washington

Financial Times, January 23, 2006

Paul Wolfowitz, president of the World Bank, has triggered a bitter conflict with the bank's senior career staff by empowering a group of close political advisers to pursue aggressively what he sees as widespread corruption surrounding bank projects.

The dispute has come to a head with the appointment last week of Suzanne Rich Folsom, a counsellor to Mr Wolfowitz with close ties to the Republican party, as the new director of the Department of Institutional Integrity, the internal bank watchdog that investigates suspected fraud and staff misconduct.

Her appointment has raised objections that a person close to Mr Wolfowitz, and with a political background, has been put into a senior position at a unit that was seen as independent of the president's office since it was set up in 2001.

Robert Hindle, previously the senior manager of the unit and a long-time World Bank employee, resigned in November largely as a result of what four current and former bank sources said was concern at the targeting of employees who had worked on projects that developed corruption problems, and pressure on two occasions from Ms Rich Folsom to bypass internal rules on investigating the e-mail records of a number of employees.

Ms Rich Folsom, who was brought into the bank by James Wolfensohn, Mr Wolfowitz's predecessor, denies strongly any breach of internal rules. She insisted that in every case she followed proper procedures that require the bank's general counsel and another senior manager to approve any investigation of staff e-mails. “I have never asked Robert Hindle to circumvent any procedures,” she told the Financial Times.

Mr Wolfowitz said those alleging violations of e-mail procedure “are trying to get me not to be tough on these issues. I just would like to say I don’t intend to be intimidated”.

“We are in a transition, but I think it’s extremely important that we be moving from talking about corruption to dealing with corruption,” he said in an interview.

The World Bank Staff Association has raised concerns over the process that led to Ms Rich Folsom’s appointment and has heard complaints about e-mail checks from a number of parties. Alison Cave, chair of the association, said: “To clear up any questions, it would be a good idea to have an independent investigation or audit of the department.”

A number of senior bank staff and executive directors representing member countries, who asked not to be quoted, complain of a lack of consultation by Mr Wolfowitz’s advisers, and an atmosphere of suspicion.

Roberto Dañino, the bank’s general counsel and a former prime minister of Peru, this month also announced his resignation because, friends said, he was unhappy at the way the bank was being run by Mr Wolfowitz. Mr Hindle and Mr Dañino both declined comment.

Mr Wolfowitz’s appointment last year was greeted with apprehension by some long-time staff. Many Republicans believe the bank is plagued by corruption. Ms Rich Folsom was hired by Mr Wolfensohn with the task of improving the bank’s relations with Congressional Republicans.

China Will Strike An Energy Deal With The Saudis (WSJ)

By Shai Oster, Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2006

BEIJING -- China and Saudi Arabia are expected to sign a wide-ranging agreement today on energy cooperation amid Beijing's quest to secure more energy resources vital to fuel its fast-growing economy.

China, the world's second-biggest consumer of oil, has been seeking to tighten economic and political partnerships with its major oil suppliers across Central Asia, Africa and Latin America. Its quest has taken on added urgency since 2004, when the country's oil demand surged about 15%, helping underpin the biggest rise in international oil prices in a generation.

Although the pace of increase in China's oil demand slowed last year, the average price it paid per 11,000 tons of imported oil surged 38% from 2004 as global oil prices hit record highs. China needs vast supplies of energy to fuel its economy, which grew about 10% last year. A key supplier to the country's fuel needs is Saudi Arabia, which accounts for roughly 17% of China's oil imports.

The Sino-Saudi memorandum of understanding is set to be signed during Saudi King Abdullah's three-day visit to Beijing, a Saudi official said yesterday. It will call for increased cooperation and investment between the two countries in oil, natural gas and minerals, but it won't specify any projects or dollar amounts, another Saudi official said. Other details of the agreement weren't immediately available.

King Abdullah arrived in China yesterday in the first visit here by a Saudi ruler since the two countries re-established diplomatic ties in 1990. He is scheduled to meet today with Chinese President Hu Jintao and tomorrow with No. 2 Communist Party leader Wu Bangguo and Premier Wen Jiabao. Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Kong Quan said last week that the Chinese and Saudi leaders are expected to discuss energy cooperation, fighting terrorism and telecommunications, among other issues.

King Abdullah's China visit is part of a four-nation Asian tour that will also include stops in India, Malaysia and Pakistan. Members of his delegation include Saudi Oil Minister Ali Naimi.

China's oil imports from Saudi Arabia have roughly doubled in recent years, from 12.5 million tons in 2002 to 22 million tons for the first 11 months of 2005.

Chinese and Saudi oil companies have already signed several deals. China Petroleum & Chemical Corp., or Sinopec, China's second-biggest oil producer by volume and its largest refiner, is drilling for natural gas in Saudi Arabia. The company also has signed a deal with Saudi Arabia's state oil company, Saudi Aramco, to build a huge refinery in the southern Chinese province of Fujian with Exxon Mobil Corp. as a partner. Aramco also has begun engineering work with Sinopec for a second refinery in China's northeastern port city of Qingdao.

The Saudi king's visit comes on the heels of a major diplomatic push by China in West Africa, including Nigeria, where Cnooc Ltd., China's largest offshore oil producer by volume, recently concluded a deal to acquire a large stake in an offshore oil field. Last week, Chinese Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing traveled to Cape Verde, Senegal, Mali, Liberia and Nigeria.

China also has drawn closer recently to other large energy producers, such as Venezuela, where ties with the U.S. have frayed.

The agreement comes as renewed political instability in key oil-producing countries in the Middle East and Africa has pushed oil prices back up toward the record highs hit in the summer of 2005. On Friday, oil prices hit a four-month high of $68.35 a barrel, as traders worried that militants in Nigeria were targeting oil facilities.

Meanwhile, a political standoff between Iran and the West has oil traders nervous. The U.S. and several European nations have been calling for Iran to be referred to the United Nations Security Council over its moves to restart a uranium-enrichment program, a process that is used in producing nuclear weapons. Iran is the second-largest oil producer in the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, after Saudi Arabia. Some analysts worry that it could respond to possible U.N.-imposed sanctions against it with an oil embargo.

OPEC is scheduled to meet Jan. 31 to decide on its oil-production policy for the spring. A person familiar with Saudi Arabia's oil policy said Saudi Arabia and other OPEC countries don't support Iran's call for the producer bloc to lower the group's daily oil-production quota by one million barrels. Iran says the cuts are needed to prevent overproduction from glutting the market and bringing oil prices sharply down.

Explosions In Southern Russia Sever Gas Lines To Georgia (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

MOSCOW, Jan. 22 - Explosions in southern Russia on Sunday morning severed the country's natural gas pipelines to Georgia, swiftly plunging Russia's neighbor into heat and electricity shortages and causing a diplomatic flare-up between the nations.

Two more explosions hours later severed one of Russia's main electricity cables to Georgia, deepening the electricity shortage even as the gas supply in Georgia dwindled. Russia supplies Georgia with all of its natural gas.

By late afternoon, President Mikheil Saakashvili of Georgia said gas flow had ceased and energy rationing would be necessary. He ordered universities closed and said Georgia was seeking fuel from Iran and Azerbaijan. Hospitals were being provided emergency propane and oil, he said.

The shortage was expected to last at least two days, as Russian technicians rushed to repair the severed main and reserve lines. Georgia, usually balmy, was having a cold snap, with temperatures dropping below freezing at night and hovering just above by day.

The break in supply - which also led to shortages in Armenia, which receives gas from Russia after it passes through the Georgian pipeline network - raised fresh questions about Russia's reliability as an energy partner and exposed anew the tensions between Russia and Georgia, a nation formerly under Soviet rule that has spurned Moscow in recent years.

Russian officials initially said the explosions appeared accidental but later announced that a criminal investigation had begun and that the blasts were acts of sabotage, perhaps by insurgents in the region using makeshift bombs.

Mr. Saakashvili disputed that contention, saying that the break in supply seemed intended to put political and economic pressure on Georgia, which since 2003 has been pursuing a strongly pro-Western course. He offered no evidence for his position, but said the circumstances were suspicious.

"We don't think it is accidental in any way," Mr. Saakashvili said in a telephone interview from Tbilisi, Georgia's capital. "The places where it happened, the environment in which it happened, the history in which it happened - this all looks like a policy decision."

No insurgent group claimed immediate responsibility for sabotage, and Mr. Saakashvili noted that none of the guerrilla or terrorist bands in the region had threatened Georgia. Those bands often act in coordination with Islamic separatists in nearby Chechnya.

Mr. Saakashvili said that the flow of gas had ceased as Russia had been trying to pressure Georgia into selling Russia the Georgian gas pipeline network, and that officials at several levels of the Russian government had been issuing veiled threats in recent weeks.

He also said that this was the first winter since the collapse of the Soviet Union that Georgia had not had electricity and gas shortages, and that Russia probably resented that success. Mr. Saakashvili compared the gas shortage with the recent pricing dispute between Russia and Ukraine, which led Russia to briefly cut the flow for Ukraine and brought widespread Western criticism of Russia's handling of the incident. "This is not civilized behavior," he said.

A spokesman from President Vladimir V. Putin dismissed Mr. Saakashvili's characterization, suggesting that the notion that either the Kremlin or Gazprom, Russia's gas monopoly, would destroy sections of Russia's pipelines was absurd.

"If he is postulating that Gazprom or Moscow was standing behind these explosions, I don't think that there is any need for comment on this," said the spokesman, Dmitri Peskov. "There is no need for any attempt for politicization. It has nothing to do with politics. It has nothing to do with pressure. It is a situation of an emergency."

The Russian Foreign Ministry reacted angrily, issuing a statement calling the Georgian government's remarks "hysteria and bacchanalia," a reference to Georgians' fondness for wine. The ministry suggested that Georgian officials "have decided to irrevocably ruin relations with Russia."

Four explosions on Russia's side of the border created the shortages, Georgian and Russian officials said. The first two occurred roughly at the same time, before sunrise, severing the main and reserve gas pipelines that flow into Georgia from the Russian supply network.

Later in the morning, two more explosions severed a power transmission cable in two places.

Aleko Khetaguri, the deputy energy minister in Georgia, said in a telephone interview that as a result of the explosions, Georgia had lost all gas flow and roughly a quarter of its electricity, including electricity that was generated from domestic turbines powered by Russian gas.

Gas provides heat and cooking fuel in many of Georgia's urban households, he said, but in the countryside many homes are warmed with wood or kerosene.

Mr. Khetaguri predicted that repairs to the main line would take three days, and to the reserve line one month. He said repairs to the electric transmission line, which provides roughly 5 percent of Georgia's electricity, would take about a week.

While Georgia depends in full on Russian gas, it has shifted its electricity supply to accept more energy from Turkey and Armenia. It also expects to import gas from Azerbaijan and Central Asia late this year when construction is complete on a network from the Caspian Sea, decreasing its reliance on its former rulers in Moscow, with whom it quarrels on several issues.

Officials in Armenia said the situation was not as dire, because the country had fuel reserves. Still, they called for conservation and said electricity would be cut to some nonessential customers, news agencies reported.

Mr. Saakashvili said that to meet demand in Georgia, electricity would be shut off temporarily in different districts on the grid, rotating the shortages until the crisis was resolved. Mr. Khetaguri said that as of Sunday night Georgia was still "supplying electricity to the entire country, but with interruptions."

Bolivia's Morales Rejects US Domination (FT)

By Hal Weitzman In La Paz

Financial Times, January 23, 2006

Evo Morales was sworn in on Sunday as Bolivia's first indigenous president in a historic and emotional ceremony that set the tone for his new government.

In a long speech, Mr Morales warned the US not to try to dominate the region, promised to slash parliamentary salaries and stamp out corruption, and reaffirmed his commitment to nationalising Bolivia's hydrocarbons sector.

DOJ_NMG_0010170

He also pledged to change Bolivia's economic model. "We have to end neo-liberalism," he said. A central theme was the long struggle by the indigenous majority in Bolivia against discrimination: "We need to repair 500 years of history."

Mr Morales reiterated the need to nationalise the gas sector, the second largest in the region. "All our natural resources need to be returned to the Bolivian people, in order for us to end poverty," he said.

The president, who has rejected expropriating the assets of multinational energy companies operating in Bolivia's gas sector, said he wanted foreign investment but under the principle that the state would be treated as an equal partner.

One of Mr Morales's senior economic advisers said on Friday that Repsol and Total, two of the biggest foreign investors in the gas sector, had indicated they were prepared to drop a threat to take Bolivia to international arbitration over a hydrocarbons law that raised taxes on foreign investors.

Rafael Ramírez, Venezuela's energy minister, said over the weekend that PDVSA, the Venezuelan state energy company, would help to develop the Bolivian gas reserves.

Mr Morales also addressed his campaign commitment to decriminalise cultivation of coca – raw material for cocaine – which had caused concern in the US, sponsor of eradication efforts in the Bolivian highlands. The new president vowed to clamp down on drug trafficking and cocaine production.

He said: "I want an agreement with the US to fight narcotrafficking, but the fight against drugs must not be an excuse for the US to dominate our people."

Earlier, one of his advisers said two of the biggest investors in the gas sector had indicated they were prepared to drop a threat to take the country to arbitration over a hydrocarbons law that raised taxes on foreign investors.

Carlos Villegas, tipped as a cabinet minister, said Repsol and Total had signalled they were willing to renegotiate their contracts to give a greater share of profits to Bolivia.

That could make it more difficult for British Gas to carry out its threat to go to international arbitration. Petrobras has said it is prepared to accept lower profits.

Mr Villegas said that although Mr Morales had threatened during the presidential campaign to nationalise the hydrocarbons sector, the new government would respect the property rights of foreign investors.

The inauguration came a day after the investiture of the former coca growers' leader in a ceremony at Tiwanaku, a pre-Inca ruin.

"Today begins a new era for the indigenous people of the world, a new life in which we seek equality and justice," Mr Morales told a crowd of 20,000.

He vowed to "fight neo-liberalism" and to "complete the struggle of Che Guevara".

Mr Morales's campaign pledge to decriminalise coca cultivation has caused concern in the US, which sponsors eradication efforts.

Washington had refused to talk to Mr Morales directly, but there were signs of a thaw at the weekend when Thomas Shannon, US assistant secretary of state for western hemisphere affairs, visited the incoming president at his home in La Paz.

"We wish the new democratically elected government success," Mr Shannon said afterwards. "We are ready to begin a process of dialogue to determine how our two governments can work together on a common agenda." The new president has an approval rating of 74 per cent, according to a poll.

Indians In Bolivia Celebrate Swearing In Of One Of Their Own (NYT)

By Juan Forero

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

LA PAZ, Bolivia, Jan. 22 - Evo Morales, a Socialist protest leader and steadfast critic of American policies in the region, was sworn in Sunday as president of Bolivia, the first Indian to hold the position in this landlocked country whose indigenous majority had long felt oppressed and cut off from political power.

With tears welling in his eyes, his left fist raised and his right hand over his heart, Mr. Morales, 46, an Aymara Indian, took the oath of office as the leaders of 11 countries, American diplomats and the crown prince of Spain watched from the gallery of the country's ornate 19th-century Congress.

The son of a shepherd who grew up in an adobe home in the frigid highlands, Mr. Morales was dressed true to his anti-establishment roots, in a wool jacket featuring white pre-Hispanic motifs on the lapels and an open-neck shirt, but no tie.

Outside, tens of thousands of people celebrated, many of them Aymara and Quechua Indians, tin and silver miners, coca farmers and leftists from around the world. They blew cow horns, danced to brass bands and waved the seven-colored wipala flag of the Andean Indian nation. By evening, Mr. Morales and his vice president, Álvaro García, a former guerrilla leader who spent five years in jail for rebellion, had joined them.

"This is a historic day," said Gregorio Mamani, 43, like Mr. Morales an Aymara. "I am so happy that after so many years, we have an indigenous president, one we can be proud of before the whole world."

In the Congress, Mr. Morales asked for a moment of silence for Inca martyrs, for the Argentine guerrilla Che Guevara, who died in a failed effort to start a revolution here in 1967, and "the millions of humans who have fallen in all of Latin America." In a rambling, passionate speech that mixed Spanish and Aymara, Mr. Morales did not veer from the populist themes that enthralled his followers and gave him a landslide win in the election on Dec. 18.

He criticized "neoliberal reforms," the American-backed free-market prescriptions that are now being tested throughout the continent, for failing to pull Bolivians out of poverty. He lamented that there were no high-ranking Indians in the army, and he railed against the corruption of past governments.

Mr. Morales promised to "change our history" and give voice to the downtrodden.

"I want to say to you, my Indian brothers concentrated here in Bolivia, that the 500-year campaign of resistance has not been in vain," Mr. Morales said moments after being sworn in. "This democratic, cultural fight is part of the fight of our ancestors, it is the continuity of the fight of Tupac Katari, it is a continuity of the fight of Che Guevara."

But while Mr. Morales is clearly among the more anti-establishment in a crop of leftist leaders who have recently swept to power in Latin America, he has tempered his tone since his victory and has spoken of the need for Bolivia to trade and build ties with other countries. "I have learned that the president of a government has to do good business deals for his country," Mr. Morales said Sunday.

Unlike his predecessors, Mr. Morales enters the presidency with overwhelming good will from inside Bolivia and beyond. The economy is solid, having grown at 4 percent in 2005, the best measure in years. The International Monetary Fund in December wrote off the country's $231 million debt, while the deficit has shrunk significantly, thanks to higher tax revenues and spending constraints.

Political analysts say the sound economic picture, coupled with the mandate that propelled Mr. Morales to power, should give his government time to maneuver.

Still, he has to keep in mind supporters in the crowd like Gregorio Machicado Quispe, 48, who said, "We expect a complete change."

"The government needs to favor the poor, suffering classes," he said. "We have to control the wealth here in Bolivia."

Gustavo Torrico Landa, 46, a congressman from Mr. Morales's Movement Toward Socialism Party, said: "The government has to show that it has begun to function But it's not like Evo on the 22nd becomes president and this becomes Switzerland on the 24th."

Indeed, Bolivian officials close to Mr. Morales, including his top economic adviser, Carlos Villegas, said in interviews that the government was carefully considering what economic path to take.

That means determining everything from how to attend to poor farmers, a priority for Mr. Morales, to how much foreign aid to receive from the United States and other countries, which officials say cannot come with tough conditions.

Mr. Morales and other officials have also said trade is important, but have not decided what kind of agreements should be signed. In the meantime, Bolivia plans to ask Washington for an extension on a preferential trade deal that ends in December, Mr. Villegas said.

"The only path for Bolivia is to open itself to the world, but under better conditions than in the past," said Juan Ramón Quintana, another adviser to the president.

DOJ_NMG_0010172

The policies that will be most closely watched, especially by multinational oil companies like Petrobras of Brazil and Repsol of Spain, will be in Bolivia's huge natural gas industry. Mr. Morales plans greater control, increasing taxes on the companies, but on Sunday he also said his government needed help from energy experts in formulating a policy.

Mr. Morales's history as leader of the country's coca farmers, and his campaign pledge to become a "nightmare" for the United States, has worried American officials concerned that his presidency could lead to instability and increased drug trafficking. On Sunday, he praised one of his closest allies, Fidel Castro of Cuba, and he warned that the United States could not use the fight against drugs "as an excuse" to "dominate and submit other peoples."

Yet, in his speech after the swearing in, he also welcomed Thomas Shannon, the assistant secretary of state for Western Hemisphere affairs, who was at the inauguration. Mr. Morales had a cordial meeting on Saturday night with Mr. Shannon and David Greenlee, the American ambassador, which will probably lead to more talks.

"We have international support," Mr. Morales said. "There is international solidarity."

For Bolivian Majority, A New Promise (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

LA PAZ, Bolivia, Jan. 22 -- The streets of this colonial city erupted in song and fireworks Sunday to celebrate the inauguration of Evo Morales, Bolivia's first Indian president, who promised to begin reversing centuries of social injustice, shield the country from U.S. influence and reclaim natural resources that he says have been exploited by international capitalism.

Morales, 46, broke into tears before addressing Bolivia's Congress and the presidents of many neighboring South American countries, a gathering that illustrated the region's ongoing political shift toward socialism. The former coca grower likened his historic rise to power in Bolivia, where people of Indian descent make up more than 60 percent of the population, to the end of apartheid in South Africa.

"This morning I was very happy to see my brothers and sisters singing in the historical Plaza Murillo and Plaza San Francisco," Morales said, referring to the celebrations attended by thousands of indigenous citizens in the city's main squares. "Forty or 50 years ago, we didn't even have the right to enter the Plaza San Francisco or the Plaza Murillo."

Morales won the election riding a wave of discontent against the elites who have traditionally ruled the country. Massive protests have become a regular part of Bolivian life in recent years, helping to oust two presidents since 2003. But the atmosphere of celebration in the streets that lasted deep into the night was a reflection of the widespread support Morales enjoys upon entering office. An opinion poll released this weekend by the Bolivian firm Apoyo said that support for Morales stands at 74 percent, an unprecedented level in the country's recent history.

"All of the other governments we have had in this country have been corrupt and have stolen from the people," said Felix Flores, an unemployed 60-year-old Quechua Indian who traveled to La Paz from Cochabamba to celebrate in Plaza San Francisco with thousands of others. "With all of that money they robbed, they could have created sources for jobs. Now Evo will."

A big part of Morales's message has centered on the idea of self-determination, and he has frequently criticized the United States as an "imperial power" whose interests often run counter to those of Bolivia. The United States is Bolivia's leading provider of development aid, contributing about $655 million from 2000 to 2004. But Morales contends his country has been hurt by "neo-liberalism," a term commonly used in the region to describe Washington-backed economic policies that encourage free trade and a minimum of national commercial intervention. On Sunday, Morales labeled the policy a failure that had impoverished Bolivia while enriching wealthy foreign interests, and he vowed to protect the country from its effects.

Bolivia, with 9 million citizens, remains the poorest country in South America, but it has the second-largest reserves of natural gas on the continent. Morales has pledged to nationalize the country's fuel industry and woo investment from Latin America, Europe and Asia to industrialize the sector.

Expectations for change run high among his supporters, and Morales promised Sunday to convene a representative assembly to rewrite the country's constitution to more equitably distribute political power. He has tried to mollify concerns of international investors by promising not to seize private property when nationalizing the fuel sector. He has also said he wants to decriminalize the growing of coca plants and refocus the fight against drugs on those who turn the crop into cocaine.

"The fight against narco-trafficking, against drugs, against cocaine, cannot be an excuse for the government of the United States to dominate our communities," Morales told the crowd, a number of whom chewed coca leaves, reflecting a long Bolivian tradition.

Many analysts suggest that Morales's frequent jabs at the United States are rooted in his experience as a coca farmer and -- unlike those of Venezuela's Hugo Chavez and Cuba's Fidel Castro -- less in a specific political ideology. But many of his supporters already are linking Morales to those two leaders, whom Morales calls inspirations. In Plaza San Francisco, vendors enjoyed brisk business selling T-shirts with the names of a socialist icon and three presidents printed in simple block letters on the front: "Ché, Fidel, Chavez, Evo."

"Evo professes a deep and close friendship with Chavez and Castro, but he's more of a product of American policy than his relationship with those two," said Eduardo Gamarra, a Bolivia analyst at Florida International University. "He's a product of the coca wars, and he should be understood in that context."

Bolivia is the latest in a line of South American countries to elect presidential candidates from socialist or unionist backgrounds. Last week, Chile elected the Socialist Party's Michelle Bachelet to succeed Ricardo Lagos, another Socialist who embraced free trade as a way to fund increased social spending in his country. And in their most recent elections, Brazil, Argentina and Uruguay have also elected presidents with backgrounds in social activism.

In Peru, elections this year will replace outgoing President Alejandro Toledo, who became the first South American president of indigenous descent when he was elected in 2000. A front-runner is former colonel Ollanta Humala, a socialist.

Morales was born in a thatched-roof shack in Bolivia's western highlands, and he worked as a shepherd as a young boy. As a teenager, he was a brick worker, baker and trumpet player in a traveling band. After settling in the tropical Chapare region to grow coca, he became involved in politics as the head of the Federation of Coca Farmers, which often pitted him against U.S. officials who wanted to reduce cocaine traffic by reducing the harvests of coca leaves, which must be chemically processed to produce cocaine.

His criticisms of the United States are widely admired among his supporters, such as those who waved banners throughout the day in Plaza San Francisco. To them, such comments prove Morales has the courage to stand up for himself and his country.

"This is our day," said Pablo Mercado, 48, a city worker in La Paz who waited for the new president to parade through the streets of the city after his speech. "Finally we have something to celebrate."

Morales, Bolivia's 1st Indigenous President, Inaugurated (KRT)

By Jack Chang

Knight Ridder, January 23, 2006

LA PAZ, Bolivia - Evo Morales Aima - a peasant leader born into grueling poverty - assumed Bolivia's presidency Sunday with an emotional speech that laid out the most complete picture yet of his leftist agenda.

The 46-year-old Aymara Indian, his troubled country's first indigenous president, fleshed out controversial proposals he made throughout his historic campaign, including plans to nationalize Bolivia's vast natural gas resources and block U.S.-backed anti-drug efforts.

After tearfully accepting the country's red, green and gold presidential banner, Morales began his wide-ranging, 90-minute address with a minute of silence dedicated to leftist heroes such as revolutionary Ernesto "Che" Guevara, fellow activists and Bolivia's indigenous people, who make up more than 70 percent of the country.

"We are here to change our history," he said standing at the front of the Congressional chamber filled with newly elected representatives, loved ones and world leaders, including 11 heads of state. "This is the conscience of the people, our people, the fight of our people."

With regular promises to be a "nightmare" for the United States, Morales has been a rising star of Latin America's populist left and is closely allied to Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and Cuban leader Fidel Castro, both ideological foes of the Bush administration. His election marked another significant challenge to U.S. policy in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0010174

Morales went on to detail plans to "industrialize" Bolivia's natural gas, hinting the country could take over resource extraction now performed by foreign companies. Bolivia claims Latin America's second largest natural gas reserves.

He also demanded the world community cancel the impoverished Andean country's $6.43 billion in foreign debt, saying, "This money definitely never helped our indigenous people."

Acknowledging those roots, Morales spoke for about three minutes in Aymara and used the Inca language of Quechua to thank Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva and other presidents for coming. The day before, Morales took part in an indigenous purifying ceremony on the site of an ancient temple outside the capital.

After the inauguration ceremony, Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez appeared beside Morales on the balcony of the presidential palace to view Bolivian troops. They were joined by Prince Felipe of Spain, Slovenia President Janez Dronvsek and other international figures.

Morales regularly condemns U.S.-backed economic policies promoting open markets and privatized state industries. He has also opposed U.S. efforts to end Bolivian cultivation of coca leaf, the prime ingredient in cocaine. The country ranks as the world's third biggest coca grower and a major source of cocaine to Europe and the rest of South America, according to U.S. estimates.

Despite those tensions, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Thomas Shannon Morales visited with Morales on Saturday night at his home in La Paz for a 45-minute meeting both men said would launch a series of encounters.

Shannon said they did not discuss the coca issue but talked generally about how to continue the dialogue.

"We want the Bolivian people to succeed and for the Bolivian people to succeed, this government needs to succeed," Shannon said. "This is a democratically elected government."

Sunday morning, Morales also tried to mend fences with President Ricardo Lagos of neighboring Chile, which sparked enduring Bolivian animosity during the 19th century by seizing the country's coastline.

Lagos attended Morales' inauguration Sunday, becoming the first Chilean president to pay an official visit to Bolivia in decades. Both leaders said the two countries were dedicated to resolving their historical conflict.

Morales will lead a country of 8.9 million that has been wracked with social conflict over the past three years, during which massive protests and blockades over natural resource management have ousted two presidents.

It is also divided along geographic lines, with the resource-rich eastern Bolivian province of Santa Cruz demanding more independence. Bolivians will decide later this year whether to grant more autonomy to provinces and will also rewrite its constitution.

Yet the peasant leader takes power with enormous political backing, having won the presidency last month with nearly 54 percent of the vote, the first majority won by a presidential candidate since the return of democracy in 1982. His Movement Toward Socialism party controls the Congress.

Nuclear Deal And Iran Complicate Efforts By U.S. And India To Improve Ties (New York Times)

By Somini Sengupta

New York Times, January 23, 2006

NEW DELHI, Jan. 22 - Senator John Kerry was here recently, inquiring about nuclear bargains being struck between India and the United States. Senator Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana, was here, too, calling on India to open its retail sector to American business.

And Representative Dan Burton, an Indiana Republican, regarded here as more foe than friend, led a delegation of six last November and left praising India's advances.

New Delhi, the Indian capital, has had a flurry of visitors from Capitol Hill lately, with the American Embassy here recording 10 Congressional delegations in 2005 alone.

The reasons for the newfound interest in India are self-evident: its growing strategic importance for an American administration eager to check Chinese dominion over Asia, the lure of the Indian market for American companies, and the emergence of Indian-Americans as an increasingly engaged political bloc.

DOJ_NMG_0010175

For India, too, the stakes are important. Rarely, if ever, has the United States Congress been as important for New Delhi. It alone can grant a boon that India desperately wants: approval of a deal signed last July by President Bush and Prime Minister Manmohan Singh to share nuclear materials, including fuel and reactors, to help this energy-starved country.

Before the White House proposes the legislation before Congress, it has required India, which has already developed nuclear weapons, to present a detailed plan to segregate reactors for either civilian or military use.

"We expect that India will propose a civil-military separation plan that is credible, transparent, and defensible from a nonproliferation standpoint," White House officials told Congress last week, in response to a list of 82 questions submitted by Senator Richard G. Lugar, Republican of Indiana.

Negotiations held here last week, between the main architects of the nuclear deal, did not appear to yield anything close to an agreement. Whether the White House will be able to present legislation, as it had hoped, before Mr. Bush's scheduled visit to India in early March remains unclear.

"A deal is certainly possible and within reach," R. Nicholas Burns, under secretary of state for political affairs, said in an interview on Friday. "It's not going to be easy to reach."

The Indian foreign secretary, Shyam Saran, put it this way at a news briefing on Friday: "We need to have more discussion on this particular subject."

The nuclear issue presents a delicate dance for both sides. After India detonated a nuclear weapon in 1998, the United States penalized New Delhi. For its part, India, which never signed the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, had long maintained that America and others in the nuclear club had no right to say who could or could not possess the bomb.

In a nod to India's growing strategic importance, Mr. Bush is willing to support peaceful Indian nuclear ambitions, even as Washington has taken steps to try to prevent other countries, like Iran and North Korea, from advancing their nuclear programs. In particular, Washington would like India's help in isolating Iran, a traditional Indian ally, as Iran tries to jump-start its nuclear ambitions.

For India, which has long positioned itself as a leader of nonaligned developing countries, and which has competing interests of its own, the choice is not an easy one.

Iran is among India's most important energy suppliers, and talks are under way to build an ambitious $4 billion pipeline to transport Iranian natural gas to India, via Pakistan.

Commenting on the three-way tango, The Business Standard, an English-language daily, published an editorial last week that asked bluntly: "Is supporting the U.S. a good option? If not, what other option is there?"

This is where both the United States and India begin to feel the burden of democracy. In both countries, legislators are equally exercised by the Iran standoff.

The United States wants India's support to refer Iran to the United Nations Security Council when the issue goes before the International Atomic Energy Agency on Feb. 2. Last September, India voted along with the United States when Iran came up before the agency, a part of the United Nations, but India's leaders have since been noncommittal.

Congress is closely watching how India casts its vote this time, with members saying that it could influence whether they support the Indian nuclear deal.

"It is extremely important that we know India will stand united with us in that effort," Senator Kerry, a Democrat of Massachusetts, said in an e-mail message this week.

At the news briefing on Friday, Mr. Saran sidestepped a question on how United States lawmakers would view India's stance on Iran, saying he sensed strong bipartisan support for "a much stronger U.S.-India relationship" on Capitol Hill.

Questions are bubbling from within the Indian Parliament about the virtues of locking arms with the United States, at the expense of Iran. A coalition of leftist parties, led by the Communist Party of India (Marxist), has all but threatened to cripple his government should Mr. Singh side with Washington.

In the United States-India nuclear negotiations there are several sticking points. For the United States, the red-flag issues include how many nuclear reactors will be operated under its desired safeguards, and whether they will be run that way forever.

The Indians point out that their civilian and military nuclear facilities have never been segregated. Any future segregation would have to be done in a manner that its government regards to be "necessary for our strategic program," according to a senior official who refused to be identified because of the delicate nature of diplomatic negotiations.

Should India not vote to report Iran to the Security Council next month, argued George Perkovich, vice president for studies at the Washington-based Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, it could imperil India's own credibility as a stalwart of nonproliferation.

On Friday, Mr. Saran once again cautioned that "confrontation should be avoided" with Iran. Sitting on his right, Mr. Burns, the under secretary of state, criticized Iran for having "crossed so many international red lines."

Canada's PM Candidates Make Final Rounds Martin Takes Aim At Conservative Party's Harper As Voters Head To Polls (USAT)

By Rebecca Cook Dube Special For

USA Today, January 23, 2006

TORONTO — Canadians go to the polls today in an election that could unseat the ruling Liberal Party and elec t the first Conservative prime minister in 13 years.

The weekend before the election, Liberal Prime Minister Paul Martin accused Conservative Party leader Stephen Harper of being too much like U.S. Republicans. “We have a party (the Conservatives) that basically draws its influences from the farthest right of the U.S. conservative movement,” Martin said Saturday at a campaign rally. “Let me tell you, Stephen Harper, we have our own values in Canada.”

Harper dismissed Martin's criticism and struck a confident note as he campaigned.

“Only the Conservative Party can bring this country together,” Harper, 46, told supporters. He said Martin “has not provided a single compelling reason why his government should be re-elected.”

Harper has run as a moderate, promising to protect the social services that Canadians hold dear, especially health care. Canada has near-record-low unemployment and several years of federal budget surpluses. Harper and Martin have promised tax cuts.

Martin has quarreled with the Bush administration on such issues as Canada's refusing to take part in the missile defense scheme, condemning the Iraq war and criticizing the United States for rejecting the Kyoto Protocol on greenhouse gas emissions. Harper has distanced himself from Bush but is more in step with the U.S. president. For example, Harper says he would reconsider Martin's refusal to take part in the U.S. missile defense program.

The Liberals have struggled in the wake of two corruption investigations. Although Martin has been exonerated by an ongoing inquiry into a kickback scheme in the 1990s involving public funds, the investigation has implicated some other Liber als.

Harper hammered on that Sunday, saying, “When we are in office, we will do everything in our powerto make sure the kind s of scandal and corruptionwe see from this government is never allowed tooccur again in this country.”

In the last election, in June 2004, the Liberals eked out a victory after warning voters that Conservatives were too right-wing for Canada. “We won then, and we're going to win this election,” Martin, 67, said ata campaign rally.

The poll projections over the weekend predicted the Conservatives would win a minority government — meaning they'd have a plurality but not a majority of votes in Parliament and would have to ally with other parties to pass laws.

“The only issue is how many seats are the Liberals going to lose,” said Nik Nanos, president of SES Research in Ottawa, an independent polling firm.

The SES poll on Sunday showed the Conservatives maintaining a 6-percentage-point lead. Thirty-six percent of respondents said they planned to vote Conservative; 30% said they would vote Liberal; 17% for the New Democratic Party; 11% for the Bloc Québécois; and 6% for the Green Party. The poll, conducted for the CPAC public affairs cable channel, surveyed 1,200 Canadians Friday-Sunday and had a margin of error of +/-3 percentage points.

Canada's Surging Conservatives (CSM)

The Christian Science Monitor, January 23, 2006

TORONTO - Canada's Conservatives have captured the momentum as the country nears its Jan. 23 election date, with polls showing a majority of Canadians would be happy to see the Liberal Party's 13-year winning streak come to an end.

Perhaps the most dramatic campaign story has unfolded in Quebec, where Conservatives failed to win a single seat in the last election. According to a recent poll, the Conservatives' leader, Stephen Harper, is more popular in Quebec than he is in his home province of Alberta, the most conservative region in the country.

"That's like saying George Bush has higher positives [ratings] in Massachusetts than in the state of Texas," says Tim Woolstencroft, managing partner with Strategic Counsel, the Toronto firm that conducted the poll. "It's stunning." Nationwide, Mr. Harper's favorable rating is over 50 percent.

Though Liberals are warning of Harper's ties to the American right, and American conservatives are cheering Harper, the Canadian Conservative leader bears little resemblance to his US counterparts. This isn't your typical US conservative

Throughout the campaign, Harper has reassured Canadians he will uphold the nation's extensive social-service network, especially the healthcare system. He has also promised not to seek any changes in abortion law. And although he initially supported the US war in Iraq, Harper has more recently said he would not send Canadian troops there.

Some see parallels between Harper's campaign and the successful election bid of Australian Prime Minister John Howard, which ended the 13-year rule of the more liberal Australian Labour Party.

Like Mr. Howard's campaign, Harper's featured solid, easily understandable promises with price tags attached: a $100-per-month child-care subsidy for parents, for example, and pledge to cut the federal sales tax to 5 percent from 7 percent.

"Cash value for voters, cash for child care - they can understand what that means," says Stephen Clarkson, a professor of political economy at the University of Toronto.

Meanwhile, the Liberals "didn't say much in the first half of the campaign, and then they got a lot of bad news," he adds, referring to a corruption scandal miring the Liberals' campaign. Clean government

Harper's campaign focused on promises to clean up government in the wake of a Liberal corruption scandal. In November, Justice John Gomery released the results of his investigation into an advertising kickback scandal in Quebec in the 1990s.

While the report exonerated Mr. Martin, who was finance minister at the time, Justice Gomery said former Liberal Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and others with ties to the Liberals bear responsibility for the misspending of millions of dollars of public money meant for a national unity campaign in the French-speaking province.

The Conservatives' attempt to paint the Liberals as corrupt was bolstered at the end of December, when federal police confirmed they were investigating allegations that Liberal officials secretly tipped off certain investors before an important tax policy announcement.

Though that investigation is not expected to be completed for several months, it added to Martin's woes and hindered his efforts to spread his party's message.

"The Liberals have self-destructed," says Professor Clarkson, who wrote a recent book called "Big Red Machine: How the Liberal Party Dominates Canadian Politics."

Clarkson says he's now working on a sequel: "How the Big Red Machine Became the Little Red Machine."

While several Liberal officials garnered negative publicity during the campaign for ill-considered remarks, Conservative politicians ran a nearly error-free campaign. There were no repeats of the 2004 election, when outspoken Alberta premier Ralph Klein stirred up controversy with remarks about privatizing healthcare.

Asked about his restraint in this campaign, Mr. Klein quipped, "Duct tape works." Liberals' tactics and hopes foiled

In a similar election19 months ago, the Liberal campaign of Prime Minister Paul Martin persuaded Canadians that a Conservative government led by Harper would be too different, too extreme, and just too right-wing.

But similar tactics this time have fallen on deaf ears. And Harper has successfully campaigned on an anticorruption platform as a moderate who would bring positive but not drastic change to Canada.

A Strategic Counsel poll conducted for The Globe and Mail newspaper Jan. 18-21 gave the Conservatives a 10-point lead over the Liberals, with the two parties registering support of 37 percent and 27 percent respectively.

Four other independent polls confirm the Conservatives' momentum.

DOJ_NMG_0010178

"Canadians haven't shifted to the right - Conservatives have moved to the center," says Mr. Woolstencroft of The Strategic Counsel.

When the campaign started in late November, most analysts bet the result would be another minority Liberal government.

Now the big debate is whether the Conservatives will win a minority or a majority in Parliament.

"It would take a miracle" for Liberals to win this election, Woolstencroft says. "The train has long left the station."

Conservative Win In Canada Could Help Repair Ties To U.S. (NYT)

By Clifford Krauss

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

TORONTO, Jan. 22 - Unless every national poll here is amiss, what has been perhaps the world's winningest political party is heading toward a humiliating defeat on Monday.

Stephen Harper, 46, an economist and social conservative who is writing a history of ice hockey, appears poised to lead his Conservative Party to victory over the Liberal Party of Prime Minister Paul Martin, something that seemed highly improbable just a few weeks ago. The Liberals won the last four national elections, governing Canada for 13 years - as the party did for three-quarters of the past century.

But whether a Harper victory would represent a seismic shift, in a country that has long promoted itself as a beacon of social democracy and frequent critic of American foreign policy, remains an open question. If he cannot muster a majority in the House of Commons, Mr. Harper may lead a weak, unstable government opposed by three left-of-center parties represented in Parliament.

Mr. Harper - in a campaign largely free of ideology - promised to cut the national sales tax, grant families child care for preschoolers and introduce mandatory prison sentences. A longtime member of the House of Commons representing Alberta, he has a conservative record, but steered clear in recent months of promising major changes to the national health insurance program.

The absence of strong ideological overtones would appear to make a Thatcherite-style revolution unlikely, even in the face of a strong Conservative showing. Mr. Harper even noted that judges appointed by Liberal governments and an appointed Senate filled with Liberals would serve as checks on his power.

"I'm basically a cautious person," Mr. Harper said in a recent speech. "I believe it's better to light one candle than to promise a million light bulbs."

A change in Ottawa would almost certainly bring, at the least, a warming of relations with Washington, which have been strained since the American-led invasion of Iraq and have worsened over a series of recent trade disputes and Canadian moves to soften domestic drug laws.

Mr. Harper, while careful not to appear overly supportive of President Bush, has suggested he would reconsider Canada's refusal to join the American missile defense program. He has also promised to increase military spending and make a bigger contribution to NATO and peacekeeping operations in places like Haiti and Afghanistan. But he also said recently that he had no intention of sending troops to Iraq.

Mr. Martin, a former finance minister and shipping executive, has tried to emphasize the Liberal government's stewardship of the strong national economy, marked by low inflation and unemployment, a strengthening currency and a large budget surplus. He has promised to create a national child care program, expand aid grants to college students and ban handguns.

These are not unpopular stances, but the decline of Liberal fortunes is due less to any shift in Canadian public opinion than to two years of federal inquiries. Those investigations documented an embarrassing party money-laundering and campaign-finance scheme that had been devised to counter separatists after the close referendum on Quebec sovereignty in 1995.

Adding to the Liberal Party troubles, in the middle of the campaign, federal police investigators announced that they were looking into reports of possible Liberal government leaks of tax information to friendly investors that had spurred a flurry of insider trading.

And in Quebec, once a bastion of Liberal support, the party's free fall quickened with the publication of a book documenting allegations that the federal government had laundered millions of dollars of illegal aid to a group opposing separatists during the referendum campaign.

In recent weeks, the Liberals tried to recover votes with advertisements linking Mr. Harper to Mr. Bush, who is unpopular in Canada, and suggestions in speeches that Mr. Harper would attempt to reverse the legalization of same-sex marriage and abortion rights.

"A Harper victory will put a smile on George W. Bush's face," one Martin commercial said.

Various national polls in the final days of the campaign showed the Conservatives about 10 points ahead of the Liberals, but the Conservatives could still fail to win a majority in the House of Commons.

Mr. Harper leads a party that only three years ago merged a very conservative Canadian Alliance party with the much more moderate Progressive Conservative party.

"There are different factions and backgrounds and points of view in the Conservative coalition," noted Desmond Morton, a McGill University historian. It will not be easy to manage the factions, he said.

Mr. Harper's greatest success so far has been his surprising breakthrough in socially liberal Quebec, by taking votes away from both the Liberals and the separatist Bloc Québécois.

In From The Cold (NYT)

By Andrew Coyne

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

Toronto

AN outsider watching the Canadian election today may be forgiven for wondering what the fuss is about. A centrist Liberal government is about to be replaced, if the polls are correct, by a centrist Conservative one. Like its predecessor, the new government will probably hold only a minority of the seats in Parliament, meaning it will have to work with the other parties to pass legislation. Small earthquake in Canada; not many hurt.

But beneath Canada's placid surface, the tectonic plates are shifting.

Slowly, by stages, rather than suddenly and violently, the Western world's most enduring political dynasty is cracking up. The Liberal Party of Canada, it is often noted, held power for more years in the 20th century than the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. It has governed Canada, with occasional Conservative interludes, more or less since the First World War. Not for nothing is the system sometimes called "one-and-a-half-party rule."

Since the election of 1993, especially, the Liberals have ruled all but unopposed, the opposition having fractured into several regionally based parties. But you know what they say about absolute power, and sure enough the Liberals were implicated in a series of scandals, including a huge kickback scheme in Quebec.

At the same time, the party was beset by internal divisions, culminating in the sitting prime minister, Jean Chrétien, being forced from office by his own party. His successor, Paul Martin, came to power with enormous expectations, owing to his success as finance minister in taming our national deficits.

Mr. Martin quickly fell short of the mark. In 2004, the once-invincible Liberals were reduced to a minority, thanks in part to the scandal in Quebec, in part to disappointment with Mr. Martin, and in part to the resurrection of a united Conservative opposition led by Stephen Harper.

A dour economist from Alberta, Mr. Harper is no one's idea of a natural politician. But he is blessed with both a first-rate mind for policy and a sure strategic sense. Though decidedly from the (libertarian) right of the party, Mr. Harper has learned to temper his ambitions to reshape Canada's federal system and rein in its sprawling government. It isn't that he has suddenly been transformed into a moderate, in the mold of the party's hapless past leaders, but he has been converted to incrementalism.

Mr. Harper bet the election on this strategy. The Conservatives had been so far from power for so long, he calculated, that they had become an unknown quantity to many voters. Fear of the unknown was the Liberals' last remaining political weapon, their sole defense against widespread public fatigue with their government. Deny the Liberals that, and they would collapse.

Whatever his ideological objectives, Mr. Harper has as his first goal to make his party into a permanent contender for power: to end one-and-a-half party rule, forever. That is a matter not only of building a lasting electoral coalition, but given Canada's peculiar political history, of reforming its institutions. Conservative predecessors had won smashing victories, only to be overwhelmed in office by the vested interests of Liberaldom.

To avoid the same fate, Mr. Harper will have to confront the entrenched apparatus of Liberal rule, including the vast network of dependent client groups the party has cultivated over the years: big businesses, small businesses, activist groups, ethnic organizations, all on the federal dole and close to the ruling party.

He will also have to make reforms to Canada's outmoded democratic institutions, notably the appointed Senate, in which the Liberals, quelle surprise, hold a majority of the seats.

Last, he will have to set aside some of his own privileges, placing limits on the powers of patronage with which prime ministers have consolidated their rule. The Conservatives must plan for when they are again out of power and remove the instruments by which they were kept out.

Previous Conservative prime ministers aspired only to run the Liberal machine for themselves, leaving the motor running for the Liberals when they returned. Mr. Harper wants to dismantle it, piece by piece.

CARACAS, VENEZUELA--The palm trees and 19th-century, British-made, forged-iron fountain that grace the courtyard of Venezuela's neoclassical Congress buildings offer a cool respite from the chronic noise and pollution of this capital's historic center. Today, the white-and-lime-colored structure, once the site of a convent, is home to a most unusual institution--a freely elected legislature whose 167 members are, each and every one, government loyalists.

More from Nation & World

This unprecedented situation in a nominally democratic country resulted from the December election boycott by Venezuela's opposition parties to protest what they feared would be a rigged vote, a charge some believe was a cover for their anticipated defeat. Whatever the case, their last-minute withdrawal prompted most voters to stay home and produced a rubber-stamp legislature for the country's fiery leftist president, Hugo Chavez.

Polarization. The election results further consolidated power for Chavez, who allies himself with Cuba's Fidel Castro and gleefully flaunts his bad-boy reputation with Washington. But even as he uses influence and money to push other Latin America nations leftward, political watchers say Chavez may face a serious domestic backlash. "The conditions now exist," says Luis Vicente Leon, head of the Datanalisis polling organization, "for the radicalization of the debate and the formation of extreme groups to get rid of Chavez."

This country of 25 million people--whose importance is magnified by being the world's fifth-largest oil exporter (and fourth-largest U.S. oil supplier)--has become increasingly polarized in the seven years since Chavez was first elected president. "There exists in Venezuelan society today what we have never seen before, the division and resentment between social classes," remarked a young woman who would give only her first name, Mariana.

Since Chavez took office, the country has gone through a cascade of political tumult: the adoption of a new Constitution that many consider antidemocratic, a failed coup attempt, an unsuccessful recall referendum that large segments of society say was fixed, and a costly two-month oil-workers strike. For disaffected Venezuelans, their president is simply illegitimate. "His only objective is to remain in power; he does not have a model for the country," says Miguel Henrique Otero, editor of El Nacional, one of Caracas's leading dailies. Rejecting any Chavez comparison with the early days of the Cuban Revolution, he adds: "It's just the opposite. There is no ideology--they just want to steal and get rich."

Chavez says his goal is to create a 21st-century socialism, a nebulous and ill-defined mix of Soviet collectivism, Chinese-style capitalism, and Cuban populism. To date, his socialist model has tried to sidestep private enterprise by setting up nearly 7,000 state-financed cooperatives employing some 200,000 persons, creating state enterprises, and increasing government controls on the banking sector and the oil industry, which accounts for 80 percent of export earnings. The Venezuelan president also pushed a restrictive press law through the National Assembly and packed the Supreme Court by increasing the number of its judges from 20 to 32. Four of the five members of the National Electoral Council are Chavez loyalists.

For the average Venezuelan, however, perhaps the most troublesome aspect of his "Bolivarian Revolution," named after Simon Bolivar, the 19th-century independence hero, are Chavez's harsh verbal attacks against private ownership--although, in fact, few acres have been collectivized and only a handful of abandoned factories expropriated. Chavez put a halt to the exercise and stopped talking about the issue after polls showed that the vast majority of Venezuelans favor private property. "This is not the Cuba of Batista. This is not an island," says Cesar Perez Vivas, the secretary general of the center-right Social Christian Party known as Copei, referring to Fulgencio Batista, the Cuban dictator overthrown by Castro. "A very strong base of democratic values exists here."

Brazil," it has been quipped," is the country of the future and always will be." But back in the 1990s, Brazil and the rest of Latin America generated some real economic momentum. Growth boomed--the region's gross domestic product grew 79 percent--as governments dismantled trade barriers and sold state-owned companies. The change was more evidence of what political scientist Francis Fukuyama referred to as the "end of history," with democratic capitalism triumphant.

Catchy hypothesis. But the "domino theory" might better describe recent events in the region. In country after country, left-wing parties with more skeptical attitudes toward free markets have been on the march. Turns out that Venezuela's Hugo Chavez was just the prologue. On January 15, socialist doctor and former Defense Minister Michelle Bachelet won a runoff for the Chilean presidency, while the indigenous Bolivian politician Evo Morales--who once described capitalism as mankind's "worst enemy"--took office January 22. They join leftists of various flavors who, since 2002, have captured the presidencies of Brazil, Argentina, and Uruguay. And Mexico and Peru could be next.

Cronies. Why the leftward turn? Some blame rampant inequality. "The region went through a period of free-market reform in the '90s ... but there was too much crony capitalism,"says Alvaro Vargas Llosa, director of the Center on Global Prosperity. "Clearly there's been a backlash."Then, after the boom came a bust from 1998 through 2003, triggered by the Asian currency crisis. And even though regional economic growth has returned to a 4 percent annual pace, spurred on, in part, by the rising price of oil and other commodities, the turnover in governments continues. Hardly a paradox, says Morgan Stanley economist Gray Newman. "Those headline numbers mask a real unevenness in growth,"he explains. Chinese demand and rising prices may boost economic growth stats in these commodity-based economies, but not jobs or incomes. Yet fiery political rhetoric may not translate into radical economics, says analyst Carol Graham of the Brookings Institution. While Chavez and Morales favor more statist policies, most other leaders are modeling themselves on Tony Blair--not Fidel Castro. Bachelet has vowed to continue Chile's free-market approach, a set of policies begun back in the 1970s by the "Chicago Boys," a group of University of Chicago-trained Chilean economists working under the Augusto Pinochet administration. And Brazil's socialist president, Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva, is considered by investors to be a budget hawk. "Although there's been lots of talk about the return of the left, the way the economies are being managed suggests otherwise," Graham says.

Woman Of Iron And Silk (NSWK)

By Lally Weymouth

Newsweek, January 23, 2006

Tzipi Livni is a rising star in Israel. She was one of Ariel Sharon's favorite colleagues—the first person he asked to join his new party, Kadima. She's also very popular among Israeli voters, who consider her honest and tough. Now, with Sharon in a coma and new elections looming, Livni is working closely with Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to secure a Kadima victory. NEWSWEEK's Lally Weymouth met with Livni last week in Israel. Excerpts:

WEYMOUTH: You grew up in a hard-line Likud household?

DOJ_NMG_0010182

LIVNI: Today was the memorial for my father. I just came from the graveyard. On his gravestone is written here lies the head of operations of the irgun [an underground organization that fought for the establishment of the state of Israel]. On his tombstone is a map of Greater Israel, with both sides of the Jordan Valley as part of Israel. Many ask if territorial compromise is against my father's ideology. I say he taught me to believe in a democratic Israel as a homeland for the Jewish people where all enjoy equal rights. [But] I came to the conclusion that I... have to choose, and my choice is to [create] a homeland for the Jewish people but only in part of the land of Israel.

You decided you can't rule over another people?

It's against my values.

Has your position evolved over time?

No, I understood there was a need to divide the land, but I thought Labor did it the wrong way.

What was Sharon's most important political contribution?

The disengagement plan changed totally the terms of the conflict and the political map in Israel. It changed some of the right-wing understanding and should change the international community's attitude toward Israel. Until then, Israel was blamed as a country that wants to control the lives of the Palestinians and will not dismantle any settlements. What we did changed the relationship between Israel and the Palestinians and the status of Israel within the international community.

You and Sharon had a close relationship.

I feel that I gained his trust and confidence in the last two or three years. We could speak and he could feel he would not read it in tomorrow's newspapers.

How did you make up your mind to join Sharon's new party?

I entered Israel's political life and joined Likud because I thought it should lead Israel in terms of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict... Then I understood that there is no chance to get the Likud to be a united party because most Likud leaders couldn't make clear statements about the need for Israel to support a two-state solution. Until now, every Likud platform starts with the word "no" to a Palestinian state, "no" to the disengagement plan, "no" to this and "no" to that.

You need a party that puts forward [your] values?

It is important to understand the real meaning of a two-state solution. Israel was established as a homeland for the Jewish people. This should be also the true meaning of the future Palestinian state. It should be the answer for the Palestinians wherever they are: those who live in the territories and those who are being kept as political cards in refugee camps. In other words, the establishment of a Palestinian state takes [care of] what the Palestinians call "the right of return."

What do you do about the fact that after the Palestinian elections next week, Hamas may become a large part of the Palestinian government?

Israel made clear in the last few months that the participation of Hamas in the Palestinian Authority elections is totally against any kind of democratic values.

Will you cut off any Hamas-Palestinian government?

Israel cannot communicate with terrorist organizations... Abu Mazen says he is weak. When a leader is weak and cannotconfront the terrorist organizations, this is the real importance of the international community—to say it will not accept terrorist organizations as part of any parliament, any government.

It seemed as if Sharon's strategy was to decide on Israel's borders without a Palestinian partner.

The message is that Israel is no longer the Palestinian excuse for not fighting terrorism. We took our forces out of the Gaza Strip; we dismantled the settlements, and now Israel is no longer the excuse. And now we are back on the track of the Roadmap; we are not talking now about more unilateral steps. Our expectation is that the Palestinians will implement their word.

Sailor's Case Reflects Shift In U.S.-Japan Military Link (NYT)

By James Brooke

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0010183

TOKYO, Jan. 22 - After a United States Navy sailor was confined on an American base near here, accused of the Jan. 3 beating death of a Japanese woman, 20 people held a protest at the base. One man held up a sign that read, in English, "Dear Sailors, Don't Kill Local Women."

A decade ago, when three American servicemen were detained on an American base in Okinawa for the rape of a 12-year-old girl, 85,000 people marched one weekend, many demanding the expulsion of American bases from the island.

The difference is only partly explained by the way the United States handled the two cases. In 1995, American officials were much slower to allow the Japanese to place an American in custody; this time the suspect was transferred as soon as a Japanese arrest warrant was issued. Another major factor is the change in Japanese attitudes toward the military alliance with the United States.

In 1995, the cold war had only recently ended, and many Japanese expressed the belief that Japan no longer needed American troops. But the most recent case occurred days after Taro Aso, the foreign minister, warned that China was becoming "a considerable threat."

Koji Murata, an international relations professor at Doshisha University, said: "Japanese people are more and more concerned about China's economic and military rise, and North Korea. Japanese people are getting more and more realistic and think we have to sustain the military relation with the U.S."

Indeed, after a few days, coverage of the murder case had vanished from the Japanese news media. Instead, two Tokyo newspapers ran front-page photographs of Japanese Self-Defense Force soldiers and United States Marine Corps instructors practicing amphibious landings near San Diego.

"Japanese media has changed its attitude," Tatsuya Yoshioka, director of Peace Boat, a private group devoted to reducing military tensions in the region. "There is a completely hostile nationalism against North Korea and China that is promoted in the Japanese media, and on television."

In the fall of 1995, popular anger stewed in Okinawa as the three Americans suspected of rape were kept in American military custody for almost two months until there was a Japanese indictment. In March 1996, a Japanese court convicted the three Americans and gave them sentences ranging from six and a half to seven years. The sentences were served in a Japanese prison.

Under the agreement regulating relations between Japan and the American military, the United States is not required to hand over American military personnel suspected of committing crimes off duty and off base without an indictment. But after the Okinawa rape case, the United States agreed to give "sympathetic consideration" to the early transfer of suspects of major crimes.

The suspect in the new case, William O. Reese, 21, was the fourth such transfer; he was transferred as soon as a Japanese arrest warrant was obtained, four days after the victim, Yoshie Sato, 56, died. She had a fractured skull and her purse was missing the equivalent of $131.

The Navy allowed the transfer to be filmed for Japanese television.

"Transfer of custody is absolutely the right thing to do in this case," Rear Adm. James D. Kelly, commander of American naval forces in Japan, said in a statement. The United States military made other gestures. Admiral Kelly expressed regret and apologized to the victim's family.

About 100 United States Navy officers and sailors attended a wake for Ms. Sato. Admiral Kelly and Capt. Ed McNamee, commander of the Kitty Hawk, the aircraft carrier where the sailor was billeted, burned incense in her memory.

In Tokyo, the American Embassy promised close cooperation with Japanese authorities. Ambassador J. Thomas Schieffer expressed his "personal sorrow and outrage about the uncivilized behavior that resulted in the death of Ms. Yoshie Sato."

Some analysts note the gap between attitudes in Yokosuka, the city where the sailor is based, and those in Okinawa. Yokosuka is 30 miles from downtown Tokyo and is the home district of the Japanese prime minister, Junichiro Koizumi, who is vigorously pro-American. In contrast, Okinawa has long resented the fact that about half the Americans based in Japan, currently about 50,000, are stationed there.

US Made Mistake On Japan Beef: Zoellick Quoted (REU-Y2)

DOJ_NMG_0010184

Reuters, January 23, 2006

U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick told Japanese Agriculture Minister Shoichi Nakagawa on Sunday that a beef shipment to Japan that resulted in a renewed ban on U.S. imports was an unacceptable mistake, according to a U.S. Embassy official.

Japan, the biggest market for American beef, had just last month lifted a ban on imports imposed in 2003 after a U.S. case of the brain wasting mad cow disease.

The ban, which halted trade worth some $1.4 billion a year, had become an irritant in otherwise close bilateral ties, leading to strong pressure from Washington on the Japanes government.

The discovery on Friday of spinal material, believed to have a higher risk of causing a fatal human form of mad cow, in a shipment from the United States, prompted Japan to renew the ban.

Tokyo had lifted the ban under strict conditions, including a stipulation that materials such as spinal cord tissue be removed.

Experts believe humans can contract a type of mad cow, or bovine spongiform encephalopathy (BSE), by eating contaminated meat.

Zoellick, who met with Nakagawa for about an hour in Tokyo, also expressed sincere regret, the official at the U.S. embassy in Tokyo said.

"The U.S. has a commitment to Japan regarding beef exports and that is a commitment that we take seriously," the official quoted Zoellick as saying, adding that the U.S. Department of Agriculture has launched an investigation.

Nakagawa later told reporters he had called on Zoellick to take thorough measures so the agreement between the two nations on beef imports would not be violated again.

The announcement on Friday that the ban would be renewed raised questions about the initial decision to lift the ban as well as the overall trustworthiness of U.S. products, topics that will be high on the agenda when Zoellick meets Foreign Minister Taro Aso on Monday.

Aso said in a speech on Saturday that it was likely to take time before imports could once more be resumed and that the mistake inevitably raised questions about management on the U.S. side.

"We can only begin talk about imports after the management scheme is made certain," he was quoted by Kyodo news as saying.

"Unless this is solved quickly, trust in the United States will fall still further."

Such trust is falling among consumers, many of whom have expressed a reluctance to eat U.S. beef again even after imports resume.

"The United States does not understand the feelings of Japan" over the beef issue, Tsutomu Takebe, secretary general of the ruling Liberal Democratic Party, said in a Sunday speech shown on NHK national television.

Liberian Leader Wants Closer Relationship With U.S. (USAT)

By Rob Crilly Special For

USA Today, January 23, 2006

MONROVIA, Liberia — Liberia's new president says she wants to rebuild close ties with the United States in the wake of a 14-year civil war that undermined the relationship.

Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, sworn in Jan. 16 as Africa's first female head of state, said American help is essential to restoring vital services, such as running water and power. She warned that tens of thousands of former fighters could destabilize the country again if they don't get work or education.

Liberia is struggling to recover from a civil war that raged from 1989 to 2003. The fighting left 200,000 dead. Almost half the country's 3.5 million people were forced to flee their homes.

Relations with the United States suffered as President Charles Taylor, a former warlord, was accused of spreading violence to neighboring states and allowing al-Qaeda and other terror groups to profit from Liberia's diamond resources.

DOJ_NMG_0010185

Taylor eventually gave up office in 2003, paving the way for elections last fall that saw Harvard-educated Sirleaf become president.

She faces an enormous challenge as she tries to rebuild a country founded by freed American slaves in 1847. Liberia is one of the poorest nations in the world, rated 206th out of 208 in a World Bank ranking of income per person. It owes $3.5 billion to creditors.

The civil war left the entire country without running water or regular electricity. As Sirleaf spoke with USA TODAY on Saturday, power outages cut off electricity to her fourth floor office in Liberia's executive mansion.

Outside, garbage from the inauguration ceremony was being burned, sending acrid smoke spiraling into the sky.

The United States pledged to give Liberia almost $1 billion for reconstruction, spread over three years from 2004 to 2006. The funds include $75 million for work and education programs for the 100,000 militiamen — many just boys — who gave up their guns at the end of the war.

Sirleaf, 67, said she wants U.S. help rebuilding the country's shattered infrastructure and more money to keep the young fighters out of trouble.

"We cannot fail because then they will remain vulnerable to any kind of group intent on trouble that might try to recruit them," she said.

Sirleaf spent her first week in office meeting other West African leaders and discussing regional security problems. Street riots broke out in neighboring Ivory Coast last week and have the potential to shatter Liberia's fragile peace, she said.

One of the big questions she must address is the future of Taylor. It has been more than two years since he went into exile in Nigeria under a peace deal brokered as rebels closed in on him in Monrovia. He remains wanted by a United Nations-backed war crimes tribunal in Sierra Leone, where he is accused of fueling a decade-long civil war.

The United States has repeatedly pressed Nigeria to hand over Taylor, but Nigerian officials have refused, saying they would surrender him only to a democratically elected president in Liberia.

Sirleaf said she was consulting with regional leaders to find a way to bring the former warlord to justice without igniting a fresh conflict with his allies.

"We have to find a way not to leave him where he is, but to make sure that Liberia is safe," she said. "That's what makes it such a difficult thing. That's why it's not a done deal."

First lady Laura Bush and U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice traveled to the Liberian capital, Monrovia, to witness Sirleaf's inauguration.

Sirleaf said their presence signified improving relations.

"It helps to start … the restoration of confidence in the ability of the (Liberian) government to meet the needs of the population and to manage the resources of the country efficiently, effectively and honestly," she said.

Doctor-Birdwatcher Finds His 2 Callings United By Avian Flu (WSJ)

By Philip Shishkin

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2006

MALATYA, Turkey -- On a recent Sunday, Metehan Özen -- one of Turkey's foremost birdwatchers -- trained his $1,500 Leica telescope on an orange-chested Merlin falcon and watched it devour a smaller bird in a flurry of claws, flying feathers and blood.

A few days earlier, two boys played with a dead crow, developed a fever and were brought to Dr. Özen's pediatric hospital ward. There, the specialist in infectious diseases monitored them closely for signs of bird flu.

For years Dr. Özen's hospital job and his hobby existed in unconnected worlds. As Turkey grapples with the bird-flu outbreak here that has quickly infected at least 21 people and killed four, the doctor's two callings have put him in the middle of the quest to understand the virus and contain its spread.

Fellow doctors used to tease him about birdwatching. His wife, he says, was annoyed with his frequent Sunday absences. A week ago, after appearing on a television talk show about avian flu, Dr. Özen sipped a beer and said: "People used to make fun of me."

Not anymore. Over the past two weeks, as the virus rolled out across Turkey, the 37-year-old Dr. Özen briefed the country's top public-health officials about the epidemiology of avian flu and about the migratory routes of wild birds. They are suspected of introducing the virus to domestic poultry, which in turn can infect people. He took a long bus drive amid heavy snowfall and howling wolves to get to the scene of the first human cases near the Southeastern town of Van. There, he saw infected children and their chest X-rays, and visited the parents of three who had died. He helped draft the government's measures to combat the virus, including culling poultry and isolating domestic birds from humans and wild birds, and persuaded officials to ban the hunting of all wild fowl.

In September, Dr. Özen warned colleagues at a medical congress that wild birds could bring avian flu to Turkey during the winter migratory season, and that is now an accepted theory. Trade in infected poultry is another means for the virus to spread. "When you compare maps of migration patterns with maps showing bird-flu outbreaks, they often match each other," said Mehmet Ali Torunoglu, the head of the communicable diseases section at Turkey's ministry of health. "Metehan seems to be right."

Last week, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations urged countries along the flyways of migratory birds "to be highly vigilant and be prepared for a further spread of the disease in animals." Major flyways run North to South, connecting Siberia, the Middle East, parts of Asia, Africa and Southern Europe.

In late 2004, Dr. Özen tracked a satellite-tagged goose as it flew from Northern Russia, down to Kazakhstan, Eastern Turkey and Iraq, and then back. The goose's stops along the route gave Dr. Özen ideas about how the virus could spread through migratory flyways.

After visiting Van, Dr. Özen spent some time working with a team of experts at the Turkish health ministry's crisis center in the capital of Ankara. When he returned home, bad news awaited him at his hospital. The two young boys who had found a dead crow in their backyard had a mild form of viral pneumonia, a possible symptom of bird flu. In its human form, the virus often attacks the lungs and causes them to fail. Dr. Özen put the boys in an isolated ward, and waited uneasily for the results of tests that can determine bird flu.

They came back negative. So after his tense week, Dr. Özen headed out into the countryside for his usual pastime, but with a difference: Avian flu was never off his mind. Now, "every bird you see is suspect," Dr. Özen says.

He awoke at 6 on Sunday morning and set off to explore the rich avian world of the Karakaya lake on the outskirts of Malatya, an Eastern Anatolian town known mostly for its apricot orchards. Accompanied by two buddies -- a plastic surgeon and a railroad worker -- Dr. Özen was soon announcing the sightings of particularly interesting birds by chanting "aha, aha, aha...ha-ha-ha!"

A stocky beige barn owl, drowsy and slow in the early morning sunshine, was being chased and harassed by two nimble magpies swerving around it like two fighter-jets. A group of gray herons, their long necks recoiled for a nap, stood motionless on the shore. Two pygmy cormorants, an endangered species, flew across the bright blue sky. Thousands of ducks and Armenian gulls, their numbers swelled by winter migration, crisscrossed the lake. Hearing a barely audible trill, Dr. Özen identified the source as a little bird called chiffchaff.

Hundreds of gray coots that cannot fly particularly well followed one another in lemming-like tumbles into the water. A cat from a local village snatched a coot and made off with it into the lakeside shrubbery. Dr. Özen pondered out loud the interactions among species. "If the coot is infected, and the cat eats it, he could catch the virus, too," he said.

In the village of Toygar, right on the shore of the Karakaya lake, several roosters crossed the road and headed toward the water to mingle with hundreds of wild ducks. "This is exactly what I fear," Dr. Özen said. For most people, close contact with wildfowl is extremely rare, but domestic poultry routinely mix both with wild birds and with people. Sure enough, two children hopped off a donkey cart next to a wooden shack and approached the roosters.

Hasan Basri Tetik, a village elder in a traditional Anatolian knit hat, complained that some local peasants were ignoring government appeals to keep their poultry isolated from wildfowl and from people. Mr. Tetik now throws feed to his chickens from what he considers a safe distance.

As he continued his birdwatching tour, Dr. Özen's mobile phone buzzed on his belt. Someone from the university hospital where he works was calling to say that a dead bird had been found on campus and to ask Dr. Özen for help. He suggested calling local authorities. "If they call me about every dead bird, I'm finished," the doctor said, laughing. "It's winter, you know, birds die in winter all the time."

The next day at the hospital, a colleague sought Dr. Özen's opinion about eight farmers who checked into the infectious diseases department. The farmers had handled dead chickens that later tested positive for bird flu. A village elder insisted the men go to the hospital right away.

Dr. Özen rushed upstairs and took their mouth-swab and blood samples for further testing. Since the men had no flu symptoms and were growing bored in the isolated ward, Dr. Özen decided to release them, but he told them to report back at the smallest sign of sickness. He got on the phone to the local public-health authorities and ordered a pre-emptive regimen of the drug Tamiflu for the farmers, just to be safe.

As a child, Dr. Özen wanted to follow in his father's footsteps and join the air force. But his mother convinced him to study medicine. Always an avid hiker, he got into birdwatching in 1999.

Since then, he has sighted around 370 species out of Turkey's estimated 456, and he is at work on a "Birds of Turkey" volume. He and his buddies are now preparing a trip to look for a bird called the Great Bustard because at 26 pounds it's the heaviest thing flying in these parts. "The coolest bird isn't the one you've seen, but the one you haven't seen," he says.

Wealthy Kingdom With Elite Backing, A Catholic Order Has Pull In Mexico (WSJ)

By José De Córdoba

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2006

MEXICO CITY -- Two years ago, a handful of Latin American billionaires and some of the world's top financiers gathered at New York's Plaza Hotel. They were honoring Mexican plutocrat Carlos Slim and raising money for schools for poor children run by the Legion of Christ, a fast-growing conservative Roman Catholic order.

Among those giving speeches at the black-tie gala were the Rev. Marcial Maciel, the 85-year-old Mexican founder of the Legion, and Citigroup Inc. Chairman Sanford Weill. Within hours, the diverse group of 500 well-wishers raised $725,000.

The Legion was in its element. Founded in 1941, the order concentrates on ministering to the wealthy and powerful in the belief that by evangelizing society's leaders, the beneficial impact on society is multiplied. Like the Jesuits who centuries ago whispered in the ear of Europe's princes, the Legion's priests today are the confessors and chaplains to some of the most powerful businessmen in Latin America.

"The soul of a trash collector is as important as the soul of Carlos Slim, but if Slim is converted, think of the influence and power for good he would wield," says Luanne Zurlo, a former Goldman Sachs securities analyst who organized the benefit. Mr. Slim, Latin America's richest man with a fortune estimated at $24 billion, says he's not a highly devout Catholic but is helping the Legion create 50 low-cost universities in Latin America.

The Legion has become an important player in promoting the Vatican's social agenda and defending Catholicism's Latin American heartland from inroads made by evangelical Protestant groups. When the church was struggling to find priests in Germany, the Legion recruited German-speaking seminarians from Brazil to fill the gap. In Rome and Mexico City, Legion universities offer advanced degrees in bioethics that stress the limits morality should put on science.

The Legion's critics charge that its focus on the wealthy reinforces the sharp class divides that have long held Latin America back socially and economically. They say the Legion fosters intolerance and social climbing rather than devotion to Christ's gospel. Some in Mexico, instead of referring to the order's followers as Legionnaires of Christ, call them the "Millionaires of Christ."

More troubling for the Legion, Father Maciel, the order's founder, has been dogged for nearly a decade by widely publicized accusations that he sexually molested at least eight teenage seminarians from the 1940s through the early 1960s. Father Maciel denies the accusations. Many Catholic activists, angry with the church over cover-ups in priest sex-abuse cases, believe the Vatican has protected Father Maciel because of the Legion's reach and power.

The Legion operates in some 20 countries, including the U.S., Chile, Spain, Brazil and Ireland, but its influence is greatest in Mexico. Here it runs the country's fastest-growing network of Catholic schools for the well-to-do, and each spring mobilizes 20,000 volunteers to travel to remote towns and urge wavering Catholics to keep the faith.

DOJ_NMG_0010188

Catholic orders such as the Legion, the Franciscans and the Jesuits are largely independent of the church's diocesan governing structure and answer to their own directors based in Rome. To be active in a given diocese, however, they must obtain permission from the local bishop and are subject to his authority.

Even as the church struggles to recruit priests, the Legion's nine seminaries have turned out 650 ordained priests, many of whom come from wealthy families. That is up from 210 priests in 1990. The Legion's ranks also include about 2,500 seminarians studying to be priests and 1,000 "consecrated women" -- lay nuns who pledge to remain chaste and poor -- as well as some 65,000 lay supporters, in a group known as Regnum Christi.

Charitable works make up about $50 million of the Legion's $650 million yearly budget. It operates a network of 21 Mano Amiga schools for some 13,000 poor children, whose parents pay about $20 a month in tuition. Regnum Christi members have started many of Mexico's leading charitable efforts, such as a program through which supermarket customers donate money for a national food bank. In El Salvador and Mexico, the order has built small towns for disaster victims complete with schools, churches and medical facilities.

"The Legion is the only Mexican multinational in the world of religion," says Dionisio Garza Medina, chairman of Alfa, a large conglomerate in Monterrey, Mexico, and brother of the Legion's vicar general, the Rev. Luis Garza Medina. A sister of the two men is a consecrated woman.

Controversy often follows the Legion as it expands into new countries. Two years ago, Legion priests were barred from working in the archdiocese of St. Paul and Minneapolis after St. Paul Archbishop Harry Flynn said he worried that the Legion was building a "parallel church" behind the backs of local priests.

In 2004, two Baton Rouge, La., Catholic schools warned parents about the Legion's "questionable methods." Members of Regnum Christi paid for Baton Rouge students to fly to Los Angeles for a screening of Mel Gibson's "The Passion of the Christ" without notifying the schools. A spokesman for the Legion says the incidents were "misunderstandings" caused by the Legion's relative youth and overzealous Regnum Christi members.

The Legion was a favorite of Pope John Paul II, who liked its mix of religious fervor and conservative doctrine. Over the years, the late pontiff often praised Father Maciel's work. "John Paul used to talk about the Legion all the time, holding them up as examples while reading us the riot act," says the Rev. Vincent O'Keefe, a former deputy director of the Jesuits, a prominent order which fell into papal disfavor due to the liberal beliefs of some of its members.

Soon after John Paul II ascended to the papal throne in 1978, he made it known he wanted to become the first pontiff to visit Mexico, the world's second-biggest Catholic country after Brazil but one whose government was stridently anticlerical. Father Maciel wrangled an invitation by appealing to the then-president's devout mother and sisters, according to papal biographer George Weigel. That trip eventually led Mexico to establish diplomatic relations with the Vatican. In recent years, Father Maciel arranged a private audience with John Paul for President Vicente Fox's first wife, who worked in Rome for the Legion for a year.

Mr. Maciel today writes warm letters to Marta Fox, the president's powerful second wife, according to two friends of Marta Fox. One friend says the letters address her as "Mi muy querida Martita," or "My very dear Martita." Marta Fox's office didn't respond to a request for comment.

Ties to the Elite

The Legion's close ties with the elite are most evident in Monterrey, a city of four million that has long been dominated by businessmen in the so-called Group of Ten. For decades, Jesuits played a major role educating the children of the wealthy there, but the order veered leftward and was expelled in 1968 by the local bishop, who accused Jesuits of backing a strike at a local university. Since then, the Legion has set the social and intellectual tone for Monterrey's wealthy through a web of schools, clubs and charitable organizations.

Many of Monterrey's entrepreneurs and executives send their children to single-sex Legion schools where they make connections that last a lifetime. "They are very good educators," says Mr. Slim. "My children studied with them."

Middle-class parents struggle to pay the high tuitions of nearly $900 a month, convinced that their children will benefit from school ties, says David Martinez, a former member of Regnum Christi who studied in Legion schools and is now managing director of the New York-based hedge fund Fintech.

DOJ_NMG_0010189

At the Legion's after-school youth clubs, where the catechism is mixed with soccer and games, "vocation hunters" recruit candidates to become priests or consecrated women. As a first step, teenagers are encouraged to donate a year to the Catholic Church by volunteering for the Legion's world-wide operations. Around Monterrey, Legion priests dress in smart double-breasted black suits and sport cufflinks along with a clerical collar. Consecrated women wear ankle-length dresses.

In October, Monterrey's establishment turned out to see a newly ordained priest, the Rev. Benjamín Clariond -- whose father and uncle are former state governors -- celebrate his first mass in the city. The event was amply covered in the society pages of Monterrey's leading newspaper, which put 64 photographs of the event on its Web site.

Like the Clarionds or the Garza Medinas, almost every prominent clan in Monterrey has a son who is a Legion priest or a daughter who is a consecrated woman. Talk at dinner parties of the "movement" or the "kingdom," referring to Regnum Christi, is common. Mr. Martinez, the hedge fund manager, says Father Maciel is "worshipped" by Mexico's upper class because for 60 years he has made Mexico's rich feel as if "Christ loves them more than other people, and is using them as part of a divine plan."

The Legion's influence extends to the workplace, too, where many companies pay for Legion evangelists to lead weekly discussions on Catholic values. At Grupo Novem S.A. de C.V., a water-systems company owned by a family of Legion supporters, employees are urged to attend one-hour seminars on such subjects as marriage and human cloning. Message boards in the building extol the "Moral Value of the Month."

Oppressive Climate

The order's critics say the Legion creates an oppressive climate for those who don't follow orthodox Catholic teaching. José Zumaya, a psychiatrist who counsels couples in Monterrey, says some of his upper-class clients suffer from what he calls "Legionary syndrome," referring mainly to a dread of social ostracism if they get divorced. "They feel their children will have to leave school, they will lose all their friends, and there will be consequences for the husband at work as well," says Dr. Zumaya.

In December 2004, the University of Monterrey, a private Catholic institution that isn't affiliated with the Legion, fired five professors and a dean, most of whom taught women's studies. The fired dean blamed Mr. Garza Medina, a strong Legion supporter who in addition to his business interests serves as chairman of the university's board of trustees. Vice Rector Victor Zuñiga denies that the chairman played a role and says the dean was fired for poor performance. The Legion says it had nothing to do with the firings. A spokesman for Mr. Garza Medina says the university had no links to the Legion of Christ, and also cites poor performance as the reason for the dean's firing.

Mr. Zuñiga says a theology professor was fired around the same time because many parents disliked her questioning such topics as papal infallibility. He defends the decision, saying such questioning was akin to challenging President Bush's patriotism at a Texas university after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

The Legion points out that it serves more than Latin America's wealthy bastions. One day last summer, in San Francisco, a sweltering thatched-roof hamlet of Maya Indians in the southern Mexican state of Quintana Roo, premedical students from the Legion's Anahuac University, under the direction of a young doctor, examined a long line of children and dispensed medicines. Other college volunteers played with dozens of barefoot children and taught catechism lessons.

"How many sacraments are there?" asked Pablo Orvananos, a bearded tourism major. "Seven," answered a little girl, getting a lollipop as a prize.

When he started the Legion in 1941, Father Maciel was an ambitious 20-year old, the scion of provincial Catholic aristocracy. Three of his uncles were bishops and a fourth led an army of peasants against the Mexican government during the 1926 Cristero War, a struggle over state control of the Catholic Church that raged on and off until 1941 and cost some 250,000 lives. According to the Legion's official history, Pope Pius XII ordered Father Maciel in 1946 to recruit Latin American leaders and said the congregation should be like an evangelizing "army in battle formation."

Constantly traveling, Father Maciel proved to be adroit at raising money from rich Mexicans, in particular Flora Barragán de Garza, the Monterrey widow of one of the wealthiest men in Mexico at the time. One technique: Seminarians would write affectionate letters detailing their financial needs to Mrs. Garza, whom they addressed as their "mother." Mrs. Garza responded generously. She bought a Mercedes-Benz for Father Maciel and land in Mexico City that the Legion used to build its first school, Instituto Cumbres, or "The Heights," in 1952.

From 1956 to 1958, Vatican investigators relieved Father Maciel of his position while they looked into a range of charges about his conduct, although allegations of sexual abuse weren't raised at that time. Absolved by that inquiry, Father Maciel regained command of the Legion in 1959.

In 1997, eight men went public with complaints, made previously through informal church channels to the Vatican, that Father Maciel had abused them when they were seminarians in the 1940s and 1950s. The Vatican unit that investigates such charges -- then under the direction of Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger -- quickly tabled a formal complaint, filed with church authorities in 1998. In Mexico, leading media companies also ignored the allegations. When a small cable-television station ran a documentary about them, leading businessmen organized an advertiser boycott that almost drove the station into bankruptcy.

The investigation into Father Maciel seemed dead until last year, when it emerged that Cardinal Ratzinger had revived the probe in the waning days of Pope John Paul II's reign. In January 2005, soon after the probe began, Father Maciel resigned as head of the Legion, citing his advanced age. In April, a top Vatican investigator went to New York and Mexico to interview Father Maciel's accusers. The same month Cardinal Ratzinger became Pope Benedict XVI.

Today, the investigation remains open. The Legion is under the direction of the Rev. Alvaro Corcuera, a 47-year-old Mexican, who says he'll continue to govern "in the strictest fidelity" to the spirit of the founder.

The accusations against Father Maciel appear not to have damped the fervor of the Legion's well-to-do followers. In November, some 10,000 Regnum Christi members gathered under a huge tent in Guadalajara, Mexico, where they gave Father Corcuera a rock-star's welcome. As a guitar-strumming Legion priest sang a song honoring Father Maciel, Father Corcuera praised the founder's mother, Mamá Maurita, whom the Legion is lobbying to be made a saint.

Night Train To Guangzhou (WSJ)

By Melanie Kirkpatrick

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2006

North Korea's worst-kept secret was formally breached last week when Pyongyang confirmed, after the fact, that Kim Jong Il had paid an "unofficial" visit to China.

It's a tale worthy of Ian Fleming: A reclusive, nuke-armed dictator, afraid of flying, travels on a custom-fitted luxury train. The media scramble to confirm sightings after rumors surface in a dispatch from a South Korean news agency. A few days later a Japanese TV network airs hazy footage of a little fatso with a bouffant hair-do leaving a hotel in Guangzhou. Where's Waldo?

The North Korean leader is also apparently afraid of assassination -- with reason. The last time he went to China, a massive explosion rocked a railway station on the Korean side of the border a few hours after his train passed through -- causing many to believe that his subjects, who have no access to the ballot box, were expressing their political views. On this trip, the only reported damage caused was to the guests at the 850-room White Swan Hotel in the boomtown of Guangzhou, evicted en masse to make way for the Dear Leader and his entourage.

Kim's travels took him to the thriving south of China, prompting speculation that he's finally, really, truly going to introduce substantive economic reforms to his nation, one of the poorest on the planet. Scholars and journalists rushed to interpret the visit as a sign that Kim is gearing up to follow China's path to prosperity through free markets. (What's the Korean for "to get rich is glorious"?) Nowhere is that fantasy more indulged than in South Korea, where political leaders have been predicting since the '80s that the North's capitalist conversion is just around the corner. A senior official in Seoul noted that Kim's delegation included mostly technocrats -- no generals -- and predicted a surge in special economic zones in the North. Much was made of the fact that a banquet in Beijing Kim praised China's "shining achievements."

If all the hype engendered by Kim's trip sounds familiar, it should. A few years ago, Pyongyang's decision to end food rationing and sanction some private agricultural markets was heralded as the beginning of "Chinese-style" reform. So, too, was the creation of the Kaesong industrial zone, on the southern border; 15 South Korean companies now operate there using cheap Northern labor. In 2002, the North's leaders even went so far as to utter the previously taboo words, "economic reform."

In any event, every indication that North Korea is liberalizing is countered by evidence of precisely the opposite. Last fall, the government banned the private farmers' markets that fed much of the urban population. Shortly before Kim's journey, Pyongyang announced the end of international food aid that had been feeding up to a third of the people. It evicted the World Food Program and told European aid groups to get out by spring. Now, Pyongyang will have to find other sources to avoid shortages.

Two million died in the famine of the late 1990s. And that's where China and, especially, South Korea come in. Pyongyang blithely takes their food aid, which has few or no conditions attached. The U.N., by contrast, requires in-country monitors to confirm that aid was delivered to the starving civilians for whom it was intended. In addition to food, the South's overall economic influence in the North is growing rapidly; two-way trade reached $1.05 billion last year compared with $697 million in 2004.

There's another aspect of North Korea's economy that has received attention recently: its black-market trade in weapons, drugs and counterfeit dollars. President Bush signed an executive order in June authorizing financial sanctions against WMD-proliferators as well as those providing support to them. It didn't take long for North Korea to feel the heat. In September the Treasury used a provision of the Patriot Act to ban U.S. companies from doing business with the Macau-based Banco Delta Asia, saying it helped North Korea launder money. In October, Treasury blacklisted eight North Korean companies, calling them fronts for proliferating WMD. In December, it warned U.S. banks that North Korea might be looking for new channels for laundering money and urged them to "take reasonable steps to guard against the abuse of their financial services by North Korea."

Finally, there is one other potential pressure on the North's economy: its people. It's getting harder for Pyongyang to keep news of the outside world from seeping in. One of the more subversive tools are South Korean soap operas, videotapes of which are finding their way to the North. After DVD players became commonplace in China, discarded video-players were sold on to North Korea. When measured against the South, the workers' paradise looks less celestial.

Kim's recent trip to China isn't likely to result in economic transformation, or prosperity for his people. His authority depends on his ability to control the economy, keeping his people shackled to the state for food, shelter and work. That's the ugly bottom-line.

Bush's Big Silence (WP)

By Fred Hiatt

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

If promoting democracy is President Bush's largest ambition, then Russia is his largest failure.

Not that President Vladimir Putin is the world's most repressive ruler -- far from it. Dictatorships in Burma, North Korea and Zimbabwe are more stifling. So, for that matter, are tyrannies in Russia's neighborhood, such as Belarus, Uzbekistan and Turkmenistan.

But no other nation has regressed from openness to authoritarianism during Bush's time in office as dramatically and decisively as Russia -- and with less apparent objection from Bush.

Of course, no U.S. president is responsible for Russia's fate; Russians are. Yet Syrians and Egyptians will determine their own fates, too, and that doesn't stop Bush from wielding U.S. diplomacy and rhetoric to aid pro-democracy forces in their countries. His foreign policy is grounded in the belief that over time the United States can be a force for liberty throughout the world.

So his insouciance with respect to Russia is a mystery. Does it mask a calculation that what happens inside Russia just isn't as important as democratic development in the Middle East, given the U.S. war against radical Islamic terrorists? That it makes sense to keep Putin as a partner while fighting those more pertinent battles?

That would be a miscalculation, for at least three reasons. First, Russia is one front in the war. Its brutal tactics in the southern province of Chechnya are radicalizing Muslim residents there; growing Slavic nationalism risks alienating Muslim minorities in other parts of Russia; and Putin's succor of dictators in neighboring Islamic countries such as Uzbekistan helps create the kind of terror-incubators that Bush said after Sept. 11 could no longer be tolerated.

Second, while an authoritarian Russia may offer tactical cooperation from time to time according to its interests, it cannot be a strategic partner of the America that Bush described in his second inaugural address, because the two countries' values and goals will differ so sharply.

Third, and perhaps most damaging to Bush's strategy, is the negative example Russia provides. In the 1990s, democratization seemed inexorable. Countries were moving toward freedom at different speeds, and some hadn't moved at all -- but with the fall of communism, all eventually would. The ease and speed with which Putin has reversed course saps the sense of momentum and inevitability that could be Bush's biggest ally.

Irina Yasina, director of a pro-democracy foundation in Moscow, said the mood in Russia today resembles what Russians recall as the "stagnation era" under General Secretary Leonid Brezhnev. Yasina, 42, remembers as a 10-year-old being told by her father -- the now well-known liberal economist Yevgeny Yasin -- that he felt buried alive by the communist system.

"But at least then we knew that we were at the end of something," Yasina, a former journalist, said during a visit to Washington last week. "What is most frightening now is that we don't know whether something is ending or is only just beginning."

This month Putin signed legislation that could shutter Yasina's foundation and many other civic organizations. The law creates a Soviet-style bureaucracy to register nongovernmental organizations, leaving the qualifications so vague that the bureaucrats, or the Kremlin, will be free to license or reject as they choose.

Yasina's foundation is a likely target because it was founded, and is still largely endowed, by billionaire oilman Mikhail Khodorkovsky, whom Putin has had confined to a labor camp near the Chinese border because the tycoon dared hint of a political challenge. The camp is a nine-hour plane ride followed by a 15-hour train ride from Moscow, but sometimes when his lawyers arrive they are told they cannot see their client because lawyer visiting hours coincide with forced-labor hours, Yasina said. Khodorkovsky's visit with his wife, promised for month's end, was canceled -- because, he was told, the visiting room is undergoing renovation.

This may seem petty, but pettiness and paranoia are hallmarks of a president who increasingly has isolated himself from anyone but former KGB agents like himself. The broadcast media are Kremlin-controlled, as are parliament, provincial governors, unjailed business tycoons and the judiciary. All of these sectors were free and independent when Putin -- and Bush -- took office.

Now, although they are weak and he is strong, Putin is going after civic organizations, because they are the final outposts of independent activity -- and because he is convinced that the CIA will use such groups to threaten his regime.

This is the man whom Bush will visit in July when Putin hosts a Group of Eight meeting in St. Petersburg. There will be fine photo opportunities in repainted czarist palaces, and the message Putin wants to send his subjects will be clear: I am a czar, and the leaders of the world's democracies do not care; they accept me. The question for Bush is whether he is happy to help Putin send that message.

Rice's Blind Spot (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

Nobody doubts her star power. She speaks Russian and talks football, wears dominatrix boots and plays Dvorak, weaves her segregated Alabama childhood into speeches about geopolitics. But the strange thing about Condoleezza Rice is that, when it comes to the stuff that a professor-politician should be really good at, she can be oddly flat-footed. This was true when she emerged as George W. Bush's fitness buddy and foreign policy tutor seven years ago. It is still true now.

In January 2000, as the Bush campaign got underway, Rice published a manifesto in Foreign Affairs that laid out the classic "realist" position: American diplomacy should "focus on power relationships and great-power politics" rather than on other countries' internal affairs. "Some worry that this view of the world ignores the role of values, particularly human rights and the promotion of democracy," she acknowledged. But the priority for U.S. foreign policy was to deal with powerful governments, whose "fits of anger or acts of beneficence affect hundreds of millions of people."

Even six years ago, this was an outdated position. The Clinton administration was certainly preoccupied with powers such as Russia and China, but it was also tracking Islamic terrorists who had already attacked the World Trade Center. The importance of other non-state actors, from rebels to environmentalists to bond traders, had become a cliche of globalization commentary; AIDS had been recognized as a security threat. The era of great-power politics was widely thought to have ended with the collapse of the Soviet Union. Rice seemed like a Sovietologist who hadn't quite caught up.

Even more curiously, Rice was leaning against the tide in her own party. Ever since the 1970s, the heyday of the ultra-realist Henry Kissinger, his followers had been retreating. The realists favored accommodation with pro-American autocrats, but then

Iran's shah fell, followed by dictators in the Philippines and South Korea -- and the realists found themselves on the wrong side of history. Likewise, the realists favored detente with the Soviets, but Reagan's denunciations of the evil empire proved more effective. Time and again, the idea that diplomacy consisted mainly of relations with powerful governments proved wrong. As a rising cadre of neoconservative Republicans argued, diplomacy was often about judging the currents within countries -- and backing democratic ones.

Fast-forward to 2006. Rice gave two speeches last week calling for "transformational diplomacy," meaning diplomacy that will transform undemocratic societies: The internal affairs of other countries turn out to be important after all. "The greatest threats now emerge more within states than between them," she said Wednesday. "The fundamental character of regimes now matters more than the international distribution of power. In this world it is impossible to draw neat, clear lines between our security interests, our development efforts and our democratic ideals."

Well, that's quite a turnaround. But it's not a completely satisfying one, because the debate has recently moved on. Rice has caught up with the 1990s consensus that powerful states may pose less of a problem than disintegrating weak ones and that the best hope for peace in the long term is a world of stable democracies. But she's only half-acknowledging the next question: Yes, weak and autocratic states are a problem, but can we do anything about them?

The best formulation of this new debate comes from Francis Fukuyama, who famously proclaimed the universality of the democratic urge in his 1989 essay on history's end. Fukuyama certainly believes in spreading U.S. values, but he has emerged as a critic of the Iraq war because he believes its ambitions were unrealizable. The United States lacks the instruments to transform other societies, Fukuyama argues; to build nations you must first build institutions, and nobody knows how to do that. Conservatives, who have long preached the limits to what government can achieve with domestic social policies, should wake up to government's limits in foreign policy as well.

Rice shows some signs of seeing this. She is not content with the instruments of foreign policy as they exist, and her speeches last week were about fostering new ones -- a strengthened office for post-conflict stabilization and a reconfigured foreign aid program. But this only begins to confront Fukuyama's worry, which is that no amount of tinkering with the apparatus of government will make nation-building possible. Creating a functional Iraq or Afghanistan requires creating norms of work and trust and honesty, and such norms can't be conjured by outsiders, no matter how well organized they are.

The big question today in foreign policy is not whether you are a realist or an idealist. It's whether you are an optimist or a pessimist: whether you think that Iraq has gone badly merely because the Bush administration mishandled it, or whether you believe that no amount of skillful management could have achieved stability after three years. I've watched Rice handle squadrons of aggressive journalists, and there's no doubting her intellect. But her forays into grand theory are disappointing. Last week's call for "transformational diplomacy" merely slides past today's big question. It doesn't offer an answer.

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House Steps Up Defense Of Domestic Spying Program (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, January 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — The White House launches a political campaign this week, not for a candidate but for a controversial program: warrantless surveillance of some U.S. citizens by the National Security Agency.

President Bush plans to defend the program in a counterterrorism speech today at Kansas State University, aides said. The speech will kick off a flurry of administration activity leading to Senate hearings scheduled for Feb. 6.

"We are stepping up our efforts to educate the American people about this vital tool in the war on terrorism," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said.

At the administration appearances, Bush and aides plan to repeat arguments they have made before: This is a limited program that kicks in only when one of the parties is beyond U.S. borders and has some kind of link to the al-Qaeda terrorist organization.

Just before Bush's speech today in Manhattan, Kan., Gen. Michael Hayden plans to discuss the surveillance program at the National Press Club. Hayden, the principal deputy director of national intelligence, once headed the National Security Agency, which conducts the surveillance.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is scheduled to address the issue in a speech Tuesday, McClellan said. On Wednesday, the president plans to visit the NSA headquarters at Fort Meade in Maryland.

Democrats say they also want to fight terrorism, but some say the once-secret program is unconstitutional because it permits eavesdropping on some U.S. citizens without a court warrant. "No one is above the law," said Josh Earnest, spokesman for the Democratic National Committee.

As for legal authority, Bush and his supporters have cited his constitutional power as commander in chief. They have also pointed to the congressional resolution passed after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks that authorized force against the planners.

Some Republicans, including Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., have questioned the program's legality in light of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA). The act requires warrants from a special secret court when eavesdropping involves Americans. Specter, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, plans to conduct the hearing Feb. 6.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., speaking on Fox News Sunday, said he doesn't see the legal authority for the program. He suggested the administration sit down with members of Congress to discuss possible changes to the FISA law in light of advances in communication since the law passed in 1978. "Why not come to Congress?" McCain said. "We can sort this all out."

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., who lost the presidential election to Bush in 2004, said a special counsel should investigate the program. Appearing Sunday on ABC's This Week with George Stephanopoulos, Kerry said he welcomes the debate over the Bush policy. "There is a way to protect the Constitution and not go off on your own and violate it," Kerry said.

Some Republicans who attended their party's winter meeting during the weekend said the surveillance program should be an election-year issue. Karl Rove, Bush's top political adviser, said Friday in a speech, "This is an issue worthy of public debate."

"President Bush believes if al-Qaeda is calling somebody in America, it is in our national security interest to know who they're calling and why," Rove said.

He said later that "Democrats have a pre-9/11 view of the world."

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., appearing Sunday on CNN's Late Edition, called Rove's remarks a "cheap shot" designed to take the spotlight off White House "incompetence" over Iraq, Hurricane Katrina and problems with its prescription-drug plan.

He said Democrats would take a back seat to no one in "fighting a tough war on terror. But what Karl Rove is doing is trying to divert attention."

Delicate Dance For Bush In Depicting Spy Program As Asset (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0010198

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 - With a campaign of high-profile national security events set for the next three days, following Karl Rove's blistering speech to Republicans on Friday, the White House has effectively declared that it views its controversial secret surveillance program not as a political liability but as an asset, a way to attack Democrats and re-establish President Bush's standing after a difficult year.

Whether the White House can succeed depends very much, members of both parties say, on its success in framing a complicated debate when the country is torn between its historic aversion to governmental intrusion and its recent fear of terrorist attacks at home.

Polls suggest that Americans are divided over whether Mr. Bush has the authority to order the searches without warrants that critics say violate the law and that the president says are legal and critical to the nation's security.

But as the White House and Democrats are well aware, the issue can draw very different reactions depending on how it is presented. These next few days could prove critical, as both Mr. Bush and Congressional Democrats move aggressively to define what is at stake.

Americans may be willing to support extraordinary measures - perhaps extralegal ones - if they are posed in the starkest terms of protecting the nation from another calamitous attack. They are less likely to be supportive, members of both parties say, if the question is presented as a president breaking the law to spy on the nation's own citizens.

Viewed from the perspective of the battles over the Homeland Security Act or the USA Patriot Act, this White House holds a tactical edge; it has repeatedly proved highly effective in defining complicated debates against the Democratic Party. Applying the campaign lessons of simplicity and repetition, Mr. Bush and Mr. Rove, his chief political adviser, have systematically presented arguments in accessible if sometimes exaggerated terms, and they have regularly returned to the theme of terrorism since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Mr. Rove's speech on Friday to the Republican National Committee was a classic example. "Let me be as clear as I can be: President Bush believes if Al Qaeda is calling somebody in America, it is in our national security interest to know who they're calling and why," Mr. Rove said. "Some important Democrats clearly disagree."

Democrats - and, though Mr. Rove made no mention of this Friday, some Republicans, too - have indeed challenged the administration for eavesdropping without obtaining warrants. They argue, among other points, that the White House is bypassing legal mechanisms established in 1978 that already allow law enforcement agencies to move rapidly to monitor communications that might involve terrorists. Yet it is difficult to think of a Democrat who has actually argued that it is not "in our national security interest" to track Qaeda calls to the United States, as Mr. Rove contested; he did not offer any examples of whom he had in mind.

Beyond that tactical edge, the White House enjoys the advantage of its platform. The sheer crush of news media attention to a rare public speech by Mr. Rove could not have been lost on Democrats.

By contrast, there is no single Democrat who stands as the voice of opposition. That difference is likely to become particularly glaring this week, with a speech on Monday by Lt. Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the former head of the National Security Agency; a legal defense of the spying program on Tuesday by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales; and a visit by Mr. Bush to N.S.A. headquarters on Wednesday. This orchestrated campaign is the work of the same White House that initially offered a crouched, guarded response to the disclosure of the eavesdropping program last month.

Still, in many significant ways the task the White House faces now may prove more daunting than the battles it has waged on this terrain before.

A number of Republicans have joined Democrats in challenging the surveillance program, pointedly reminding the administration that precedents established today will be in place whenever a Democrat returns to power.

"A lot of Democrats?" said one prominent Republican supporter of Mr. Bush, who did not want to be identified while being critical of a White House that famously does not brook criticism. "Democrats, Karl? Republicans, too."

David A. Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union, said: "A lot of conservatives are very skeptical about it. It is not as clean-cut a political win as the administration thinks that it is."

Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican and chairman of the Judiciary Committee, is planning hearings on the surveillance program. And in an interview on Fox News on Sunday, Senator John McCain of Arizona said he did not think the president had the legal authority for this operation, adding that the White House should seek Congressional approval to alter the 1978 provisions if it thinks they are not working now.

Mr. McCain also came to the defense of Democrats in response to Mr. Rove's suggestion that they were not committed to the nation's security. "Do I think that the president's leadership has been worthy of support of our party and our leadership?" he said. "Yes. But there's too many good Democrats over there who are as concerned about national security and work just as hard as I do."

DOJ_NMG_0010199

Beyond that, one Republican analyst who is skeptical about the White House strategy said Mr. Bush's position was hardly helped by the fact that his credibility numbers have dropped along with his popularity since his re-election. Mr. Bush may find that, as some Democrats have suggested, the invocations of Sept. 11 do not have the force they once had.

For their part, Democrats said they have learned from their repeated defeats by this White House. The Democratic presidential candidate of 2004, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, said in an interview on Sunday that Mr. Rove and the White House were willfully distorting the Democratic position.

"He's playing an old game," Mr. Kerry said. "Every time they have a problem, they play the 9/11 card."

"We all support surveillance - that's where they are playing word games again," Mr. Kerry said. "You can protect the safety of the American people and you can protect the Constitution."

The political complexity of the issue was reflected in remarks by Governor Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, a Republican, who, like Mr. Kerry, is considering a run for president. Speaking by telephone on a trip to Iowa, Mr. Romney at first offered full support for the president's surveillance program.

"The eavesdropping is a big matter on the coasts for people who are inclined to dislike the president," Mr. Romney said. "The great majority of Americans think it is the president's first responsibility to protect the lives of the American citizens in an urgent setting where there is a threat of terrorism."

But Mr. Romney called back a few moments later to make clear that he would have a different view if the program were found to be unlawful.

"I would never suggest that the president should break the law," he said. "My guess is, my assumption is, he did not break the law. The president has a responsibility to follow the law, which I believe is likely to be found, but he also has a primary responsibility to protect the American people."

Lawmakers Seek Review Of Eavesdropping Rules (REU-Y2)

By Joanne Kenen

Reuters, January 23, 2006

U.S. surveillance laws should be reviewed and possibly rewritten to allow the type of eavesdropping that U.S. President George W. Bush has been criticized for authorizing, lawmakers from both parties said on Sunday.

Democrats and some Republicans have said the Bush administration's classified warrantless eavesdropping program is illegal. The White House has strongly defended the National Security Agency surveillance as both legal and essential. The Senate Judiciary Committee starts hearings on the issue on February 6.

The NSA has been monitoring communications, such as e-mail and telephone calls, into and out of the United States by people believed linked to al Qaeda or related groups.

An audio tape by Osama bin Laden that emerged last week threatening new attacks on the United States has heightened security concerns. Neither party can afford to be seen as failing to protect the country, particularly as corruption scandals and public questioning of the Iraq war loom over November's congressional elections.

Lawmakers on several Sunday talk shows said that if the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) does not give Bush the tools and legal framework he needs to monitor potential threats, the president should ask Congress to change the law rather than bypass it.

Massachusetts Democrat John Kerry, who endorsed former Vice President Al Gore's call for an independent investigation of the Bush program, said on ABC's "This Week" that some Republicans like Bush adviser Karl Rove are trying to equate Democratic opposition to warrantless spying as weakness.

"What he's (Rove) trying to pretend is somehow Democrats don't want to eavesdrop appropriately to protect the country. That's a lie," Kerry said. "We're prepared to eavesdrop wherever and whenever necessary in order to make America safer."

'THERE IS A WAY'

But Kerry said the spying has to be legal and constitutional and if Bush needs the law to be changed, "then come to us and tell us... There is a way to protect the Constitution and not go off on your own and violate it."

Other prominent Democratic senators including Dick Durbin of Illinois, Charles Schumer of New York and Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut made similar comments about reexamining the breadth and modernity of FISA in television interviews a few days after Rove urged Republicans to campaign on national security and the war on terror.

Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), who has also questioned the legality of the eavesdropping, also urged the administration to work with Congress on modernizing the 1978 FISA law to take into account technological changes in communications.

"I know of no member of Congress, frankly, who, if the administration came and said here's why we need this capability, that they wouldn't get it. And so let's have the hearings," McCain said on Fox News Sunday.

House Intelligence Committee chairman Pete Hoekstra of Michigan, a strong defender of the president's program, said on ABC's "This Week" that "we'll take a look at whether there needs to be a change in the law."

But his Senate counterpart Intelligence Committee chairman Pat Roberts of Kansas said he worried that the public debate about what the NSA can or cannot do would harm its intelligence gathering.

"Al Qaeda are not stupid," he said on CBS's "Face the Nation." "I really worry about losing that capability and seeing a diminished capacity for the president to act and detect a possible attack on the homeland, then do something about it."

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said the administration continues to brief members of Congress as it has done more than a dozen times during the last several years.

Bush will visit the NSA on Wednesday as part of the effort to highlight the need for the program. Air Force Gen. Michael Hayden, former head of the NSA, will make a speech at the National Press Club on Monday and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will speak on Tuesday.

Lawmakers Say Will Press Bush On Spying (AP-Y2)

By Hope Yen

AP2, January 23, 2006

Several lawmakers said Sunday they will press President Bush to justify his decision to allow domestic eavesdropping, rebuffing GOP suggestions their criticism of broad executive authority puts the nation at risk.

During the Sunday talk shows, lawmakers were responding to efforts by White House aide Karl Rove to make national security the top partisan issue in the November midterm elections. Rove made the comments about the time that new audiotape warnings by Osama bin Laden were released, threatening an upcoming attack on the U.S.

"I think Karl Rove made a big mistake last Friday to use this issue as his opening salvo to Republican operatives," said Rep. Jane Harman (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif., the senior Democrat on the Intelligence Committee.

"The terrorists aren't going to check our party registration before they blow us up. ...We're under attack as America," she said on ABC's "This Week."

"The NSA's terrorist surveillance program is targeted at al-Qaida communications coming into or going out of the United States," White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan said in a statement later Sunday. "It is a limited, hot pursuit effort by our intelligence community to detect and prevent attacks."

He accused Democrats of making "misleading and outlandish charges about this vital tool that helps us do exactly what the 9/11 Commission said we needed to do connect the dots."

Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., appearing on "Fox News Sunday," said the new threats emphasize a greater need for Bush to fully consult with lawmakers from both parties on the best strategy for spy programs within the confines of the law.

"Do I think that the president's leadership has been worthy of support of our party and our leadership? Yes," McCain said.

But McCain questioned efforts to paint Democrats as weak on national security.

"There's too many good Democrats over there who are as concerned about national security and work just as hard as I do," McCain said.

On Friday, Rove outlined a blueprint for Republicans to prevail in the midterm elections, suggesting that Democrats have undermined anti-terror efforts by questioning Bush's authority to allow wiretapping without getting court approval first.

Bush has cited a congressional resolution passed after Sept. 11, 2001 that authorized him to use force in the fight against terrorism as allowing him to order the program. The program allows eavesdropping of international phone calls and e-mails of people deemed a terror risk.

Several lawmakers from both parties, including McCain and Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, have questioned the program's legality because Bush did not get court approval nor fully consult with Congress. Specter's committee will hold a hearing Feb. 6.

On Sunday, some Republicans echoed Rove's anti-terror themes, arguing that Bush should have broad power even if the 2001 congressional resolution did not expressly authorize or otherwise notify lawmakers of the domestic spying.

Sen. George Allen (news, bio, voting record), R-Va., who is considered a possible 2008 presidential contender, said there are many security measures he doesn't know — and shouldn't know — because it could risk alerting the enemy.

"Neither did I know what sort of intercepts or communications of financial assistance or other things that I don't know about," he said.

Allen cited in particular the new bin Laden tape which surfaced last week as evidence that the terror cells might exist in the U.S. and might be preparing to attack should law enforcement officials let their guard down.

DOJ_NMG_0010201

"I find nothing wrong with having a hearing. This maybe ought to be something that you would ratify — yes, the president has this authority," Allen said on CNN's "Late Edition."

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass. said Rove is being divisive by seeking to exploit the terror threat for political gain. Wartime should not give a president unchecked authority, he said on ABC's "This Week."

"You know, Osama bin Laden is going to die of kidney failure before he's killed by Karl Rove and his crowd," Kerry said. "We're prepared to eavesdrop wherever and whenever necessary in order to make America safer. But we need to put a procedure in place to protect the constitutional rights of Americans."

Lawmakers Debate New Limits On Spying (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — Lawmakers of both parties Sunday called for Congress to consider whether new restrictions were needed on government surveillance in suspected terrorism cases involving people in the United States.

Congress is deeply divided on whether the Bush administration acted illegally in carrying out warrantless eavesdropping on communications in hopes of detecting terrorist plots.

But in interviews in advance of Senate hearings next month on the issue, several influential lawmakers said Congress should play a larger role in determining how the surveillance should be run.

"I know of no member of Congress, frankly, who if the administration came and said, 'Here's why we need this capability,' that they wouldn't get it," Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who has questioned the legality of the eavesdropping, told "Fox News Sunday."

"Let's have the administration come to Congress. I think they will get that authority, whatever is reasonable and needed, and increased abilities to monitor communications are clearly in order."

Sen. Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the Senate's No. 2 Democrat, said that approaching Congress was "exactly the way [President Bush] should have handled it long ago."

"If the president came to us and said there are changes in technology, changes in the threat to America, we need to change and modify the law, you bet he would have a Congress ready to work with him," Durbin said on "Fox News Sunday."

On ABC's "This Week," Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) attacked Karl Rove, Bush's top political advisor, for his remarks to Republican activists last week, in which Rove said "some important Democrats clearly disagree" with the administration's belief that "it is in our national security interest" to know if terrorism suspects are communicating with people in the United States.

"What [Rove is] trying to pretend is somehow Democrats don't want to eavesdrop appropriately to protect the country. That's a lie," Kerry said. "We're prepared to eavesdrop wherever and whenever necessary in order to make America safer."

If the administration has determined that the current setup is unworkable, Kerry said, "then come to us and tell us how you can do it…. There is a way to protect the Constitution and not go off on your own and violate it."

Rep. Jane Harman of Venice, the ranking Democrat on the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, said she believed the administration had broken the law by failing to fully brief the intelligence committees on the program.

"Congress should decide whether [the law] is being violated in any way by this program," she said on "This Week."

But Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.), chairman of the House intelligence committee, said on the same program that he had been invited in the past to ask questions about the program and to consider whether it was legal.

"The problem we have right now is that we have a whole bunch of Democrats who were for this program before they were against it," Hoekstra said. "And the only thing that has changed is that the story was illegally, in a damaging way, leaked to the New York Times," which first reported the surveillance last month.

White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan issued a written response to lawmakers' comments on the talk shows.

"Senate Democrats continue to engage in misleading and outlandish charges about this vital tool that helps us do exactly what the 9/11 commission said we needed to do — connect the dots," McClellan said.

Kerry Criticizes NSA Wiretaps (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, January 23, 2006

Sen. John Kerry yesterday called the National Security Agency's program to eavesdrop on terror suspects illegal, but he said he will continue to support its funding.

"It is a violation of law," said the Massachusetts Democrat and former presidential contender, who also backed former Vice President Al Gore in calling for a special investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0010202

"I agree that we ought to have a special counsel investigate. I agree that we ought to have an independent commission because this Congress has proven itself unwilling to do what's necessary to perform its responsibilities," Mr. Kerry said.

Appearing on ABC's "This Week," Mr. Kerry was asked by host George Stephanopoulos, "If you think this is a clear violation of the law, why not move to cut off funding for the program?"

"That's premature," Mr. Kerry responded.

Under the authority of the president, who consulted on the matter with congressional leaders, the National Security Agency engaged in electronic surveillance of al Qaeda suspects, including U.S.-bound phone calls and e-mails, without a warrant.

Sen. George Allen, Virginia Republican, told CNN that Mr. Bush has the authority to conduct wiretapping of terror suspects.

"An argument can be made that the president, by virtue of his office and his role and responsibility, is to prevent attacks on the United States. The more specific authority he has right now was the Congress authorized the use of military force. And, in that use of military force, it was to wage war against those who have declared war on us, specifically al Qaeda."

"The point of the matter is that this is what you would expect," Mr. Allen said. "Wouldn't you want us to know what the enemies are plotting against us? This is focused. These intercepts are focused on calls from phones that are related to al Qaeda that may come into this country."

Democrats and some Republicans question whether the eavesdropping is legal because the administration did not get consent from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court.

Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican and chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, will hold hearings on the matter and has said he does not think the wiretapping was legal.

Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, also said yesterday that he did not think the actions were legal.

"Let us have the hearings," Mr. McCain said on "Fox News Sunday." "Let us have the administration come to Congress. I think they will get that authority, whatever is reasonable and needed, and increased abilities to monitor communications are clearly in order."

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, told CNN that Mr. Bush needs to go after Osama bin Laden "through the system, rule of law, and checks and balances that we've had here."

"Tomorrow, if the president were to decide that he felt that he had to search Americans' homes without a warrant, to just go do it on his own and say, 'I need that power,' " would not be acceptable, Mr. Schumer said.

The Other Big Brother (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff

Newsweek, January 30, 2006

The demonstration seemed harmless enough. Late on a June afternoon in 2004, a motley group of about 10 peace activists showed up outside the Houston headquarters of Halliburton, the giant military contractor once headed by Vice President Dick Cheney. They were there to protest the corporation's supposed "war profiteering." The demonstrators wore papier-mache masks and handed out free peanut-butter-and-jelly sandwiches to Halliburton employees as they left work. The idea, according to organizer Scott Parkin, was to call attention to allegations that the company was overcharging on a food contract for troops in Iraq. "It was tongue-in-street political theater," Parkin says.

But that's not how the Pentagon saw it. To U.S. Army analysts at the top-secret Counterintelligence Field Activity (CIFA), the peanut-butter protest was regarded as a potential threat to national security. Created three years ago by the Defense Department, CIFA's role is "force protection"—tracking threats and terrorist plots against military installations and personnel inside the United States. In May 2003, Paul Wolfowitz, then deputy Defense secretary, authorized a fact-gathering operation code-named TALON—short for Threat and Local Observation Notice—that would collect "raw information" about "suspicious incidents." The data would be fed to CIFA to help the Pentagon's "terrorism threat warning process," according to an internal Pentagon memo.

A Defense document shows that Army analysts wrote a report on the Halliburton protest and stored it in CIFA's database. It's not clear why the Pentagon considered the protest worthy of attention—although organizer Parkin had previously been arrested while demonstrating at ExxonMobil headquarters (the charges were dropped). But there are now questions about whether CIFA exceeded its authority and conducted unauthorized spying on innocent people and organizations. A Pentagon memo obtained by NEWSWEEK shows that the deputy Defense secretary now acknowledges that some TALON reports may have contained information on U.S. citizens and groups that never should have been retained. The number of reports with names of U.S. persons could be in the thousands, says a senior Pentagon official who asked not be named because of the sensitivity of the subject.

CIFA's activities are the latest in a series of disclosures about secret government programs that spy on Americans in the name of national security. In December, the ACLU obtained documents showing the FBI had investigated several activist groups, including People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals and Greenpeace, supposedly in an effort to discover possible ecoterror connections. At the same time, the White House has spent weeks in damage-control mode, defending the controversial program that allowed the National Security Agency to monitor the telephone conversations of U.S. persons suspected of terror links, without obtaining warrants.

Last Thursday, Cheney called the program "vital" to the country's defense against Al Qaeda. "Either we are serious about fighting this war on terror or not," he said in a speech to the Manhattan Institute, a conservative think tank. But as the new information about CIFA shows, the scope of the U.S. government's spying on Americans may be far more extensive than the public realizes.

It isn't clear how many groups and individuals were snagged by CIFA's dragnet. Details about the program, including its size and budget, are classified. In December, NBC News obtained a 400-page compilation of reports that detailed a portion of TALON's surveillance efforts. It showed the unit had collected information on nearly four dozen antiwar meetings or protests, including one at a Quaker meetinghouse in Lake Worth, Fla., and a Students Against War demonstration at a military recruiting fair at the University of California, Santa Cruz. A Pentagon spokesman declined to say why a private company like Halliburton would be deserving of CIFA's protection. But in the past, Defense Department officials have said that the "force protection" mission includes military contractors since soldiers and Defense employees work closely with them and therefore could be in danger.

CIFA researchers apparently cast a wide net and had a number of surveillance methods—both secretive and mundane—at their disposal. An internal CIFA PowerPoint slide presentation recently obtained by William Arkin, a former U.S. Army intelligence analyst who writes widely about military affairs, gives some idea how the group operated. The presentation, which Arkin provided to NEWSWEEK, shows that CIFA analysts had access to law-enforcement reports and sensitive military and U.S. intelligence documents. (The group's motto appears at the bottom of each PowerPoint slide: "Counterintelligence 'to the Edge'.") But the organization also gleaned data from "open source Internet monitoring." In other words, they surfed the Web.

That may have been how the Pentagon came to be so interested in a small gathering outside Halliburton. On June 23, 2004, a few days before the Halliburton protest, an ad for the event appeared on houston.indymedia.org, a Web site for lefty Texas activists. "Stop the war profiteers," read the posting. "Bring out the kids, relatives, Dick Cheney, and your favorite corporate pigs at the trough as we will provide food for free."

Four months later, on Oct. 25, the TALON team reported another possible threat to national security. The source: a Miami antiwar Web page. "Website advertises protest planned at local military recruitment facility," the internal report warns. The database entry refers to plans by a south Florida group called the Broward Anti-War Coalition to protest outside a strip-mall recruiting office in Lauderhill, Fla. The TALON entry lists the upcoming protest as a "credible" threat. As it turned out, the entire event consisted of 15 to 20 activists waving a giant BUSH LIED sign. No one was arrested. "It's very interesting that the U.S. military sees a domestic peace group as a threat," says Paul Lefrak, a librarian who organized the protest.

Arkin says a close reading of internal CIFA documents suggests the agency may be expanding its Internet monitoring, and wants to be as surreptitious as possible. CIFA has contracted to buy "identity masking" software that would allow the agency to create phony Web identities and let them appear to be located in foreign countries, according to a copy of the contract with Computer Sciences Corp. (The firm declined to comment.)

Pentagon officials have broadly defended CIFA as a legitimate response to the domestic terror threat. But at the same time, they acknowledge that an internal Pentagon review has found that CIFA's database contained some information that may have violated regulations. The department is not allowed to retain information about U.S. citizens for more than 90 days—unless they are "reasonably believed" to have some link to terrorism, criminal wrongdoing or foreign intelligence. There was information that was "improperly stored," says a Pentagon spokesman who was authorized to talk about the program (but not to give his name). "It was an oversight." In a memo last week, obtained by NEWSWEEK, Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England ordered CIFA to purge such information from its files—and directed that all Defense Department intelligence personnel receive "refresher training" on department policies.

That's not likely to stop the questions. Last week Democrats on the Senate intelligence committee pushed for an inquiry into CIFA's activities and who it's watching. "This is a significant Pandora's box [Pentagon officials] don't want opened," says Arkin. "What we're looking at is hints of what they're doing." As far as the Pentagon is concerned, that means we've already seen too much.

Eavesdropping Leaps Into 21st Century (AP)

By Matthew Fordahl
AP, January 23, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. -- In the past, intercepting communications meant just that _ copying a telegram mid-route, steaming open an envelope or attaching alligator clips to the copper wires that connected every telephone in the world.

But the old ways of communicating are heading into the sunset like the Pony Express and being replaced by phone calls, instant messages, e-mail and more that are converted into digital data before they gallop across the Internet and other advanced networks.

This constant interchange of massive amounts of data, converging into speeding bitstreams on common pipes, is both a blessing and a curse for eavesdroppers.

It's easier than ever to access wholesale feeds of data. But such work is also more controversial than traditional wiretapping, as seen in objections to post-9/11 warrantless domestic surveillance and to regulatory moves to require networks to be tap-friendly.

Critics question whether safeguards put in place a quarter century ago following FBI wiretapping misconduct are strong enough to prevent abuse in the 21st century. Others fear the information superhighway is turning out to be a fast path to mass surveillance.

"The thing that really should worry people is that once the capability is there, people will abuse it," said Jennifer Granick, executive director of Stanford University's Center for Internet and Society. "The opportunity for abuse is so much greater, because so much more of our private information is transmitted over the network."

Always a hot topic, the debate over wiretapping is further fueled today not only by the knowledge of what's possible but also by a dearth of details of what's actually happening.

What makes the White House surveillance program _ acknowledged after The New York Times disclosed it in December _ a cause of such concern is that it skirts existing laws and employs techniques resembling a wide-mouthed vacuum before the fine-toothed combs can be wielded.

It's being performed by the ultra-secret National Security Agency, which is believed to have the most advanced information vacuuming technology available. The NSA did not return telephone calls seeking comment on its methods.

The agency's efforts are reported to enjoy the cooperation of telecommunications companies, which run the major backbones and junctions where data _ phone calls and Internet traffic _ is exchanged between carriers' networks. Those companies have refused to confirm or deny to The Associated Press whether they've cooperated with the program, which the White House says began in 2002 with the aim of preventing terrorist attacks.

But they could be helping in a number of ways to provide information on who's talking to whom, when, how long the communication lasts and, ultimately, the content itself. Under the laws bypassed by the Bush administration, warrants for wiretaps require some evidence of wrongdoing.

Given the huge amount of data that traverses networks, it's likely that one element of the program involves analyzing traffic to single out anyone who communicates with people in suspicious locations. Data accumulated for phone billing could be one of the sources.

Modern networks can yield such information not just for phone calls but also for any other type of communication that passes through. When the data is converted to packets, as in the Internet, each one contains a header with the origin and destination.

Even without support from a carrier, the NSA could be sniffing communication as it traverses the airwaves or passes through the millions of miles of fiber optic cable that are buried underground or beneath oceans.

The technical problem is in the fire hose of information involved, said Mark Rasch, a former Justice Department computer crimes prosecutor.

"The idea that the NSA could be sitting on every call going internationally, listening in on every possible language, for the words al-Qaida,' 'terrorist' or 'bombs' is just fallacy," he said. "Computers capable of doing that simply don't exist and hopefully never will."

But the technology does exist to quickly read just the destination or origin information.

That sort of monitoring, if done on a wide scale, creates thorny moral, ethical and legal problems because those channels are much more likely to contain the chatter of innocents than the machinations of terrorists. And it raises the question of how that traffic is used.

"The thing about traffic analysis is you can mine that to any depth you want," said Bruce Schneier, chief technology officer of Counterpane Internet Security Inc.

In domestic criminal cases, law enforcement officials who want simply to know who is talking to whom _ excluding content _ need only tell a court it's important to a case. But that low burden of proof was established with the belief that only one line would be monitored.

When such surveillance is done on all outbound international calls, the law is not clear.

"I would say the Fourth Amendment (guaranteeing protection against unreasonable searches) is the Fourth Amendment, and the fact that you're invading the privacy of millions as opposed to dozens should make it worse, not better," said Rasch, who is now chief security counsel at Solutionary Inc., a security risk management firm.

It's believed that once the traffic analysis identifies "people of interest," they are then targeted for further surveillance and, possibly, full-content monitoring. Then, the NSA could simply mirror the data going to or coming from a target. It could even set up a parallel phone company or its own Internet Service Provider that would be invisible to its targets, Rasch said.

Critics note that the White House could easily have used the secret court created by the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act to get approval for such wiretaps, but chose instead to bypass it.

As it is, the FISA court has been criticized for rubber stamping requests.

"During the Clinton years, we were fighting that kangaroo court _ they never said no," Schneier said. "Here we are now wishing for the little oversight that the court had."

The NSA surveillance also raises questions about wiretapping in investigations unrelated to national security.

Responding to complaints by law enforcers that such digital communications as Internet telephony can stymie their eavesdropping, the FCC decided last year decided that the 1994 Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act should be extended next year to apply to some broadband Internet access providers and Voice over Internet Protocol (VoIP) companies.

CALEA compels those companies to proactively build out that capability, and network equipment vendors are starting to building surveillance tools into their gear in anticipation of compliance.

Some companies, such as VeriSign Inc. and NeuStar Inc., offer an all-in-one service for carriers and service providers, which some federal agencies have argued will actually enhance privacy for people not under investigation.

But critics say that rather than laying the groundwork for privacy, new regulations will more likely enable greater misuse.

"There's no question in my mind that once we make the networks less secure because of CALEA, we will exploit that lack of security to intercept communications under every legal authority asserted by the government," Rasch said.

The President's End Run (WP)

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

THE MOST detailed legal justification to date for the National Security Agency's warrantless domestic surveillance has emerged from the Bush administration, but the 42-page version isn't any more convincing than its shorter predecessors. In some ways -- particularly in its broad conception of presidential power in wartime -- it is more disturbing.

As it had implied previously but never flatly stated, the administration asserted that the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) would be unconstitutional if it were read to prevent the president from engaging in the kind of warrantless surveillance that the administration has been conducting.

This interpretation, with its expansive view of the commander in chief's powers, would call into question Congress's ability to prevent the administration from engaging in torture or cruel and inhuman treatment or to establish rules for detainees and military tribunals -- exactly the areas in which we have been encouraging Congress to step up to the plate.

The administration, appropriately, would prefer to avoid the constitutional argument. Instead, it contends first that FISA's warrant requirements were superseded by the post-Sept. 11 congressional Authorization for the Use of Military Force (AUMF), which allows the president to "use all necessary and appropriate force" to prevent "any future acts of international terrorism against the United States."

The administration cites this sweeping language and the Supreme Court's ruling in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld , in which a plurality found that the AUMF allowed the president to detain U.S. citizens captured on the battlefield as enemy combatants. The administration says that reasoning applies equally to "all traditional and accepted incidents of force . . . including warrantless electronic surveillance to intercept enemy communications both at home and abroad."

A critical difference between detention and surveillance, however, is that Congress has already passed a law outlining detailed requirements for domestic surveillance -- even during wartime; FISA specifically provides a 15-day grace period for warrantless surveillance in time of war. The vague wording of the AUMF can't reasonably be read to implicitly trump FISA.

The administration goes on to say that if the AUMF doesn't provide such approval, and if FISA is interpreted to prohibit such wiretapping outside its procedures (the law says it is to be the "exclusive means" for authorizing foreign intelligence surveillance), the statute would be unconstitutional.

President Bush, the paper says, "determined that the speed and agility required to carry out the NSA activities successfully could not have been achieved under FISA." Because those activities "are necessary to the defense of the United States from a subsequent terrorist attack, FISA would impermissibly interfere with the President's most solemn constitutional obligation -- to defend the United States against foreign attack."

Before and since the 1978 passage of FISA, presidents have asserted that they also possess the inherent constitutional authority to authorize warrantless searches. Yet there is a major difference between claiming such inherent presidential power and stretching it -- too far in our view -- to conclude that, when Congress has spoken on an issue, the president is free to ignore that legislative action.

Especially without knowing the parameters of the surveillance, we hesitate to second-guess the president's argument that FISA's limits are unduly constraining. The surveillance may be critical for national security, and a law written in a different technological age may well need to be refurbished. But the proper way to handle that -- which the administration rejected -- would have been to seek changes in the law, not to do a stealthy end run around the legislative process. In such an amorphous, long-running conflict as the war against terrorism, it's critical to ensure that limits are in place to prevent the executive branch from overreaching.

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

Have you ever talked sexy to your wife or your girlfriend - or your husband or your boyfriend - on the telephone? Would you keep talking if you thought that one of Dick Cheney's operatives was listening in?

Talk about a chilling effect.

What if you were thinking of running for Congress and you tried to bolster your understanding of terrorism by speaking with knowledgeable but controversial figures in the Middle East? How would you feel if you knew - or even suspected - that government agents were monitoring your conversations? Would you be less likely to engage in those conversations? Would you begin to censor yourself? Would your contacts still be willing to speak freely if they thought the feds were listening in?

Freedom of speech in the United States covers matters trivial and profound. The corrosive damage that is being done to the First Amendment, that cornerstone of free speech, has been largely overlooked in the controversy over President Bush's decision to permit the government to eavesdrop without warrants on phone calls and e-mail messages inside the United States.

Most of the attention generated by this domestic spying program has understandably been focused on its affront to the Fourth Amendment, which prohibits unreasonable searches, and its brazen violation of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which established clear-cut rules for electronic surveillance in the U.S.

But there's an additional danger. When the government's spies are allowed to snoop willy-nilly on phone calls and e-mail in the United States, without the important legal constraint of having to seek a warrant, it means that the all-important First Amendment has developed a chill, symptomatic of a life-threatening illness.

The ostensible aim of the president's domestic surveillance program, conducted by the supersecret National Security Agency, is to home in on communications into and out of the United States that involve individuals or organizations suspected of some sort of terror connection. But, as The Times reported last week, F.B.I. officials have repeatedly complained that the N.S.A. has bombarded them with thousands upon thousands of unsubstantiated tips - names, telephone numbers, e-mail addresses and so forth - that have either led nowhere, or to completely innocent individuals.

Whatever its stated goals, the N.S.A. seems to be operating the greatest fishing expedition in the history of the world.

The American Civil Liberties Union, in a lawsuit seeking a halt to the spying, warned that scholars, lawyers, journalists and others who communicate with people outside the U.S. are already experiencing a chilling effect. People who are doing nothing wrong, but who feel they may become targets of the program, for whatever reasons, are curtailing their conversations and censoring their correspondence, according to the suit.

Laurence Tribe, a professor of constitutional law at Harvard, noted that people who are aware of the surveillance program and who believe that their political views may be seen as hostile by the government, may also become less candid in their telephone conversations and e-mail. Others could unwittingly become the victim of contacts by individuals that the government may be interested in.

He gave an example:

"I recently got a series of e-mails from someone, quite without invitation, that got rather scary in the sense that they started saying positive things about Osama bin Laden. I asked the person in reply to stop e-mailing me, and I got an e-mail today saying, 'Your request is permanently granted.' But in the meantime, granted or not granted, that could easily put me on some kind of targeting list."

Speaking about the potential long-term effect of widespread domestic spying, Professor Tribe said:

"The more people grow accustomed to a listening environment in which the ear of Big Brother is assumed to be behind every wall, behind every e-mail, and invisibly present in every electronic communication, telephonic or otherwise - that is the kind of society, as people grow accustomed to it, in which you can end up being boiled to death without ever noticing that the water is getting hotter, degree by degree.

"The background assumptions of privacy will be gradually eroded to the point where we'll wake up one day, or our children will, and it will seem quaint that people at one time, long ago, thought that they could speak in candor."

Held In 9/11 Net, Muslims Return To Accuse U.S. (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

Hundreds of noncitizens were swept up on visa violations in the weeks after 9/11, held for months in a much-criticized federal detention center in Brooklyn as "persons of interest" to terror investigators, and then deported. This week, one of them is back in New York and another is due today - the first to return to the United States.

They are no longer the accused but the accusers, among six former detainees who are coming back to give depositions in their federal lawsuits against top government officials and detention guards, at a time when the constitutionality of part of the government's counterterrorism offensive is under new scrutiny.

As in the cases of all the Muslim immigrants rounded up in the New York area after the terror attacks, the six were never accused of a crime related to 9/11; officials eventually cleared all of them of links to terrorism. A report by the inspector general of the Justice Department found systemic problems with immigrant detentions and widespread abuse at the federal detention center where the six had been held; several guards have since been disciplined.

But as the six return to the city - four of them from Egypt, one from Pakistan, one from London - the conditions imposed by the United States government include the requirement that they be in the constant custody of federal marshals.

They are barred from calling anyone during their weeklong stays at an undisclosed New York hotel, where 12 days of closed depositions are to begin today. They can expect hours of questioning by lawyers representing at least 31 defendants in the lawsuits, including John Ashcroft, the former attorney general, and Robert S. Mueller III, the director of the F.B.I.

The first returning detainees, Yasser and Hany Ibrahim, who are brothers, say that putting themselves back in the hands of the government they are suing is an act of faith in America. In recent telephone interviews from Alexandria, Egypt, the two described themselves as frightened but resolute in pressing a 2002 class-action lawsuit charging that they were abused and deprived of due process because of their religion or national origin.

"I'm seeking justice," said Yasser, 33, who had a Web site design business in Brooklyn before he and Hany, 29, a deli worker, were delivered in shackles to the Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn 19 days after 9/11. "It's from the same system that did us injustice before. But I have faith in this system. I know what happened before was a mistake."

Charles S. Miller, a spokesman for the Justice Department, said officials would not comment on any aspect of the case, including the conditions of the men's return to the city and their allegations. But in court papers, the defendants deny wrongdoing, and department lawyers argue in part that the Sept. 11 attacks created "special factors" - including the need to detect and deter future terrorist attacks - that outweigh the plaintiffs' right to sue for damages for any constitutional violations.

The detainees' lawyers say that what happened at the Brooklyn detention center can be recognized four years later as the template for many of the counterterrorism measures now being fiercely challenged.

"The post-9/11 domestic immigration sweeps were the first example of the Bush administration's willingness to ignore the law and hold people outside the judicial system," said Rachel Meeropol, a lawyer for the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents the Ibrahim brothers. "The kind of torture, interrogation and arbitrary detention that we now associate with Guantánamo and secret C.I.A. facilities really started right here, in Brooklyn."

Richard Peter Caro, a lawyer for Stuart Pray, the lieutenant who oversaw the detainees' arrival at the detention center, said yesterday: "We're glad that they're coming in to be deposed so we can really get at the facts and finally see what the evidence shows. I'm confident that my client will be found to have committed no wrongdoing at all."

Last week, the center filed a class-action suit against President Bush and other administration officials over the National Security Agency's domestic eavesdropping without warrants. Ms. Meeropol is one of the plaintiffs, contending that her communications with clients like the Ibrahims may have been monitored illegally. The government says the surveillance program is a legal and valuable tool in the war on terror.

Illegal recording of lawyer-client conversations was one of the abuses documented at the Brooklyn detention center in a scathing 2003 report by the Justice Department's inspector general. The report also found a pattern of physical abuse, some of it caught on prison videotape, including beatings and sexual humiliations like those described by the Ibrahim brothers or other former detainees. The report said it was Mr. Ashcroft's policy to hold detainees on any legal pretext until the F.B.I. cleared them, even though such clearances took months and many detainees were immigrants picked up by chance.

DOJ_NMG_0010208

At the time, Mr. Ashcroft said he made "no apologies" for finding every legal way possible to protect the American public. Nonetheless, officials pledged to work on getting kinks out of the system, and said abuses would be punished.

Critics charge that the authority that Mr. Ashcroft asserted after 9/11 - to detain any noncitizen considered a "person of interest" secretly and indefinitely - is unconstitutional. Government officials argue that secrecy is needed to keep terrorists in the dark.

Mr. Ashcroft has sought to have the two lawsuits brought by the detainees dismissed. But in a decision appealed by the government, a federal judge in Brooklyn ruled in September that he and other defendants would have to answer questions, at a later deposition, in one of the suits: a 2004 complaint by another two of the six returning detainees.

Those two men, in their late 30's, are Ehab Elmaghraby, an Egyptian immigrant who ran a restaurant near Times Square, and Javaid Iqbal, a Pakistani immigrant whose Long Island customers knew him as "the cable guy."

"I am not afraid," Mr. Iqbal wrote last week in an e-mail message about his return. "I am also sure that justice will be served because peoples of U.S.A. are justice-loving people regardless of race and religion."

The Ibrahim brothers are more fearful. They say that their parents begged them not to return to the country where they were held in maximum security without charges for eight months and, the brothers charge, beaten and tormented by guards. "Part of my motivation is to make sure that what happened to us doesn't happen to more people in the future," said Yasser, who was due to arrive in New York today, joining his brother, who came on Friday.

Both spoke with nostalgia of the three or four years they lived in New York, on and off, before 9/11. When they were not working, they said, they hung out together in Greenwich Village, browsed electronics stores near Times Square and took friends on the rides at Coney Island. Hany proudly recalled how he worked his way up from stock boy to grill man and then manager of a deli in Ocean Parkway, Brooklyn. "The best I lived in my life was in New York," he said.

Right after the World Trade Center attack, they said, their parents urged them to come home. "We assured them," Yasser recalled: " 'This is the United States. They don't arrest people for no charges. We didn't do anything, so nothing's going to happen to us.' "

But at 2 p.m. on Sept. 30, 2001, the lawsuit says, a dozen terrorism investigators from the F.B.I., the police and immigration services knocked at the door of the Ocean Parkway apartment that the brothers shared with several Egyptian and Moroccan friends. After questioning, the investigators took away Yasser, Hany and another man, all of whose tourist visas had expired.

Why investigators showed up is unclear, said their lawyer, Ms. Meeropol. But she noted that some interrogations were prompted by anonymous tips about "suspicious-looking" foreign men. Federal officials have contended that at a time when a second terror attack seemed imminent, all tips had to be checked. As a practical matter, once the brothers were labeled "of interest" to investigators, they were destined for the maximum-security unit of the Metropolitan Detention Center.

Physical abuse, the lawsuit says, began the moment they arrived, chained and shackled. As Yasser described it, guards supervised by Lieutenant Pray slammed his brother face-first into a wall where an American flag T-shirt had been taped, then did the same to him.

Pain became part of the brothers' daily routine, the lawsuit charges. Escort teams cursing them as Muslims and terrorists slammed them into every available wall when they were taken from their cells, twisted their wrists and fingers, and stepped on their leg chains so that they fell, their ankles bruised and bloody, according to the suit.

But worse than physical or verbal abuse, Yasser said, was "the feeling that we are being hidden from the outside world, and nobody knows in the outside world that we are arrested and in this place." Hany, who says he had a nervous breakdown when he returned to Egypt, recalled that guards and lieutenants terrified him by saying, "You're going to stay here the rest of your life."

At a closed immigration hearing on Nov. 20, three weeks after their arrest, the brothers agreed to immediate deportation. By Dec. 7, the lawsuit says, F.B.I. memos stated that clearance checks on the Ibrahims had shown no links to terrorism. But they were held six more months - Hany until May 29, 2002, and Yasser until June 6.

The suit asks the court to declare that all the detentions were unjustified and illegal, to award compensatory and punitive damages, and to order the government to return personal property it confiscated.

To prevent unnecessary detentions and abuses of noncitizens in the event of a new national emergency, the Justice Department's inspector general, Glenn A. Fine, in 2003 recommended changes in counterterrorism policy as well as disciplinary action against at least 10 guards and supervisors. In his last report to Congress, in August 2005, Mr. Fine said that many of his recommendations had been acted upon but that formal policy changes were still being negotiated.

The Federal Bureau of Prisons has fired two detention officers, suspended two for 30 days and demoted one in connection with the Brooklyn inquiry, said Traci Billingsley, a bureau spokeswoman.

DOJ_NMG_0010209

The Ibrahim brothers say that when they finally reached home, they found that the presumption of guilt had followed them into an Egyptian secret service dossier that made them unemployable. Yasser, now married with a 2-year-old son, said he and Hany were eking out a living in a small jewelry business.

"It's going to be very difficult for me to go back for just a week and not to be able to see the places that I loved before," he said of his return. "America's the land of the free."

Senator 'Taz" Races to Help Iditarod Icon

It's no surprise that Sen. Ted Stevens, Alaska's big man in Washington, is a fan of the Iditarod Trail Sled Dog Race. "It's such a great sport," he says of the annual 1,150-mile Anchorage-to-Nome adventure set to run in March. "It epitomizes the Alaskan spirit."

But he's not just an observer: He's a husky dog guy, and, with his wife, Catherine, is mushing an effort to save the life of their old friend and four-time Iditarod winner Susan Butcher, the face of the event. "She's a great friend," says Stevens of Butcher, 51, who's battling leukemia and in need of a bone marrow donor. Stevens tells us that he es in Washington, one named Princess Keely after the daughter of pal Sen. Conrad Burns, the other "Taz" for the nickname Sen. Trent Lott has given Stevens: "Tasmanian Devil." "But," he says, " they had no place to run." So he gave the dogs to the daughters of Butcher and husband David Monson, who says Stevens still visits the dogs at their Trail Breaker Kennel when he's in Fairbanks.

Well, those visits sadly turned serious last December when Butcher was diagnosed. The Stevenses and Monson, backed by others of Susan's friends, including Bill Gates, George Lucas, and Colin Powell, then embarked on a race to boost bone marrow donor typing in hopes a match will be found. "She's a fantastic competitor," says Stevens, "and that's why we hope she'll win this last battle."

Pro Bono for the Gitmo Gang

Legal and military sources tell us that some 57 American law firms are offering free legal advice to more than 150 "enemy combatants" held at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. A list provided to Whispers shows several prominent shops, many of which brag about their efforts on their websites. The pro bono service, organized by the Center for Constitutional Rights, is under the gun in conservative legal circles and some military offices that suggest it's bad form to help alleged terrorists while also working for clients involved in the war on terrorism like Boeing and General Dynamics. But don't hate lawyers just because they're helping accused terrorists. Thurston Moore, chairman of Hunton & Williams, says pro bono "is the right thing to do." Moore adds that firms like his aren't working a detainee's criminal case, only the legality of imprisonment at Guantanamo. "If good lawyers did not take on engagements fundamental to our constitutional rights, our rights would be meaningless," he says.

Where There's Smoke There's Bill

Bill Clinton still has great timing. On approach to Bangor, Maine, recently, the cockpit of his jet filled with smoke, forcing a long layover. While he was on the ground, a military jet packed with 300 troops returning from Iraq happened to land, and he bounded out to meet them. Once the jet was fixed, he got back on, but the smoke reappeared, and he jumped off just as a second troop transport arrived from Iraq. Yes, he shook all their hands, too. "He was actually glad he was grounded," says spokesman Jay Carson , who adds that Bubba has since written to some of those troops. Now Clinton's visit will even figure in a documentary on troop greeters. "It was coincidentally being shot," says Carson, "and they're going to make President Clinton a big part of that."

Predator And Prey (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh, Mark Hosenball And Sami Yousafzai

Newsweek, January 30, 2006

That familiar voice, at once menacing and gently lilting, was back. After more than a year in which some U.S. officials had speculated openly he might be dead, Osama bin Laden resurfaced in his usual way, unannounced, dressing up threats of death in reasonable tones. Holed up in some remote region believed to be along the Afghan-Pakistani border, the impresario of 9/11 seemed to be talking to his enemies more than his followers. And in his audiotape, recorded in recent weeks and secretly couriered as usual to an Al Jazeera bureau, there was also something new: an offer of an olive branch. In a cynical attempt to exploit American war-weariness, especially in Iraq, the terror leader noted that U.S. polls showed declining support for the war. For the first time, he proposed "a long-term truce on fair conditions" to the American people "so both sides can enjoy security and stability." Bin Laden, who once built his rep by pledging to destroy the "far enemy," now seemed to be trying to close the gap. All America had to do was withdraw from Arab lands.

The tape immediately touched off speculation as to its meaning. Vice President Dick Cheney, chronically skeptical of remorse from enemies, denounced the message as "a ploy." Other Bush administration officials suggested it was a sign of bin Laden's weakness and, perhaps, his own war-weariness. The tape surfaced at a time when the CIA and the Defense Department have stepped up missile strikes inside Pakistani tribal regions, where many experts believe bin Laden and his top deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, are hiding. Only days earlier, a CIA-guided Predator drone fired missiles at houses in the village of Damadola, aiming to kill Zawahiri. At least 18 people were obliterated, though probably not Zawahiri. U.S. officials remained confident that the dead included some senior Qaeda members, and Pakistani authorities maintained that four to five Qaeda operatives were killed in the missile attack. "We are still not sure who they were," said a senior official in Islamabad who spoke only on condition of anonymity. "We are still in the process of establishing their identity."

Among those thought to have been killed was Midhat Mursi al-Sayid Umar, an Egyptian explosives and poisons expert. It was Umar, also known as Abu Khabbab, who allegedly trained the suicide bombers who killed 17 U.S. sailors on the USS Cole in 2000. "If he was killed, then it's a big blow to bin Laden and Al Qaeda," says Sharif Mohammed, a Qaeda-linked Islamist in Pakistan. "He was responsible for running the Qaeda network in the West." (Umar may have also been researching germ and chemical warfare.) Another possible victim of the strike is Abu Obaidah al-Misri, Al Qaeda's chief of operations in Afghanistan's eastern Kunar province, where U.S. and Afghan forces regularly come under militant attack. Still, U.S. counterterrorism officials say they may never completely confirm the identities of terrorists who were blown up.

Civilians are another matter. The Predator killed several women and children, provoking demonstrations in the tribal region, many of them organized by the radical Pakistani Islamic alliance known as Muttehida Majlis Amal. The radicals hoped to use the attack to undermine support for Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf, America's close ally. Musharraf certainly is in a delicate position. He told visiting U.S. Under Secretary of State William Burns over the weekend that America needs to be more careful inside his borders.

Authority to fire Hellfire missiles from Predators has been delegated by the White House to the CIA, according to current and former counterterrorism officials who did not want to be named because the matter is classified. If officials conducting surveillance believe there is a strong chance of civilians' being killed in an attack, operatives are expected to consult higher-ranking agency officials before firing. In the case of the Damadola attack, according to a knowledgeable source who spoke on condition of anonymity because the subject was sensitive, CIA officials made the decision to launch the attack themselves. But they notified higher-ups in the administration, including White House officials, who had enough time to veto the strike if they wanted.

Despite the ethics—and public relations—issues, U.S. officials involved with the hunt for bin Laden and Zawahiri said they're quite sure that the benefits of the Predator campaign outweigh the costs. According to two former officials, several groups of missile-armed Predators—some of which are equipped with laser-guided gravity bombs—are based in the region. And a Pakistani official privy to intelligence says the January Predator strike was the fourth inside Pakistan's borders since May 2005 (two more than have been reported previously). Beginning earlier this month, the military and CIA have also begun to use the first production models of the Global Hawk unmanned recon aircraft, which can survey distances of more than 100 miles from 65,000 feet and direct the lower-flying Predator to precise targets.

The tribal region where Zawahiri was said to be has a long history of fierce resistance to central control, as both the British Raj and the Soviets who occupied neighboring Afghanistan found out. But none of those previous powers possessed similar technology to scour the countryside from the sky and to unleash remote-control missiles. The broad message of the Damadola strike, which flattened three houses and killed several families, is that tribesmen need to rethink their code. Those who are supposedly governed by the iron law of Pashtunwali—or automatic loyalty to fellow tribesmen or guests—now have to recalculate the cost of that, U.S. officials said. "The message to them is, 'You have to take a new measure now: your families are not safe if you protect the terrorists'," says one senior Pentagon official who would not speak about the attack on the record because the details are classified.

Although Zawahiri's wife is said to be a "Momand" Pashtun from that region—offering him considerable protection—the CIA has been having more success lately in developing sources in the area, with help from Pakistani intelligence. (According to several U.S. officials, the Pakistani intelligence service has allowed a large "liaison" team into the country, and has accepted a great deal of technical assistance.) Frank Anderson, a former CIA station chief in the region, says Pashtunwali goes only so far, especially with multimillion-dollar prices on the heads of top Qaeda suspects. "The noble savage whose word is his bond exists a lot more in literature than on the ground," he says archly.

U.S. officials also express confidence that, after years of infighting back in Washington, they are finally waging the global war on terror in a coherent way. Despite media coverage a year ago about a power struggle between the Pentagon and the CIA, the two agencies are working fairly well together now in the field, U.S. counterterrorism officials say. The CIA effectively has control inside Pakistan, where the U.S. military is not supposed to be operating (and the agency has "deniability" because it is engaged in covert operations that are never officially acknowledged). Indeed the Global Hawk and Predator systems are so sophisticated that live, high-resolution pictures are transmitted, via satellite links, to a large command post called the Global Response Center on the sixth floor of CIA headquarters in Langley, Va. There, officials can watch the satellite feeds in real time on large screens while other officials with headsets bark orders to operatives in the field.

Across the border in Afghanistan, meanwhile, U.S. Special Operations teams are operating day and night, battling Tali-ban insurgents who infiltrate from Pakistan. "It's quite a bloody little war down there," a U.S. military source said.

The upshot is that some U.S. officials said they would not be terribly surprised if bin Laden were suing for peace. Other terrorism analysts suggested that, at a time when bin Laden's rival and sometime partner in Iraq, Abu Mussab al-Zarqawi, has offended many Muslims with his ruthless tactics, the Qaeda chieftain's main message was "I'm still the main man." Bin Laden may have been trying to appear reasonable and merciful to his own followers by playing the peacemaker.

Still, the biggest challenge bin Laden had last week was getting the American people to take him seriously. For Americans, after four years of this kind of thing—and with the center of gravity now in Iraq—there seemed as much theater as threat to his latest missive. (Homeland Security Department officials languidly announced the threat level was unchanged, then fell silent.) The terror leader, who in the past has generally hewed to Qur'anic citations, referred to U.S. reports about abuse at Abu Ghraib and even quoted a left-wing U.S. author, William Blum, as saying that all the U.S. president has to do to get the terrorists off his back is announce "that American interference in the nations of the world has ended." The reference sent Blum's anti-imperialist treatise, "Rogue Nation," soaring from 200,000-plus in rankings on Amazon.com to 17. ("Oprah or Osama, it doesn't matter, as long as it begins with 'O'," Blum joked to NEWSWEEK.) Al Jazeera's Washington anchor, Hafez Al-Mirazi, later solicited Blum and Israeli author Natan Sharansky for his show "so we can have both Bush and bin Laden's favorite authors on."

In some respects bin Laden seemed to be playing, perhaps naively, into George W. Bush's hands. Nothing will do more to silence advocates of early withdrawal from Iraq than an endorsement from the chief author of the 9/11 attacks. But coming at a time when a new analysis suggests the war in Iraq could cost upwards of $2 trillion, and the U.S. economy is burdened with record budget deficits, the promise of an endless war could resonate with some Americans. "Don't let your strength and modern arms fool you," bin Laden said in his message. "We have nothing to lose. A swimmer in the ocean does not fear the rain." As he has so often, bin Laden closed by invoking his successful war against the Soviet Union in Afghanistan in the 1980s. "We bled their economy, and now they are nothing. In that there is a lesson for you." Perhaps there is. Americans just don't want to hear it from him.

Can Bin Laden Be Caught? (TIME)

By aparisim ghosh

Time, January 23, 2006

The voice was muffled, labored, weak--as you might expect from a man who has spent the past four years on the run. If it didn't belong to one of the world's most feared men, it would hardly scare a child. Having disappeared from view, sheltering in the mountains of Afghanistan and Pakistan, Osama bin Laden may have lost the ability to send a chill down the world's spine. Governments don't shut down airports or send security forces into red alert. Even when he makes the direst threats, we no longer feel compelled to slow down, much less stop, the course of our daily lives.

But bin Laden's re-emergence last Thursday was still a jolt, coming after a 13-month silence that raised questions about whether the al-Qaeda boss was incapacitated or even dead. The U.S. believes the 10-minute taped message, which aired on the Arab TV channel al-Jazeera, was probably recorded sometime since November, partly because of a reference to British newspaper reports from that time about a purported proposal by President Bush to bomb al-Jazeera. The tape suggested that bin Laden is alive, if not quite well. A longtime bin Laden watcher, French terrorism expert Roland Jacquard, speculates that the decision not to release a videotape may reflect a desire to conceal the deterioration of his physical condition. And if bin Laden's voice sounded more muted than in his last message, in December 2004, so did his rhetoric. He warned of forthcoming attacks on U.S. soil but didn't convey a sense of immediacy. "They are in the planning stages, and you will see them in the heart of your land as soon as the planning is complete," he said. He floated the idea of a cessation of hostilities with America if the U.S. withdraws troops from Iraq and Afghanistan. "We do not mind offering a long-term truce based on just conditions that we will stick to," bin Laden said. The White House didn't bite. "We do not negotiate with terrorists," spokesman Scott McClellan said. "We put them out of business."

That claim, of course, is undermined every day that bin Laden and his deputy and chief tactician, Ayman al-Zawahiri, remain on the loose. But bin Laden's resurfacing has come at a time when the leadership of al-Qaeda appears to be under as much strain as at any time since the fall of the Taliban in 2001. Antiterrorism experts say the Saudi-born terrorist is no longer in active contact with field commanders, and his ability to plan and direct specific operations is hampered by his isolation. In Iraq, scene of al-Qaeda's deadliest strikes since 9/11, the group's leader, Abu Mousab al-Zarqawi, is fighting battles with some Iraqi insurgent groups who want him dead almost as badly as the U.S. military does (see box). Meanwhile, an intensified U.S. push to hunt down al-Qaeda leaders has scored a series of apparent successes; just last week Pakistani intelligence officials claimed that a Jan. 13 U.S. air strike on the village of Damadola had killed as many as four senior operatives--although it may have missed its chief target, al-Zawahiri, whose voice was heard on an undated audiotape last Friday. Among some U.S. counterterrorism experts, there was speculation that the release of the bin Laden tape was al-Qaeda's attempt to boost the morale of its foot soldiers amid the run of bad p.r. Says an intelligence official: "The question is, Is this someone's way of changing the topic?"

It might be, but no one is confusing misdirection for surrender. While improved cooperation between the U.S. and Pakistan has apparently helped the U.S. zero in on bin Laden's lieutenants, credible intelligence on the main target's whereabouts is sketchy at best. Law-enforcement officials say that bin Laden's message aside, there are no signs of heightened al-Qaeda activity in the U.S., but they don't discount the possibility of a terrorist attack. "The threat's still real," says a U.S. intelligence official, "but because of this tape, does that make it any more real than it was before the tape? No." Today, the official says, al-Qaeda is not the same outfit it was on 9/11; it has morphed from a command-and-control organization into a philosophy that has "inspired cells around the world ... It's harder for them to coordinate, but it also makes them very dangerous."

Some terrorism experts believe that the perception that bin Laden is vulnerable may make jihadists more determined to carry out attacks. "I'd be worried over the next 60 to 90 days," says a former FBI counterterrorism official. "I believe if we don't hear from al-Qaeda in the near term, some will paint bin Laden as weakened and unable to deliver on his threat"--a possibility that may motivate terrorists to try to strike soon, to make good on the promises of their leader.

The reappearance of bin Laden came at a moment when U.S. intelligence officials felt pretty good about themselves. Even as the cassette tape was making its way out of bin Laden's secret lair, his pursuers were sending out signals across the borderlands between Pakistan and Afghanistan, where he may be hiding. In recent weeks U.S. and Pakistani intelligence agencies have stepped up their search for top al-Qaeda leaders, with the skies above the mountains buzzing with spy planes and unmanned Predator drones, and a network of local spies and informants has been scouring the landscape for information. A Pakistani security officer told TIME the CIA has installed sophisticated surveillance equipment in several offices of the ISI, Pakistan's spy agency, to monitor any radio and Internet communications between al-Qaeda and its sympathizers.

The objective is to tighten the net around bin Laden and his deputies. In December a U.S. guided-missile attack in North Waziristan, based on intelligence from agents on the ground, reportedly killed Hamza Rabia, an Egyptian believed to have been the latest occupant of al-Qaeda's No. 3 spot. Then, in early January, the U.S. and Pakistan seized on the chance to bag even bigger prey. Details of the Damadola operation are beginning to emerge, and they provide a tantalizing glimpse into the intensifying hunt for bin Laden. A Peshawar-based official told TIME that in the past month, Pakistani-intelligence field agents had been tracking two groups of men who had crossed the border from Afghanistan into Bajaur, a small, often restive tribal region that borders Afghanistan's Kunar province. In the days before the attack, the search zoomed in on the group headed for Damadola; counterterrorist officials believed that some top al-Qaeda figures, including possibly al-Zawahiri himself, might have been in that group. "We knew there were going to be some VIPs, and any of those were worthy" targets, says a U.S. official.

The infiltrators sheltered in a small compound of three houses just outside Damadola. Shortly after 3 a.m. on Jan. 13, locals say, several missiles fired from Predators crashed into the compound, practically obliterating the houses. According to news reports, Pakistani officials initially said it was possible that al-Zawahiri had been killed, then backed away from the claim. Villagers told journalists who arrived at the scene that 18 civilians had died (the number was later revised down to 13); they denied that any bodies had been removed or that any foreigners had been in the compound. But some Pakistani intelligence officials began telling media outlets last week they believe as many as four leading terrorists, including al-Zawahiri's son-in-law and Abu Khabab al-Masri, a top al-Qaeda bombmaker, died in the strike. The U.S. is still uncertain if DNA was recovered from the scene to allow experts to positively identify any terrorists killed there or how the IDs were made. Pakistani Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz told TIME late last week that so far investigators have recovered only bodies of civilians, "but our security forces are there in large numbers to get the facts. These things just cannot evaporate and disappear, if there is anything."

Although the missile strike provoked a round of protests in Pakistan's tribal areas that forced President Pervez Musharraf to distance his government from the operation, cooperation between the U.S. and Pakistan in the hunt for bin Laden has quietly deepened. A Peshawar-based Pakistani intelligence official speaking on condition of anonymity says Washington has an understanding with Islamabad that allows the U.S. to strike within Pakistan's border regions--providing the Americans have actionable intelligence and especially if the Pakistanis won't or can't take firm action. Pakistan's caveat is that it would formally protest such strikes to deflect domestic criticism. Some ranking Pakistani officials deny such an agreement exists.

The territory in which bin Laden may be hiding remains forbidding to outsiders. In pockets of Pakistan's borderlands, a resurgent Taliban has begun to impose its extreme brand of Islamic law, including a ban on music and the Internet, and the summary execution of criminals. Some counterterrorism experts, though, are cautiously optimistic that the turmoil in al-Qaeda's high command they hope was caused by the strike in Damadola may force its leaders to expose themselves. "You got to presume that all the al-Qaeda guys are asking each other who got smoked," says a former U.S. intelligence official. "When they stick their heads up to see who got whacked, it presents opportunities."

While the hope of finding al-Qaeda's bosses anytime soon remains just that--hope--the hunters have shown indications that they may be closer to picking up their targets' scent. A Pakistani intelligence official says Pakistani intelligence agents and CIA drones are searching the mountainsides for the second group that crossed from Afghanistan. In the message delivered last week, bin Laden signaled he would not allow himself to be captured alive. "I swore that I will not die except free, despite the bitter taste of death," he said. On that much, both bin Laden and his pursuers seem to agree: one way or another, his end will come.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

A Tangled Web Woven (USNEWS)

By David E. Kaplan

U.S. News and World Report, January 23, 2006

The CIA's Center for the Study of Intelligence is one of the agency's most open branches. The in-house think tank sponsors studies on how to improve intelligence collection and analysis and publishes a respected journal, Studies in Intelligence. But since 2003, at least three unclassified CSI reports--all critical of the agency--have been withheld from the CIA's website, U.S. News has learned. During that same time, the agency has placed online three other CSI reports, all of those relatively positive or neutral.

Among the documents withheld: a tough 69-page report, "Curing Analytic Pathologies."The study, published quietly in December, argues that reform efforts have centralized authority but failed to change the intelligence community's core problem--"dysfunctional behaviors and practices within the individual agencies." A second report, "Analytic Culture in the U.S. Intelligence Community," was published last May and found the nation's intelligence analysts isolated and lacking overseas experience and training in research techniques. A third report, "Intelligence for a New Era in American Foreign Policy," from 2004, is the record of an unclassified conference of intelligence veterans, several of whom made comments sharply critical of the intelligence community.

The three reports are available through the CIA's public-affairs office, but only by mail, and one must know to ask for them. The CIA declined to say why the reports are not posted online nor would it provide a full list of the center's unclassified publications. "I find it baffling and bizarre to suggest we are not disseminating reports," says CIA spokeswoman Michelle Neff, "when the CSI independently mails out the final version of every unclassified finished paper." But some experts say it is the agency's response that is baffling. "This does not inspire confidence," says Steven Aftergood of the Federation of American Scientists.

TSA: Program May Use Fliers' Financial Data (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, January 23, 2006

A new program to speed travelers through airport security may require passengers to agree to a check of their personal and financial records, the Transportation Security Administration said.

The TSA said it will require “in-depth security background checks” that may involve “using commercial data” for people applying to the Registered Traveler program that starts in June. The checks will help verify people's identities to prove they have no ties to terrorism.

Commercial databases hold personal information from credit reports, property records, shopping histories and other records. TSA chief Kip Hawley said such data can be useful in flagging terrorists, who often won't appear in most U.S. commercial lists.

Business Travel Coalition Chairman Kevin Mitchell said the databases “are notoriously inaccurate” and could mistakenly label someone a terrorist. “It raises a huge liability issue,” said Mitchell, who supports Registered Traveler.

The program will create reserved lanes for people who pass the background check and pay an annual fee, expected to be $80 to $100. Security requirements such as removing jackets and shoes will be lifted as approved passengers go through metal detectors.

DOJ_NMG_0010214

Bill Connors, executive director of the National Business Travel Association, said some travelers are concerned.

"If you start asking for too much personal information, it's not worth it to me anymore," said Connors, another supporter of Registered Traveler.

Congress barred the TSA from using commercial data on airline passengers after a government probe criticized the agency last year for improperly storing 100 million records on travelers when it said no data storage would occur.

The TSA says the ban does not apply to Registered Traveler because the program is voluntary and the background checks would be done by companies at an airport. It would be the company that determines whether applicants pose a terrorist threat, TSA spokeswoman Amy von Walter said.

The TSA would approve background-check programs. Hawley, the TSA chief, said a background check must give "a high degree of confidence that an individual is not a terrorist."

"Using commercial data is one avenue," Hawley added.

A company running the only Registered Traveler program — at Orlando International Airport — recently experimented with giving applicants quizzes generated by commercial data to authenticate their identity.

However, the quizzes asked questions that were either too difficult, such as the year someone received their Social Security number, or so easy that "a terrorist … could pass the quiz on behalf of any person," according to a report by the company, Verified Identity Pass.

CEO Steven Brill said the company had success using document scanners to authenticate applicants' driver's licenses and passports. "There are other things we can do beyond that quiz," Brill said.

Private Airports Balk At Security (WT/AP)

By Stephen Manning, Associated Press

The Washington Times, January 22, 2006

Potomac Airfield in Fort Washington is small as airports go -- just one 2,600-foot runway used by light single- or twin-engine private planes.

Many pilots using it are recreational fliers, or those who want to go to Washington a few miles to the north.

The airport, which can even accommodate small private jets, isn't big enough to worry federal officials who fret over the use of planes to attack the District, according to owner David Wartofsky.

He compares its size to "an aircraft carrier, parked in a forest, at the bottom of a ravine in the most restrictive airspace in the world."

But Potomac Airfield is one of three private airports that sit within a tightly controlled zone of airspace around Washington. And the Transportation Security Administration (TSA), which regulates security at the airport, doesn't appear to agree with Mr. Wartofsky that it is innocuous.

Late last year the agency shut down Potomac for nearly a month because of security violations.

Even as the TSA and other federal agencies weigh whether to make the restricted airspace zones permanent, Mr. Wartofsky and other private airport operators in the Washington region are pushing for changes in rules that they say unfairly punish harmless private pilots in an overzealous effort to protect Washington.

"My objective is to preserve the freedom of people who are not a threat," he said.

The federal government established a restricted flight zone over the capital after hijacked passenger jets were used to attack Washington and New York on September 11, 2001.

Made up of three, 60-mile wide overlapping rings that resemble Mickey Mouse ears on a map, the zones are meant to warn of any hostile plane that might be bearing down on Washington.

Private pilots can fly in the zones, but only under certain conditions.

In the Air Defense Identification Zone, or ADIZ, which forms much of the restricted air space, pilots must file a flight plan with the Federal Aviation Administration and use a special transponder code that allows air traffic controllers to identify them.

Security is tighter in the inner 15-mile Flight Restricted Zone, or FRZ, which sits directly over Washington. Private pilots who wish to fly within those areas must get a background check, along with using the special code and filing a flight plan.

The measure was initially temporary, but the FAA is weighing whether to make it a permanent regulation and is taking public comment through Feb. 6.

Most private pilots, who could face fines or suspension of their licenses for violating the air space, don't want the zones to stay. The FAA has received more than 20,000 comments on the proposal.

At an FAA-sponsored public forum at Washington Dulles International Airport, Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association President Phil Boyer implored federal officials, urged the FAA "not to take a bad idea and make it permanent."

DOJ_NMG_0010215

FAA spokeswoman Laura Brown said the agency will review the comments before making a decision on the restricted zones. She did not know when the FAA would act.

The airports with arguably the most at stake in the decision are the "D.C. Three," including Potomac Airfield, that sit inside the highly restrictive inner zone. The other two are College Park Airport and Washington Executive/Hyde Field.

Chertoff's Wake (LEGALT)

By Jason McLure, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 23, 2006

After a rocky year, things are looking brighter for some protégés of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

On Jan. 4, President George W. Bush granted a recess appointment to Julie Myers, making the 36-year-old former Chertoff chief of staff the head of Homeland Security's 15,000-employee Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Just a day earlier, Alice Fisher, Chertoff's former deputy at the Justice Department who now heads the DOJ's Criminal Division, had been on national television touting the guilty plea federal prosecutors had extracted from Jack Abramoff.

That guilty plea had been won by a team of career prosecutors supervised by Noel Hillman, the head of the DOJ's public integrity section who was first hired by Chertoff as a federal prosecutor during Chertoff's tenure as U.S. attorney in New Jersey.

On the surface it would seem that Myers, Fisher, and Hillman, among others, have basked in the reflected glory of Chertoff, who once enjoyed, by Washington standards, a stainless reputation as a straight-shooting, mob-busting, former prosecutor turned general in the war on terror.

But Hurricane Katrina dented Chertoff's armor, leading critics to call into question his leadership at the DHS. And criticism of the response to Katrina as well as terror policies promulgated under Chertoff during his time at Justice has also tarred his understudies — some of whom were forced to claim their positions through the back door of presidential recess appointments.

Their successes — and their travails — provide a window into how one lawyer's high-flying career in public service can both open doors for and complicate the lives of his loyal aides and assistants.

"When people get into positions of power, they tend to bring in people they know," says Michael Greenberger, a former Clinton-era DOJ official who now runs the Center for Health and Homeland Security at the University of Maryland. "The question is the competency of those people."

ALL IN THE FAMILY

The top rungs of Justice and the Department of Homeland Security are crowded with lawyers who've worked with Chertoff in a number of his previous jobs: as a federal prosecutor in New Jersey, as a partner at Latham & Watkins in New Jersey, as counsel to the Senate committee investigating the Clintons, and as the assistant attorney general overseeing the DOJ's Criminal Division.

Some have had an easier time in their roles than others. Myers perhaps suffered the most by her association with the post-Katrina Chertoff.

Myers and Chertoff both worked on the Whitewater investigation; Chertoff was special counsel to the Senate, and later Myers was a junior lawyer in independent counsel Kenneth Starr's office. After brief stints as an assistant U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of New York and at the Treasury Department, Myers became Chertoff's chief of staff in November 2002, during his tenure as assistant attorney general in charge of the DOJ's Criminal Division.

She then left the DOJ just 10 months later, after Chertoff won confirmation as a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 3rd Circuit, in the summer of 2003.

But when Chertoff returned to the Bush administration last year, he hadn't forgotten Myers, who had job-hopped from Justice to the Commerce Department to the White House's personnel office.

Her confirmation hearings couldn't have come at a tougher time. It was Sept. 15, 2005, and the political winds stirred up by Homeland Security's botched response to Hurricane Katrina were still blowing through Congress. Three days earlier, Michael Brown had resigned in disgrace as director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, and Congress and the media were on the hunt for underqualified Bush administration cronies.

Myers fit the bill. Nominated to become head of the federal government's second-largest investigative agency, Myers had virtually no experience in immigration policy and a thin record of management of any sort. (Myers was unavailable for an interview. A spokesman for her office issued a statement saying, "She has great respect for Michael Chertoff and is extremely proud of her work with him.") And it couldn't have helped that the other DHS nominee before the Senate committee was Stewart

Baker, an older and deeply experienced Washington lawyer and policy-maker who is now assistant secretary for policy at the department.

"I think we ought to have a meeting with [DHS Secretary] Mike Chertoff, either privately or publicly, to ask him why he particularly . . . thinks you're qualified for the job," Sen. George Voinovich (R-Ohio) told Myers, with her parents, her fiancé, and her future in-laws looking on from the audience. "Because based on the résumé, I don't think you are."

But Voinovich had hit on Myers' ace in the hole. Chertoff would not only speak privately with Voinovich but, according to one of the senator's aides, would play a key role in persuading the senator to back her nomination. When Bush bypassed the Senate to give Myers a controversial recess appointment over the holidays, there was nary a protest from the normally independent-minded Voinovich. "He believes she has the potential to be a good manager," says Marcie Ridgway, Voinovich's press secretary.

If Myers' credentials aren't impeccable, her connections certainly are. She is the niece of Gen. Richard Myers, the former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Upon taking the helm at the DHS, Chertoff tapped her then-fiance (now husband), John Wood, who was once an aide to former Attorney General John Ashcroft, to be his chief of staff.

But Myers is far from the only government lawyer whose career has taken off after working for Chertoff. There's also Alice Fisher, who worked with Chertoff on the Whitewater investigation. After Fisher left the Senate committee, she joined Latham & Watkins, Chertoff's old firm. She became a partner at the firm in 2001, just as Chertoff tapped her to become one of five deputy assistants at the Criminal Division.

When Chertoff left to join the federal bench in 2003, Fisher returned to private practice at Latham. But when Chertoff returned to the administration last year, Fisher, 38, was nominated to take his old job leading DOJ's 500-lawyer Criminal Division. (Fisher declined an interview request for this article.) That nomination was both helped and hindered by her ties to Chertoff and his tenure at Justice.

Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), in his introduction of Fisher, went out of his way to point out that "Secretary Chertoff, who's worked closely with her over the years, has called her, quote, 'one of the best lawyers I've seen in my entire career.' "

But the Criminal Division's record under Chertoff and Fisher was far from flawless. After the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Justice was criticized for ordering the roundup and incarceration of hundreds of Muslims in the United States. The department was also embarrassed after it was forced to drop the much-touted 2003 convictions of members of an alleged Detroit terror cell amid allegations of prosecutorial misconduct.

And one of the Criminal Division's signature successes in the area of white-collar crime during Chertoff's tenure — the 2002 conviction of accounting firm Arthur Andersen for obstruction of justice — was later overturned by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Fisher and Chertoff's role in crafting some of the more controversial legal aspects of the Bush administration's war on terror also proved thorny. Ultimately, Fisher's confirmation was blocked in the Senate by Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), over questions about her connections to legal policies used to justify the harsh treatment of foreign detainees.

In response, Bush granted Fisher a recess appointment, using the same constitutional provision that allowed him to appoint Myers without Senate approval. And, as with Myers, Fisher's husband is no stranger to Chertoff. W. Clinton Fisher III is currently a senior adviser for aviation policy at the DHS' Transportation Security Administration.

Although Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) criticized Alice Fisher at the time of her nomination for having no prosecutorial experience and a thin trial record, her short tenure atop the Criminal Division has been marked by its success in winning guilty pleas from Abramoff and his former associate Michael Scanlon in the ongoing congressional corruption probe. One of the career DOJ attorneys supervising the 18-month investigation is Hillman, 49, the section chief of the public integrity division who followed Chertoff to Washington.

LENGTHY COATTAILS

Those close to Chertoff's inner circle are quick to credit the success of his protégés to their individual skills as much as to their relationship with the Cabinet secretary. "I think relatively talented people have gravitated to him over the years and want to learn at the knee of the master," says David Sandstedt, who worked under Chertoff at Justice and at Latham and is now a plaintiffs attorney in New York. "He takes his mentoring role very seriously and likes to see people learn and ultimately succeed."

Beyond Myers, Fisher, and Hillman, Chertoff's family tree within the federal government includes a number of other successful lawyers who regularly keep in contact, according to a number of lawyers who have worked with Chertoff. They include:

· Philip Perry: The career of the son-in-law of Vice President Dick Cheney has in many ways mirrored Chertoff's over the past decade. Also a former partner at Latham & Watkins, he worked on the Whitewater investigation with Chertoff and joined the DOJ after Bush's election in 2000. After stints at the Office of Management and Budget and back at Latham, Perry joined Chertoff at the DHS last year as the department's general counsel.

DOJ_NMG_0010217

· John Elwood: First hired as a counsel to Chertoff in the Criminal Division, Elwood became an assistant solicitor general and argued several cases before the Supreme Court. He's now deputy assistant attorney general at Justice's Office of Legal Counsel, the office charged with providing the legal justification for the president's authorization of warrantless eavesdropping.

· Laura Parsky: She was brought to the Criminal Division by Chertoff and is now a deputy assistant attorney general overseeing computer crimes and child exploitation. Parsky is the daughter of high-flying investment banker Gerald Parsky, the California state chairman of the 2004 Bush-Cheney campaign who was once considered a candidate for Treasury secretary.

· David Nahmias: Hired for the DOJ by Chertoff, he became a deputy assistant attorney general under Chertoff's successor, Christopher Wray. He's now U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Georgia in Atlanta.

· Eric Jaso: A former Latham associate under Chertoff in New Jersey, he worked as a lawyer in Chertoff's office at the DOJ. Jaso is now an assistant U.S. attorney in New Jersey and is rumored to be in line for an appointment to the federal bench.

· Matthew Martens: Another former Latham associate who followed Chertoff to Washington, he is now a federal prosecutor in Charlotte, N.C., and remains close to Chertoff, having dined with him in Charlotte last summer.

· Scott Weber: A former partner at Latham, he is now a lawyer in Chertoff's office at the DHS.

· Sigal Mandelker: Though she turned down a summer associate offer from Latham (she chose Covington & Burling), Mandelker made her way into Chertoff's inner circle at Justice through the DOJ's honors program and is now a lawyer in Chertoff's DHS office.

Oklahoma City Moves Past Its Infamous Bombing (CSM)

By Kris Axtman

The Christian Science Monitor, January 23, 2006

HOUSTON - It's hard for many in Oklahoma City to remember a time when they didn't know the names Tim and Terry, the two angry men who killed 168 people - and changed the city's collective consciousness - by parking a two-ton bomb of farm fertilizer and fuel oil in front of the Alfred P. Murrah federal building in 1995.

But as time goes on, wounds heal, memories fade, and hearts soften. At some point in the past decade, Oklahoma City began to look forward instead of back.

That may be the reason why Michael Fortier's release from prison Friday after serving more than a decade for his role in the bombing sent relatively few ripples through the community.

While it's painful to learn of his freedom, some say, their lives no longer revolve around the details of that April day. Their city, in many ways, has been freed from its own prison - through prayer and urban renewal.

"Oklahoma City is a different city, completely, than it was in 1995," says Bob Spinks, president of United Way of Central Oklahoma in Oklahoma City. "There is a lot of urban revitalization going on that has created excitement, lots of new venues downtown, and the economy has been doing well here. So all of this mitigates the Fortier news a little bit."

Indeed, Oklahoma City has flourished since the bombing a decade ago. In addition to a new federal building, there are two sports stadiums, a performing-arts center, a central library, a "River Walk"- style canal in the hip Bricktown district, and a trolley linking everything.

Officials say the bombing - at the time, the worst terrorist attack in US history - galvanized residents and created a sense of pride about the city. That, in turn, fueled the urban progress.

"It has been over 10 years and a lot has happened since then," says John Call, a forensic psychologist and president of Crisis Management Consultants in Oklahoma City. The fact that Mr. Fortier's release got very little attention, says Dr. Call, proved to him that the city's residents are in the latter stages of healing - having moved beyond emotional acceptance to reconstruction of their lives. "It's not something that's talked about anymore," he says.

That's not to say that the attack has been forgotten.

Take Jim Denny, for instance. His two children were in the building's day-care center when the explosion occurred and they still suffer from injuries.

But he is unaffected by Fortier's release. "I have absolutely no problem with him getting out of jail. He was a key witness in both [the Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols] trials and, according to the juries, he was the one that basically sewed up their convictions. I say, he's served his time and he should be allowed to try to put his life back together."

The government will not confirm whether Fortier and his family will go into the federal Witness Protection Program, and survivors and relatives of the victims were provided few details when they were sent notices of his release last week. "They didn't give us a lot of advanced notice, and won't tell us what is going to happen to him," says Ken Thompson, who lost his mother in the bombing. "So it's a difficult time for us." But, he says, "most people understand that without its star witness, the government would not have gotten guilty verdicts. So to some degree, he has paid his debt to society."

Fortier received a 12-year sentence in exchange for testifying against Mr. McVeigh and Mr. Nichols, and has served 85 percent of it. He and his wife, Lori, had advance knowledge of the plot to bomb the federal building after McVeigh - an old Army buddy - stopped by their home in Kingman, Ariz., and told them about it, he testified in court.

He also helped McVeigh steal and transport weapons that helped finance the scheme and was shown the target. He has apologized repeatedly for not alerting authorities and said he did not think McVeigh would go ahead with the plot.

"I deeply regret not taking the information I had to the police," he said at the time of his sentencing. "I sometimes daydream that I did do this and became a hero, but the reality is that I am not."

That Fortier will have to live with what he did is of little comfort to those who don't want him out of prison.

"I thought I was about over my anger, and I found out Tuesday evening from the Bureau of Prisons that I have a long way to go," says Jannie Coverdale, whose two grandchildren died inside the federal building's day care. She was their primary caregiver. "I have tried so hard to get over this anger and now I find out that Fortier is going to be hugging his kids again - when he helped take ours away. How is that justice?"

Patients Needing Care Overwhelm New Orleans's Hospital System (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 18 - The emergency rooms of this bedraggled region are facing their own emergency. As thousands of residents have begun returning in the weeks since New Year's, there are far more sick people than there are doctors, nurses, beds and equipment to take care of them.

The slow repopulation of the city picked up speed after the holidays as more schools reopened and, in the words of one emergency room doctor, the sicker people began to return. But only seven of what had been 15 adult acute-care facilities in the city and three surrounding parishes are open, and only one-third of the acute-care beds.

Hundreds or perhaps thousands of doctors and nurses never returned to New Orleans after the flood; long-term and psychiatric hospitals, not to mention hospices and rehabilitation centers, are now almost nonexistent in and around the city.

As a result, the returning residents have filled the functioning hospitals in and immediately around the city to capacity and beyond. Waiting times in emergency rooms have extended to as much as six hours, medical personnel at three hospitals reported.

Early one recent morning, doctors and nurses at East Jefferson General Hospital in Metairie, just outside of New Orleans, were already caring for five seriously ill or injured patients in the emergency room - because the hospital had no more beds to admit them to - while still managing a full load of incoming emergency patients near the entrance. Then two trauma victims from a car accident were brought in, followed by someone showing signs of appendicitis.

The staff had to "play musical chairs" with the accident victims and remaining patients to find everyone a bed and care for them, said Cheryl Carter, the nurse who directs emergency care.

"That's pretty much every day, pretty much every hospital," Ms. Carter said. "The waiting rooms look like a war center or a MASH unit. We look for more and more different ways to manage emergencies."

The city's sickest residents were among the first to leave New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina and should be the last to return, but that is not happening, said Dr. John Wales, chairman of the department of emergency medicine at East Jefferson, which for days has had more patients than it has beds. "I think they're coming back and the doctors who took care of them are not around," he said.

The Touro Infirmary is the only full-service hospital now functioning within the New Orleans city limits, and the lack of beds in the city has pushed patients to suburban hospitals like East Jefferson and filled them up. (Children's Hospital is also open in the city.) The situation is likely to get worse as flu season, which usually begins around late January here, hits its stride.

The thought of next month's Mardi Gras festivities has local doctors so worried they have formed a committee just to plan for care during the first large-scale, signature event in the distorted post-hurricane world. Dr. Jullette Saussy, who runs the 911 emergency medical service for the City of New Orleans, said that during Mardi Gras, the number of ambulance calls typically tripled, from an average of 120 a day to 360.

"There's a resource problem right now," said Dr. Peter DeBlieux, who heads the emergency department of Charity Hospital, a venerable institution for the city's poor, which no longer has a building and is operating out of Air Force tents in a far corner of the convention center. Patients with broken arms, he said, have at times been referred to Houma and Baton Rouge, cities that are, respectively, 50 and 80 miles away.

Five hospitals in the city, severely damaged by the storm, have been unable to reopen, including the Medical Center of Louisiana, the only Level 1 trauma center on the Gulf Coast, which is a combination of Charity and nearby University Hospital.

Some hospitals have opened neighborhood clinics or parking-lot tents for walk-in care, but some may never reopen, or may take up to a year to find the money to rebuild. The state wants to replace Charity, and its planned renovations to University Hospital could take several months or up to a year.

The city's rebuilding commission said in a report this week that if 65 percent of the region's prestorm population returns by July 1 - as many experts have predicted - the city will need to triple the number of hospital beds available, which would require hiring 2,550 medical staff members in less than six months and an "extraordinary expense" in housing them and paying them enough to return.

Cynthia Matherne, the designated regional coordinator for emergency management in an area that includes New Orleans and the parishes of Jefferson, St. Bernard and Plaquemines, said the problem of limited medical resources put pressure on emergency rooms from all directions.

"The problems we have are multiple," she said. Ordinarily, patients who have been stabilized after an emergency episode are gradually moved out to long-term acute care, rehabilitation or psychiatric facilities.

"But these have not reopened," Ms. Matherne said. "So all the psych patients end up being held in the E.R.'s. And when you're trying to discharge patients, there's no long-term care to discharge them to. There's no discharge to hospice care because there's none available." Home health aides are virtually nonexistent, she added.

"Hospitals are confronted with the question: How you are going to discharge these people?" Ms. Matherne said.

Dr. Saussy, of the New Orleans medical emergency response office, described a parallel problem among the ambulance units in the city. Because only Touro, with 273 beds, and Children's Hospital, with 125 beds, are open, city ambulances must often go to the three hospitals in nearby Jefferson Parish - East Jefferson General (444 beds), West Jefferson Medical Center (330 beds) and Ochsner Clinic Foundation (350 beds, expanding soon to 484).

"We have to wait hours to offload a patient," Dr. Saussy said. "That means we're not going to have that unit available to answer the next 911 call."

Ms. Matherne said the number of acute-care beds in the four parishes before the storm was 5,063, with an average of 4,083 filled each day. "Right now we're right at about 1,750 beds," she added.

Charity Hospital, once a magnet for some of the most severe medical emergencies - and for patients least likely to have insurance - is shuttered, leaving a jury-rigged emergency room under tents within the convention center. Dr. DeBlieux said 100 to 200 patients a day arrived with complaints ranging from major trauma or strokes to breaks and sprains.

Psychiatric patients are now being sent to emergency rooms unused to them. "We are overwhelmed with urban psychiatric patients we wouldn't have seen," said Dr. Joseph S. Guarisco, the chairman of emergency medicine at Ochsner.

Charity's lease at the convention center runs out in a few weeks, and the hospital is making plans to move its emergency room to another hospital building in Jefferson Parish.

In the early weeks after Hurricane Katrina, military medical units from the Army, Navy and Air Force set up temporary medical facilities around the city and helped with everything from diabetes to births to immunizations, but most of these units are gone.

For patients, a medical emergency usually means a long wait, unless it is life-threatening. Ben Cohen, who is 28 and lives in the Midcity neighborhood, started to have intense abdominal pain on Jan. 15 and spent four hours in the Touro emergency room before he was admitted. While there, he watched the single doctor on duty cope with a shooting victim and two trauma cases from a car accident.

"To their credit," Mr. Cohen said, "they did as good a job as they could have."

Dr. Wales at East Jefferson, like other emergency room directors, is trying to get more staff members to come back, particularly nurses and technicians and orderlies. "The issues include getting your existing staff a place to live," he said. "But they can't come back because there is no place. They won't come back without their families."

Dr. Wales added, "At many levels, the disaster continues to unfold."

Post-Katrina Inquiry Likely To Need New Expert Coroner Helping In Investigation Of La. Hospital Deaths Indicted (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, January 23, 2006

Louisiana authorities investigating whether patients were euthanized at New Orleans-area hospitals after Hurricane Katrina probably will appoint a new medical consultant because the Pennsylvania coroner assisting the inquiry was indicted on federal charges Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0010220

Kris Wartelle, spokeswoman for Louisiana Attorney General Charles Foti, said the indictment of coroner Cyril Wecht will not slow the state inquiry into more than 200 deaths at hospitals and nursing homes after Katrina hit Aug. 29. However, the 84-count indictment that accuses Wecht of using his position as Allegheny County, Pa., coroner to support his consulting business probably will lead to the appointment of "another expert" to review toxicology reports in the Louisiana inquiry, Wartelle said.

The investigation is examining whether any of the 64 patients who died at Memorial and Lindy Boggs hospitals were euthanized to end their suffering, and whether dozens of residents who died at nursing homes were mistreated or neglected. Last month, Wecht gave Louisiana investigators an analysis of toxicology tests in the hospital deaths. He and Louisiana officials have declined to comment on the report. Foti has said his inquiry is nearing a conclusion.

The indictment against Wecht, who has been involved in several high-profile death investigations across the country, comes as New Orleans District Attorney Eddie Jordan prepares to impanel a grand jury that will launch its own review of the hospital deaths.

Jordan said he is moving forward with his investigation and that it is too early to assess the impact of Wecht's involvement in the Louisiana inquiry. "We don't know what his findings were, and we don't know what the attorney general has found," Jordan said.

Wecht's work in Louisiana was not addressed in the indictment, which among other things accuses him of trading unclaimed bodies at the Allegheny County morgue to a local university's research program in exchange for laboratory space to expand his consulting business.

Mary Beth Buchanan, the U.S. attorney in Pittsburgh, said in court papers that from 1997 to 2004, Wecht's business, Wecht Pathology, made nearly $9 million. Wecht's share of that was estimated at $4.6 million, the indictment says.

"Cyril Wecht abused the position, authority and resources of the Allegheny County Coroner's Office to obtain money, property, services and other items of value for his personal benefit," Buchanan said.

Wecht has resigned from his position with Allegheny County, said his attorney Mark Rush.

"I would hope that (the indictment) would not be an issue" in the Louisiana investigation, Rush said.

The Louisiana investigation is looking into whether staff members at Memorial and Lindy Boggs administered lethal doses of morphine or other drugs to alleviate the suffering of critically ill patients whose conditions deteriorated when floodwaters swamped the city and power failures shut down the hospitals.

Forty-five people died at Memorial Hospital; 19 died at Lindy Boggs. Tenet Healthcare, which operates both hospitals, has said there was no wrongdoing and that it is cooperating with the investigation. Tenet declined to comment on Wecht's role in the inquiry.

Hurricane Refugees Demand Better Schools, Strong Levees (WT)

The Washington Times, January 23, 2006

ATLANTA (AP) -- Hurricane refugees from Louisiana told federal and state officials at forums across the South yesterday that what they want most when their state is rebuilt is affordable housing, better schools and stronger levees.

Some refugees at the "Louisiana Speaks" forums also worried that officials have no real plans to restore certain areas, such as New Orleans' impoverished Lower 9th Ward.

"This (forum) is a good idea," Tereece Johnson, 40, said at the event in Atlanta. "But is it going to accomplish something? I can't say."

Most of the 30 forums -- sponsored by the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Louisiana Recovery Authority -- were held in Louisiana. Six were held in Atlanta, Houston and four other cities where tens of thousands of Louisiana residents fled. Input from the forums will be incorporated in a long-term regional plan for rebuilding South Louisiana after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

But some were not yet ready to talk about the future.

"You're talking about rebuilding?" said Denise Herbert, 47 at the forum in Atlanta. "I want somebody to tell me where my mother is now," referring to 82-year-old Ethel Anna Herbert, who went missing more than five months ago.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, who was at the Atlanta forum, talked to Miss Herbert and other refugees, who wanted help with immediate needs such as rental assistance and counseling.

"We have to do a combination of all of that," Mrs. Blanco said. "We have to take care of the immediate needs now, and we have to work for the future. And that has to be done simultaneously."

Many refugees said the availability of affordable housing will make or break their decision to return to New Orleans.

"I'd like to go back -- if I can get suitable housing," said Joseph Howard, 48, a hospital housekeeping worker who had to flee his rented house in midtown New Orleans.

Housing and transportation were major issues for two dozen refugees who attended the meeting held in Amite, La., a small community about 75 miles north of New Orleans.

"If we do decide to go back to New Orleans, will the rent go down?" said Sabrina Lee, a 25-year-old who can no longer afford the Uptown New Orleans place she rented before the storm.

However, the most pressing concern raised at the meetings in Louisiana involved flood control.

"Before we can make any decisions, we have to have answers on the levees," said Antoinette Harrell-Miller, who is unsure whether she'll return to the city.

In Houston, Gina Dupart said she was cautious about the value of yesterday's forum.

"We made a decision to come here to put our input in. We hope that it will be used to make [New Orleans] better in the rebuilding process. We didn't come here just to waste time," said Miss Dupart, 41.

WAR NEWS:

By Opting To Invade Iraq, George W. Bush Was Following In The Footsteps Of History (USNEWS)

By Michael Barone

U.S. News and World Report, January 23, 2006

America is attacked. The president addresses Congress in stirring terms. Senators and representatives, with a few eccentric exceptions, vote for a declaration of war, and the overwhelming majority of the people support the war effort without stint. The president appoints sterling generals and admirals and superintends massive war production. American troops surge to victory, and peace is made.

This is the picture we have of the way America, and American presidents, go to war. It comports with what we think happened in World War I and, especially, in World War II. In this view of U.S. history, American presidents lead the nation only into wars that are forced upon them.

There's only one problem. This picture is almost entirely contrary to the facts.

Critics of George W. Bush like to say that Iraq was a war of choice--a conflict that could have been avoided. But almost all American wars have been, to a greater or lesser degree, wars of choice. It is said that Bush went to war in Iraq without sufficient forces, without a game plan for the occupation, and without an exit strategy. Even if all those charges are true, then he has plenty of company in American history.

For generations, presidents have wrestled with the difficult decision to lead the nation into war. Woodrow Wilson chose to bring the United States into World War I when he could have acquiesced to Germany's demand that we stop trading with Britain and France. Franklin Roosevelt, beginning in 1939, took daring and controversial decisions--starting with his sending massive aid to Britain and the Soviet Union against Nazi Germany--knowing they raised a grave risk that Germany or Japan would attack.

Military success was rarely guaranteed. In the early 1800s,the American military was small, and usually outnumbered. So there were practical limits on the president's ability to exercise his powers. Spurred by young "war hawks"like Henry Clay and John C. Calhoun, James Madison asked Congress for 10,000 troops to fight the British in 1811. Then, a year later, he imposed an embargo on trade and got Congress to vote, far from unanimously, to go to war. Madison's ability to prosecute the War of 1812 was so limited he was unable to prevent the burning of the White House and the Capitol.

Pirates of the Barbary Coast. Both the president and the American people had to learn that, in wartime, patience is definitely a virtue. Typically, the field of battle was far from Washington, and until the telegraph allowed Abraham Lincoln to communicate in real time with his generals, presidents learned of the course of battle only weeks or months later. In 1801, Thomas Jefferson sent the Navy and the Marines to take on the Barbary pirates, who were enslaving American merchants and demanding tribute. His ships set sail for the Barbary Coast in June 1801 but didn't complete their mission until September 1805.

The rationale for a war, then as now, was not always clear-cut. In 1846, James K. Polk started the war with Mexico by claiming, with murky evidence at best, that Mexican forces had crossed the Nueces River and "shed American blood on American soil." The treaty ending that war gave us more than half of Mexico's territory, including Texas and California.

As for the Civil War, almost no one anticipated its outbreak, course, and outcome. Only a few thought it would be a long war, notably William Tecumseh Sherman. While teaching at a military college in Louisiana in 1859, he wrote, "All here talk as if a dissolution of the Union were not only a possibility but a probability of easy execution. If attempted we will have Civil War of the most horrible kind." Abraham Lincoln had no such foresight. In his second inaugural, in March 1865, he admitted, "Neither party expected for the war the magnitude or the duration which it has already attained."

Nor did Lincoln seem to have a clear military strategy when the war began. He walked over to the War Department every day to read the latest telegraph dispatches and went through one general after another until he settled on Sherman and Ulysses

S. Grant. And he did meet with resistance: Lincoln's Democratic opponents called for a compromise peace with the South, retaining slavery, or even letting the Confederacy go. In the summer of 1864 Lincoln seemed sure to be defeated for re-election. But Grant's advance through Virginia and siege of Petersburg and Sherman's capture of Atlanta and March to the Sea across Georgia convinced northern voters that the Union was on the road to victory. Lincoln was re-elected by a 55 to 45 percent margin. What were his plans for rebuilding the Union? After his assassination (five days after Robert E. Lee's surrender), no one knew.

Post-Civil War, America's appetite for military action seemed sated. The Army policed much of the South during Reconstruction until 1877 and fought against the Plains Indians. The Navy was largely scrapped; in the 1880s it was ranked 12th in the world, behind Turkey's and Sweden's. But America ceased to look inward in 1890, when the Census Bureau declared that the frontier had been closed and when Navy Capt. Alfred Thayer Mahan's The Influence of Sea Power Upon History focused American leaders' attentions abroad.

Rough Riders. A young New York politician and author named Theodore Roosevelt was one who looked beyond America's borders. At 38, he wangled an appointment as assistant secretary of the Navy. President William McKinley, a Civil War veteran and canny politician, had no eagerness for war. Roosevelt did. When the battleship Maine blew up in Havana harbor in February 1898, there was an outcry for war with Spain, which had been brutally suppressing a colonial rebellion in Cuba. Ten days later, when Navy Secretary John Long left the office after lunch, Assistant Secretary Roosevelt did an end run: He wrote out orders positioning the American fleet for battle with Spanish forces in Cuba and its Pacific colony of the Philippines. Long was unnerved but didn't reverse the orders. So the Navy was ready to go on the attack in April, when McKinley sent a war message to Congress and war was declared. The Spanish fleet was defeated in Manila harbor on May 1; Cuba was blockaded, and America won land and sea battles July 3 at Santiago Harbor and San Juan Hill (where Roosevelt led his Rough Riders in a well-publicized charge). Puerto Rico was invaded on July 25. A peace protocol was signed on August 13.

In retrospect, the military course of this war seems the most predictable of all of America's major wars--the Spanish fleet was decrepit, the American fleet was well positioned to fight, and the major problem was logistical, getting the Army down to Tampa and then to Cuba. Yet the war led to unpredicted and controversial military deployments. A major insurrection in the Philippines wasn't finally put down until 1902. A treaty giving the United States supervisory control over Cuba resulted in U.S. military occupation. And the country was not unanimously pro-war. Scholars, business moguls, and Democrats in the 1900 presidential campaign denounced American "imperialism."

The first three presidents to serve entirely in the 20th century--Theodore Roosevelt, William Howard Taft, and Woodrow Wilson--proclaimed that the United States had special responsibilities in the Western Hemisphere, and they dispatched troops accordingly. They saw the United States as a world power--with the world's largest economy, the largest population of any major power but Russia, and, by 1908, one of its largest navies. Which inevitably raised the question: When World War I broke out in Europe, in 1914, would the United States stand by or take part?

Wilson's instinct was to hold back. He sent his unofficial envoy, Col. Edward House, to Europe with proposals for peace. In a country reluctant to engage in a European caldron, Wilson ran for re-election in 1916 as "the man who has kept us out of war." But in January 1917 the Germans announced that their submarines would conduct unrestricted warfare against neutral, i.e., U.S., ships, and in February Wilson made public a telegram intercepted by British intelligence from the German foreign minister promising Mexico that it would get Arizona, New Mexico, and Texas if it entered the war against the United States. "It is a fearful thing to lead this great peaceful people into war," Wilson told Congress in April. But the stakes were great. "The world," Wilson intoned, "must be made safe for democracy."

Congress, with only minor dissent, agreed. The Senate voted 82 to 6 for war, the House 373 to 50. Still, large blocs of voters opposed the war--Progressives from the heavily German- and Scandinavian-American Upper Midwest, Socialists in New York and other big cities. Wilson responded with the sharpest suppression of free speech since the Civil War, and many critics of American involvement soon found themselves in jail. The railroads and shipping industry were also quickly nationalized--a degree of government control greater than in any later American war.

Unready, unset, go. The United States entered what was then called the Great War with military forces plainly insufficient for the struggle. It had virtually no air force. The Navy was far from combat readiness. An army of more than 1 million men was yet to be raised. It took time to assemble and transport the American expeditionary force, which did not come into play militarily until spring 1918, a year after the declaration of war. But under the leadership of Gen. John Pershing, U.S. troops performed well in key battles. By the fall of 1918, German forces were collapsing. An armistice was negotiated to take effect on 11:11 a.m. on November 11, the day we still celebrate as Veterans Day.

It was after the Great Depression and the election of Franklin Roosevelt, in 1932, that American policy entered its most isolationist phase. Roosevelt torpedoed the London financial conference in 1933, acquiesced in the passage of a Neutrality Act in 1935, and reduced military spending from the already low levels of the 1920s. But he also paid heed to what was happening in Europe. Roosevelt could understand German, and listening to Hitler's radio broadcasts, he developed at some point in the 1930s--by the time of the Munich agreement in September 1938 at the latest, his admiring biographer Conrad Black argues--the idea that the United States could not live with Nazi Germany.

Most Americans did not share that conviction; neither did some of Roosevelt's own appointees. That hardly deterred Roosevelt, however. Using his powers as chief executive, he increased military spending from hundreds of millions of dollars in 1938 to $6 billion in 1941. He instituted a military draft in an election year. He bypassed the Neutrality Act by providing destroyers to Britain in 1940. He declared the North Atlantic up to Iceland American territorial waters. He sped aid to the Soviet Union when Hitler's Germany attacked. And he cut off oil shipments to Japan. Tokyo responded by attacking Pearl Harbor on Dec.7, 1941. Four days later, Hitler declared war on the United States.

Roosevelt could say that World War II was not a war of choice. Yet the choices he made before Pearl Harbor certainly helped to provoke an attack, and they were choices that his political opponents bitterly condemned.

"Absolute victory." Despite Roosevelt's preparations, the United States entered this war, as it had most wars, without sufficient forces or even a coherent, workable military strategy. Nor was there a clear idea of what the endpoint would be--beyond Roosevelt's assurance in his speech to Congress on December 8 that "the American people, in their righteous might, will win through to absolute victory."

At that moment, it was far from clear how victory would be achieved. The Pacific Fleet was gravely injured (though the aircraft carriers, luckily, were safe at sea); the Philippines were indefensible (as Roosevelt admitted in a fireside chat in February 1942); the weak British and Dutch forces seemed unlikely to stop Japan from sweeping through East Asia and what now is Indonesia and establishing bases from which they could threaten, as they did, India and Australia; Hitler's Army was at the gates of Moscow and was sweeping into the oil fields of the Caucasus, while Nazi forces were poised to sweep across Egypt and occupy the oil fields of the Middle East.

The picture seemed dismal for the United States and its Allies. The U.S. military was still being expanded, and in initial battles, especially in North Africa, its forces proved poorly trained and commanded. War production had been vastly expanded since 1940, but Roosevelt's goals seemed wholly unrealistic to many, and the newspapers were full of stories of bottlenecks and snafus. Not until June 1942, at the Battle of Midway, did the United States win a significant military victory, and that was closely fought.

Roosevelt did a masterful job, however, better than any other president, far better than Lincoln, of selecting the right commanders for the right tasks early on--Gen. John Marshall for organizing the Army, Adm. Ernest King for directing the Navy, Gen. Douglas MacArthur for the Pacific Theater, Gen. Dwight Eisenhower for the European Theater, and Gen. Matthew Arnold for the Army Air Force. He also did a masterful job, though the work often seemed chaotic, of organizing war production and producing tanks, airplanes, and ships in numbers far greater than almost anyone thought possible.

But plans changed, operations took longer than expected, troops early on performed below expectations, and materiel and equipment were not always plentiful or optimally functional. In the European Theater, the great brunt of casualties was borne by the Soviet Union, and it was possible in 1941 and 1942 that it would collapse. Roosevelt and Winston Churchill feared until nearly the end that Stalin might make a separate peace with Hitler as he had in August 1939. In the Pacific Theater, the fierce resistance of Japanese troops and the kamikaze attacks of 1944-45 made forward progress exceedingly costly in casualties.

As late as the summer of 1945, some military leaders hesitated to recommend invasion of Japan's home islands because they expected the cost to be 1 million American lives. And even after the atomic bombs exploded at Hiroshima and Nagasaki in August 1945, Japan's emperor had to persuade the military to surrender.

Neither Roosevelt nor Truman in 1945 had plans for what turned out to be the Cold War. The United States was now the world's prime military power. But Truman swiftly demobilized the forces, as public opinion demanded, and the draft was dropped. By 1949, the Soviets had their own atomic bomb--which raised the specter of mutual assured destruction if both sides were to employ the weapons they brandished.

Cold conflict. Truman set the United States on the course it followed, with some deviations, for the 40-plus years of the Cold War. As the Soviets moved to undermine governments in Eastern Europe and replace them with Communist regimes, Truman in March 1947 urged Congress to aid Greece and Turkey to prevent Communist takeover. In the process, he set out an ambitious goal: "It must be the policy of the United States to support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressures."

Under the Truman Doctrine, the draft was reinstated and the armed forces built back up, but in choosing whether to wage war Truman and his successors were constrained by the threat of nuclear war between the two superpowers. Even so, when North Korean troops crossed the 38th parallel in June 1950, Harry Truman felt obliged to defend South Korea. American forces proved insufficient after the Chinese unexpectedly invaded in November 1950, and the United States and its Allies were thrown back into a southern perimeter around Pusan. General MacArthur responded with an audacious amphibious landing at Inchon.

He wanted to go farther, to bomb and attack the Chinese beyond Korea's northern boundary. Truman, fearful of a nuclear confrontation, said no--and when MacArthur persisted, fired him in April 1951. "There is no substitute for victory," MacArthur proclaimed in a speech at West Point. Truman's popularity plunged to a record low.

Only after a new president, Dwight Eisenhower, clandestinely threatened nuclear retaliation did the Communists agree to a compromise peace--a tie at best, not a victory for the United States.

Eisenhower sought to discourage further Soviet aggression by maintaining U.S. forces in Europe and Asia, by constructing alliances in the underdeveloped world, and by threatening massive retaliation with nuclear weapons even up to what his secretary of state, John Foster Dulles, called "the brink of war." The Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev threatened to isolate U.S. forces in conventionally indefensible Berlin in 1957, 1960, and 1961 and installed nuclear missiles in Cuba in 1962; Eisenhower and John F. Kennedy faced down the threats to Berlin, and Kennedy after tense negotiations persuaded the Soviets to withdraw the missiles, by secretly withdrawing missiles from Turkey and guaranteeing there would be no further attempts to overthrow the Castro regime. Khrushchev's successors never again made such threats, but they did encourage coups and guerrilla movements in the Third World, with varying success.

And nowhere more so than in Vietnam. Viet Cong insurgents had been operating in South Vietnam, aided by Communist North Vietnam, since the country was divided in 1954. The United States, in line with the Truman Doctrine, sent economic and military aid to South Vietnam. The critical moment of escalation came in August 1963, when Kennedy approved a coup against the South Vietnamese president, Ngo Dinh Diem; in November, Diem was killed. This effectively gave the responsibility for South Vietnam to the United States. Kennedy's successor, Lyndon Johnson, eventually sent 540,000 U.S. soldiers to Vietnam. But Gen. William Westmoreland's strategy of using intense firepower in the jungles and mountains resulted in heavy American casualties while failing to break the hold of the Viet Cong in densely populated areas. Johnson's refusal to threaten nuclear weapons and his unwillingness to attack North Vietnam, for fear of the kind of Chinese intervention that had nearly defeated the United States in Korea, meant the Communists had no reason to agree to a Korea-style peace. American opinion turned against the war, forcing Johnson to retire. Richard Nixon reduced troop levels, and Gen. Creighton Abrams adopted a strategy of protecting populated areas and building up South Vietnamese forces. A North Vietnamese invasion was repelled in 1972 and a peace agreement signed in December. But in 1975 the North Vietnamese attacked again in force, and a newly elected Democratic Congress denied the aid sought by Nixon's successor, Gerald Ford, for the South Vietnamese. Saigon fell in April 1975--a galling defeat for America and a disaster for millions of South Vietnamese.

The outcome in Vietnam would inhibit American presidents and the American military for years to come. Jimmy Carter responded to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan with an embargo on Soviet grain sales. When Iranian revolutionaries seized diplomats--an act of war under the laws of diplomacy--he responded with protracted negotiations and an eight-helicopter rescue mission that failed. Carter was defeated by Ronald Reagan in 1980; the hostages were released on Inauguration Day, immediately after the Gipper was sworn in. Reagan's vast defense buildup in the 1980s, and his endorsement of strategic missile defense, were one factor in convincing Soviet leaders that they could no longer match America.

Reluctant warrior. The success of Reagan's policies may now be fully measured. Ironically, he of all Cold War presidents was the most reluctant to use nuclear weapons; he was horrified at the destruction that would be caused by mutual assured destruction and initiated a strategic missile defense program, derided by his critics as "Star Wars," to make such mass annihilation impossible. During his presidency his defense secretary, Caspar Weinberger, and his national security adviser, Gen. Colin Powell, enunciated doctrines that, had they been applied retroactively, would have prevented almost every American president from going to war. America, they said, should do so only when it had overwhelming force, consensus support from the American people, and an endpoint or exit strategy clearly in hand.

Reagan actually used military force sparingly. In 1983, he withdrew forces from Lebanon, after 241 marines were killed by a massive truck bomb. But when a military coup in tiny Grenada took the life of the prime minister, a Marxist who nonetheless wanted to forge friendly ties with the United States, Reagan dispatched troops without hesitation.

The fall of the Berlin Wall and the end of the Cold War in 1989 freed presidents from the fear that military intervention would lead to nuclear war between the superpowers. But they still went to war only reluctantly. Saddam Hussein's occupation of Kuwait in 1990 presented George H.W. Bush with an occasion for war that met the standards set by Weinberger and Powell. The United States, still with a Cold War-size military and with plenty of allies, could deploy a sufficient military force (Bush asked his generals how many men they needed and doubled it), it had an easily realizable military strategy, and there was an obvious endpoint, the liberation of Kuwait. Even so, nearly half the U.S. Senate and a large minority in the House opposed military action. Ultimately, Bush rejected advice to continue on into Iraq, though that led to the massacre of many Kurds and Shiites, who had been encouraged to believe that they could count on American assistance.

Bill Clinton similarly seemed to follow the Weinberger-Powell prescription. When Army Rangers were killed in Somalia, Clinton quickly withdrew U.S. forces. He resisted intervention in Bosnia until it became clear that American forces would be called on to help Europeans withdraw, and force was used sparingly. The war in Kosovo was conducted entirely by air, to produce zero U.S. casualties. Actions against al Qaeda were limited to a few long-range airstrikes.

The way it was. The shock of September 11 set George W. Bush on a course closer to that which American presidents have followed in the past. He chose, with near unanimous support, to go to war in Afghanistan, even though it was not obvious that we had sufficient forces or a military strategy to ensure victory. The amazing capacities of the American military--with special forces on the ground directing precision bombing by B-2s flown in from Missouri--speedily ousted the Taliban regime. But Afghanistan is still a disorderly place, with a central government by no means wholly in control. Bush also chose to go to war in Iraq, this time against considerable opposition, with forces entirely capable of success in major military operations but not, or so critics have plausibly charged, sufficient to impose order in the months and years after. Nor is there a clear endpoint or exit strategy: Bush insists that American forces will leave when Iraqi forces can maintain order, but determining just when that might be will be a matter of fine and debatable judgment.

Bush's decision to go to war in Iraq has been attacked as a departure from the American tradition of war. But it is more of a return to the dominant tradition of our history. The United States has never been an isolationist nation; Americans and American military forces have been roaming the globe since the Revolutionary War. Until the 20th century, the oceans seemed to protect the American homeland from attack, but not always. The White House and the Capitol were burned in 1814, and James K. Polk went to war in 1846 after charging that American forces had been attacked on American soil. In any case, the oceans protect us no more and have not for many years.

Wars are chancy things. The friction of war, as the Prussian military philosopher Carl von Clausewitz wrote, is inevitable and its effects unpredictable. The responsibility for sending men to their deaths has weighed heavily on our commanders in chief. Photographs of Abraham Lincoln and Franklin Roosevelt show how the weight of making such awesome decisions aged these vigorous leaders, just as it has visibly aged George W. Bush over the past five years.

Our system of government gives millions of voters and members of the armed services and thousands of public officials in the legislative and executive branches a role in fighting America's wars. But the most difficult decisions, and the greatest burden of responsibility, have rested on America's presidents, who, relying on imperfect information, must make, and have often made, life-and-death decisions without being able to know for certain what effects they will have.

Not Like His Father (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, January 30, 2006

On New Year's Day, President George W. Bush was visiting wounded soldiers at San Antonio's Brooke Army Medical Center. He found himself by the bed of a badly burned soldier, swathed in bandages. He was told she might not pull through. Surrounded by her family, he couldn't summon words to express his feelings. "I sat there and wept with them," he recalled later. "I didn't know what else to do."

Fifteen years ago, President George H. W. Bush experienced his own emotional moments with the troops. On a Thanksgiving visit to Saudi Arabia amid a huge U.S. buildup in the Persian Gulf region, he grew flustered when a young lieutenant thanked him for being there. Tearing up, the president was momentarily speechless, then blurted out, "That's what Woody Allen said: 'Ninety percent of life is showing up.'"

It is a familiar scene for the father and son: those awkward meetings with soldiers in wartime, punctuated by the fact that neither is a man of natural eloquence.

The two Bush men are bound together in other ways. They are only the second father and son to become president (John Adams and John Quincy Adams were the first). And each launched a war against the same tyrant in the same country.

Yet curiously, there are more differences than similarities in their role as commander in chief. The 41st president was a coalition builder and a diplomat. The 43rd president was willing to go it alone and ignore international opprobrium. The first Bush had a sense of limits about American power. His son believes the military is his best tool for working his will abroad.

The two men made the case for war in different fashion as well. It is true the father's job was easier than his son's. Saddam Hussein had invaded Kuwait and was an unmistakable threat. Nonetheless, George Herbert Walker Bush tried to build consensus at home and abroad before starting the Gulf War.

George W. Bush made his case in a more controversial way, arguing for a pre-emptive strike to depose Saddam. He spoke of how the Iraqi dictator might use weapons of mass destruction and of his ties to terrorists. Those claims have never been proved.

It is striking that the son rarely cites his father as his role model as commander in chief. George W. Bush says the world has changed dramatically since his father's tenure, largely because of 9/11 and the threat posed by terrorists. The challenges he faces, he says, are unique. As Vice President Dick Cheney told U.S. News in January, "We're talking about the possibility of a handful of terrorists--a relatively few individuals--able to get their hands on, say, a biological agent or a nuclear weapon and do enormous harm inside the United States. That's sort of the ultimate threat we face today. And it's a different kind of threat than we've ever faced before .... It forces us to think in new ways about how we defend the nation."

Grounded. This gospel of singularity informs Bush's role as commander in chief. It has led him to expand the authority and reach the presidency into areas his father never entered: domestic spying without warrants; detaining suspected terrorists without trial; conducting a vast, pre-emptive war against terrorists. "It requires certain qualities," says a senior White House official, "such as an unshakable will--and, particularly during a time of war--passion. Feelings are going to run higher than normal, and you have to be grounded, in the sense of knowing what you're doing and believing what you're doing is right."

Bush has said the terrorist attacks of 9/11 gave him his mission as president--to protect the nation from what he sees as a global network of "evildoers." The day after 9/11, he called advisers to the White House residence and urged them to prepare for a long struggle. Communicating the facts about the war would be difficult, the president said, partly because it might be impossible to reveal successes, lest such announcements expose U.S. counterterrorism methods and endanger American operatives. One of the biggest challenges, he cautioned, would be to stay the course. "The further we get from this day," he warned, "people are going to forget." He promised never to do that.

Bush believes he must keep up his campaign to convince the nation that the war is going well. "People see so much of the war on cable TV that the president needs to provide context,"says a senior administration official. That means countering news of casualties and war costs by emphasizing that America cannot abandon its new client state.

Bush's father, by contrast, saw the 1991 war with Iraq as a conventional conflict to be won by conventional means. And he had a strong sense of limits. George Herbert Walker Bush called off the ground battle after only 100 hours because Saddam's forces had been crushed. His refusal to take over Iraq and occupy Baghdad was widely criticized, but Bush argued that the United Nations never approved an occupation. He also insisted that occupying Iraq would have been vastly expensive in lives and money. His predictions have proved true--on his son's watch.

George H. W. Bush felt another constraint--what historians call "Vietnam syndrome," a reluctance by Americans to commit troops to potentially lengthy wars without a guarantee of success and a certainty of moral justification. "After the mess in Vietnam, many Americans didn't trust their leaders to send troops anywhere," says a former adviser. "So we developed a vast public outreach program." At one point, Bush even gave a speech justifying the coming conflict in theological terms, using the philosophies of Aquinas and Augustine to define what was a "just war."

Self-reliant. The senior Bush felt equipped--from his experience as vice president, former director of central intelligence, and U.S. envoy to the United Nations and to China--to challenge both the military and his advisers. George W. Bush seems more accepting of the advice of his in-house "experts." He went along with recommendations of Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld to minimize the number of troops needed in Iraq, which some military analysts and many Democrats have branded a mistake. Bush also accepted his advisers' claims that the occupation would be relatively easy and that the Iraqis would welcome U.S. soldiers as liberators. "We built a policy based on practicalities," says a former national security adviser to the father. "They built a policy based on assumptions."

In running the war, the elder Bush didn't micromanage the Pentagon, but he did pay close attention to certain tactics. He reviewed plans for bombing areas where civilian casualties were likely, for instance, and tried to select targets and ways of attack to minimize harm to noncombatants. If his son pays heed to such details, he has not disclosed it. In fact, he says he almost always leaves operational details to the military.

The father, a former Navy pilot shot down over the Pacific in World War II, knew all too well the perils of war. Perhaps that's why he seemed more troubled by the consequences than his son. On Dec. 31, 1990, as war approached, the elder Bush wrote a moving letter to his five children about how much he enjoyed their time at Camp David over Christmas. "I guess what I want you to know as a father is this: Every human life is precious," he wrote. "When the question is asked, 'How many lives are you willing to sacrifice?'--it tears at my heart. The answer, of course, is none--none at all." But Bush added: "I look at today's crisis as 'good'vs. 'evil'--Yes, it is that clear. ... Sometimes in life you have to act as you think best--you can't compromise, you can't give in--even if your critics are loud and numerous."

And what does the father think of the son's choices? He isn't privy to the high-level intelligence his son receives, so he defers to the judgment of his first-born. Besides, one of the traits the father shares with his son is loyalty, so he will let history judge both men by their deeds and their times.

Imbalance Of Power (USNEWS)

By Jay Tolson

U.S. News and World Report, January 23, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0010227

During the Civil War, Abraham Lincoln got away with suspending habeas corpus and subjecting citizens to military law. Even more famously, he defied the law of the land by freeing enslaved Americans. During World War II, Franklin D. Roosevelt ordered the internment of Japanese-American citizens and received the Supreme Court's subsequent approval. Yet when Harry S. Truman ordered the Commerce Department to take over 87 steel plants crippled by striking workers during the Korean War, the high court ruled that he had pushed executive prerogative beyond acceptable bounds.

So just how imperial can the American president be? And more specifically, how, when, and how far can the powers that the Constitution invested in the commander in chief be extended?

Disclosures about George W. Bush's support for a National Security Agency-run domestic-spying program have pushed those questions to the fore once again. The headlines have fueled charges that his administration has, in post-9/11 measures ranging from indefinite detention of terrorism suspects (including two U.S. citizens) to torture and abuse of detainees around the world, taken presidential discretion to new, possibly illegal extremes. Joining a host of liberal voices, former Vice President Al Gore has decried a "truly breathtaking expansion of executive power" by the Bush administration.

Bush, so far, has gotten a broad pass on his amplification of the commander in chief's prerogatives, which many Americans view as justified in the name of the war on terrorism. But there are growing signs of resistance. Congressional hearings in February will examine the president's rationale for ignoring procedures instituted in the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, namely the requirement that intelligence agencies secure a warrant from a special court before eavesdropping on U.S. citizens. Another congressional committee says it will oversee implementation of a new ban on the use of torture, which the president, even while signing the bill into law, suggested he would ignore when necessary. For its part, the Supreme Court is mulling over the possibility of hearings on detainee cases, although the Justice Department's solicitor general has argued that the court has no jurisdiction over them.

Whatever the solicitor general argues, cases involving possible executive overreach are almost certain to reach the high court. The American Civil Liberties Union and the Center for Constitutional Rights have filed separate suits to challenge the legality of warrantless domestic spying and to determine whether the NSA monitored lawyers, journalists, and academics involved with the Middle East. One plaintiff in the ACLU suit, journalist Christopher Hitchens, a prominent backer of Bush's war on terrorism and the war in Iraq, says that if the administration wants to engage in domestic spying, it "must ask Congress to change FISA, not ignore it."

Powering up. This in some ways goes to the nub of the historical and theoretical debate about executive authority: How does the commander in chief exercise extraordinary powers within the legal framework of the republic, including the constitutionally ordained separation of powers?

Arguments for and against strong executive authority--"energy in the executive," as Alexander Hamilton phrased it--have been put forth by both sides of the conservative-liberal divide, depending largely on who is in the White House. From the 1950s through the '70s, liberal scholars and pundits were among the aggressive supporters of a stronger executive. Historians Henry Steele Commager and Arthur Schlesinger Jr. both took on critics who attacked Truman for not securing congressional authority when he sent troops to Korea. Richard Neustadt's 1960 study, Presidential Power, exalted FDR's strong leadership and lamented Dwight Eisenhower's allegedly listless presidency. But after both John F. Kennedy and Lyndon Johnson tried, with mixed results, to bring greater elan to the White House, Neustadt grew uneasy that his ideas were seen as providing a warrant for the Vietnam War debacle and Nixon administration abuses, including ille-gal wiretapping of political foes and antiwar activists. Schlesinger also changed his tune in his book The Imperial Presidency . But as liberals began deploring a lack of balance among government branches, conservative (and particularly neoconservative) thinkers supportive of Ronald Reagan's "morning in America" began to trot out the oldest justifications of a strong executive. "When you own the presidency," acknowledges Harvard political scientist Harvey Mansfield, a leading conservative defender of executive prerogative, "it looks like a far more valuable possession."

How Clinton Coped (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, January 23, 2006

Former President Bill Clinton didn't wage a full-fledged war during the eight years he was in office. But he did order American troops into harm's way on several occasions. From his home in Chappaqua, N.Y., Clinton offered his views, in an E-mail conversation with U.S. News 's Chief White House Correspondent Kenneth T. Walsh, on what it takes to lead during times of conflict and at times of peace. Excerpts:

On the most difficult decisions he faced regarding use of military force during his presidency. When we used the military in Bosnia, Kosovo, and Haiti, most Americans, most Republicans in Congress, and many Democrats were initially opposed to it.

On directly supervising the military and the issue of "micromanagement" during a crisis. Generally, it is best not to micromanage military operations, though in some cases it is unavoidable. For example, after the accidental bombing of the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade because of outdated maps, I had daily meetings to go over the proposed targets for the next day. On a few occasions, I disagreed with the military's choices, but wherever possible I tried to set policy and let them decide how best to carry it out.

On the challenges of being commander in chief in today's world. In the modern era, leadership involves dealing with the 24-hour news cycle and responding to the concerns of allies, international organizations, [and] at least the neutral countries that are well disposed to America. It's important to respond as quickly as possible to events and legitimate questions but not to be stampeded into actions or words that will compound events or create new problems.

The toughest part of the job as commander in chief. The hardest thing is knowing young Americans and innocent civilians in the theater of conflict might be killed or badly injured.

On whether presidential leadership is different in times of war and times of peace. In a military conflict, successful leadership requires clear objectives, a strategy to achieve them, a clear understanding with the military of the tactics to be used, and an ability to explain the decision to use force in terms of our interests and our values to people at home and around the world. These skills are also significant in pursuing proactive objectives. But during a conflict, clarity, consistency, concentration, and a willingness to evaluate and, if necessary, alter tactics are even more essential.

On how much he relied on his senior military advisers. I relied heavily on my military advisers for tactical advice. On the question of whether to use force, I sought their advice but made the final decisions myself, sometimes disagreeing with them, as in Kosovo and Haiti.

On the concerns of Pentagon planners. Our military leaders did not voice concerns about public opinion but did want a clear definition of military success including an exit strategy.

An example of contingency planning inside his government. In Kosovo, my senior advisers believed, as I did, that our air power would prevail but also had plans to introduce ground troops in the event it did not.

On his feelings about sending troops into harm's way. In making life or death decisions, I leaned on the power of prayer, the example of my predecessors, the support of my cabinet and staff, the vice president, and, of course, Hillary.

Iraq Sunnis Commit To Coalition Talks (REU)

Reuters, January 23, 2006

BAGHDAD (Reuters) - Iraq's biggest Sunni political bloc committed itself on Sunday to talks with Shi'ites and Kurds to form a government of national unity, but said its key demands, including changes to the constitution, must be met.

The United States, keen to drive the political process toward a stable consensus, wants the Kurds and majority Shi'ites, who dominated last month's elections, to form a government that includes minority Sunnis. It hopes an inclusive coalition will undermine the raging Sunni Arab insurgency.

Four policemen were killed and nine wounded by a roadside bomb in Baquba, 65 km (40 miles) north of Baghdad. Thirteen other people were killed in attacks across Iraq, including a policeman's four nephews who died when a rocket hit his home.

The Iraqi Accordance Front, which comprises three mainly Islamist Sunni Arab groups, said it would appeal against the results of an election it believes was rigged but would still take part in talks on a new coalition government.

"It will be active in talks with other political blocs to form a unity government," said Tareq al-Hashemi, whose moderate Iraqi Islamic Party is the biggest member of the Front.

Hashemi said the election results did "not reflect the political and population weight" of the Front, which believes it should have won 11 more seats. The Sunni coalition would seek key ministries in the new government as compensation, he said.

The Front also intends to hold Shi'ites and Kurds to a promise, extracted under U.S. pressure, of reviewing the constitution approved in a referendum last October.

CONSTITUTION

Many Sunnis fear the constitution's provisions for regional autonomy will give Kurds and Shi'ites control over Iraq's vast oil reserves and eventually break the country apart.

"We ask the blocs not to put obstacles in the way of making some changes to the constitution," Hashemi told a news briefing.

After boycotting parliament last year, Sunni leaders had hoped a big turnout in the December 15 election would put them in a strong position to press for amendments, particularly on a new federal state structure, which they fear could give control of oil to Kurdish and Shi'ite regions in the north and south.

They had also hoped that other Shi'ite and secular groups opposed to decentralization would undermine the dominance of the main Shi'ite bloc, the Islamist Alliance, whose most powerful leaders are strongly in favor of federal autonomy.

But the success of the Alliance in coming close to retaining its majority may dampen Sunni hopes of securing amendments with the help of anti-federalist Shi'ites in parliament.

A Western diplomat closely involved in Iraq's political process said Sunni ambitions may have to focus now more on influencing legislation to be enacted that will spell out exactly how autonomous regions can be established and operate.

HOSTAGE

As U.S. and Iraqi forces hunted for kidnapped American reporter Jill Carroll, Iraq's Justice Ministry said six women prisoners held by U.S. forces would be released within a week.

Carroll's abductors threatened to kill her if all women prisoners in Iraq were not freed.

A joint Iraqi-U.S. review board approved the release of the women on January 17, before the kidnappers made their demand, but U.S. officials then apparently delayed freeing them so that it did not look like they were giving in to the hostage-takers.

"They delayed their release because of the connection with the kidnapping of the American journalist," a Justice Ministry spokesman said.

Iraqi military officials said they had intelligence indicating Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the militant leader behind some of the bloodiest attacks, is in Diyala province near Baghdad.

It is not the first time Iraqi officials have said they have closed in on the elusive Zarqawi, leader of al Qaeda in Iraq.

Army posts have been notified of Zarqawi's presence in Diyala, northeast of Baghdad, where there has been a surge in violence in the past few months, the officials said. It was not known exactly where in the province he was, one official said.

Saddam Hussein may be confronted from the witness stand by former associates when his trial resumes this week but defense counsel will call for a halt after the chief judge resigned complaining of government interference.

"There will be former regime members" among witnesses appearing on several days of hearings starting on Tuesday and lasting up to three weeks, a Western diplomat closely involved in the U.S.-sponsored trial told reporters on Sunday.

Sunnis Must Have Security, Leader Says (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2006

BAGHDAD — A leader of Iraq's largest Sunni Arab political bloc said Sunday that he would shun any government that included officials responsible for police brutality against his minority sect, a stand aimed at removing the powerful Shiite interior minister.

Tariq Hashimi of the Iraqi Accordance Front spelled out its conditions for entering a "national unity" administration after most Iraqi leaders called for such an outcome in order to quell the Sunni Muslim-led insurgency.

Sunni participation in Iraq's first full-term government since the 2003 ouster of Saddam Hussein is the top U.S. diplomatic priority here. Excluding the Sunnis could doom efforts to end the fighting through political means and to reduce the number U.S. forces in Iraq.

At least 17 Iraqis died in weekend fighting, and authorities Sunday found the bodies of 29 men apparently seized by insurgents last week after they had volunteered to join the police.

Two U.S. airmen were killed and another was wounded Sunday by a roadside bomb north of Baghdad, the military announced today.

The names of the airmen, assigned to the 586th Expeditionary Mission Support Group, were being withheld pending notification of next of kin.

Talks on forming a government have intensified since Friday's release of complete but uncertified returns from the Dec. 15 parliamentary election and are expected to last at least six weeks.

The Shiite Muslim and Kurdish blocs leading the transitional government are expected to join forces in a new ruling alliance. They won 181 seats in parliament, three short of the two-thirds majority required to form a new government, but could pick up the needed seats by making deals with smaller Shiite and Kurdish groups.

Most Shiite and Kurdish leaders have endorsed the U.S. goal of broadening the government to include Sunnis, whose two main blocs got 55 seats in parliament. Such an achievement, however, would require hard compromises among Shiites, Kurds and Sunni Arabs.

"There is no preordained outcome that we're going to get a deal involving all three of these groups," said a Western diplomat monitoring the talks. "They're all saying they are willing to explore it, but success is by no means assured."

At a news conference Sunday, Hashimi said his Sunni bloc's first condition for entering the government was a guarantee of personal security for Sunnis, who he said had suffered abuse by the transitional regime's Interior Ministry police.

"We have red lines against some figures who have harmed our people," he said without naming names. "We will not allow anyone who participated in human rights violations to take any ministerial posts."

The remark was clearly aimed at Bayan Jabr, whose reputation as interior minister has been stained by allegations of torture and killings of Sunni prisoners held by the predominantly Shiite police. Jabr, a powerful figure in the ruling Shiite alliance, has denied involvement in the alleged abuses.

Hashimi did not say who should run the Interior Ministry, nor did he insist that a Sunni get the job. That left open the possibility that the Shiite alliance, which has insisted on keeping control of the ministry, could find a candidate acceptable to the Sunnis.

The Sunni leader set other terms: He demanded an end to official corruption, a "charter of honor" that renounces sectarian and ethnic strife, an agreement to set a timetable for withdrawal of U.S. forces, and a promise "not to hamper" constitutional changes demanded by Sunnis to prevent the Shiite and Kurdish regions from dominating Iraq's oil wealth.

The latter demand could be the most difficult to resolve. Abdelaziz Hakim, a powerful Shiite politician, opposes significant changes in the constitution, as do most of the Shiites elected to parliament.

Hashimi is expected to be a key player in negotiations over the coming weeks, along with President Jalal Talabani and Massoud Barzani, both Kurds, and either Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari or Vice President Adel Abdul Mehdi — whoever is chosen the Shiite alliance's candidate to lead the new government.

Before the talks can advance, officials must resolve challenges by Shiite, Kurdish and Sunni parties to the precise seat allocations announced Friday, a process that will take 10 days.

Police said the 29 bodies found Sunday were apparently those of men who had traveled in a larger group from the city of Samarra to Baghdad to join the police force. Dozens in the group were rejected, and many were abducted at insurgent roadblocks while returning home last week. Ten other bodies were found Saturday in the same area of Salahuddin province, about 40 miles north of Baghdad.

In Sunday's deadliest incident, assailants fired rocket-propelled grenades into the home of a Shiite policeman in Balad Ruz, 45 miles northeast of Baghdad, killing his brother and four of his brother's children, ages 6 to 13.

Meanwhile, the two parties of the Kurdish bloc signed an accord to create a single Kurdish government in three northern provinces, formally ending years of division and animosity that erupted in violence in the mid-1990s. The unification was aimed at bolstering the region's relative autonomy from Iraq's central government.

The accord will put Barzani's Kurdistan Democratic Party, which runs Irbil and Dahuk provinces, in charge of Sulaymaniya province as well. A representative of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan will be named to head the region's militia, and Cabinet posts will be divided.

Amid Sunni Suspicions, Iraq's Leaders Try To Find Officials Not Tied To Militias (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, January 23, 2006

BAGHDAD — As Iraq's political leaders start forming a coalition government, the naming of its interior and defense chiefs will be a key issue, a former U.S. official and an Iraqi adviser say.

The United States wants to ensure that the figures running Iraq's two main security ministries are free of ties to ethnic and religious militias, such as the Shiite Badr Brigade or Kurdish peshmerga, says Matt Sherman, former U.S. deputy chief adviser to the Interior Ministry.

“The trick will be finding an individual (without militia ties) … who has enough political influence to be effective,” Sherman says.

Iraqi election officials announced Friday that the Shiite and Kurdish coalitions won a combined 181 of the 275 seats in parliament, three shy of the two-thirds majority needed to name a new government for the next four years.

The two major Sunni blocs, the Iraqi Accordance Front and the Iraqi Front for National Dialogue, won a combined 55 seats.

Last year, the Shiite-controlled Interior Ministry was hit by allegations of torture. Bodies of prisoners, mostly Sunni, were found with their hands and legs bound, shot through the head, after having been picked up by gunmen in police uniforms. U.S. forces discovered two groups of Interior Ministry prison cells where prisoners showed signs of maltreatment.

Shiites and Kurds absorbed the brunt of repression under the rule of Saddam Hussein's Sunni government. They are wary of handing over control of the police forces, run by the Interior Ministry, says Basam Ridha, an adviser to transitional Prime Minster Ibrahim al-Jaafari, who is aligned with the largest Shiite bloc.

“There will always be accusations, especially from Sunnis,” of ties to militias, Ridha says. “There's a great deal of negotiations going on. Obviously, we'll have a say in the matter.”

DOJ_NMG_0010231

Sunni leader Tariq al-Hashimi warns that Sunni Arabs will reject any minister involved in violence against Sunnis. Bayan Jabr, Interior minister under the transitional government, has denied that his forces abused Sunni prisoners or targeted influential Sunnis for assassinations.

Militias are outlawed under an Iraqi law crafted under U.S. guidance in 2003. Many members of the armed groups, including some who fought against Saddam, have joined Iraq's uniformed government security forces but retain loyalty to their religious or ethnic sects.

Finding a leader without some connection to former militias may be a daunting task, Sherman says. “Those individuals are very limited,” he says. “There's a fine line to toe there. You don't just want a figurehead in that position.”

In Iraq on Sunday:

·Insurgents attacked the home of an Iraqi policeman with rocket-propelled grenades in Balad Ruz, 45 miles northeast of Baghdad, the Iraqi police Joint Coordination Center told the Associated Press. The officer's four children, ages 6 to 11, and their uncle were killed, the center said. The officer was unharmed.

·Police found the bullet-riddled bodies of 23 men kidnapped Wednesday after being rejected entry into a police training academy. The bodies were found partially buried in the village of Nibaei, near Dujail, about 50 miles north of Baghdad, Interior Ministry police Lt. Thair Mahmoud said.

·There was no word on the fate of American journalist Jill Carroll, kidnapped in Baghdad on Jan. 7 and last seen in a video released Jan. 17. Her kidnappers threatened to kill the 28-year-old in 72 hours unless all Iraqi female prisoners in U.S. custody were released.

Iraq's Next Big Hurdle: Unity Government (CSM)

By Charles Levinson, Correspondent Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, January 23, 2006

BAGHDAD - When Iraq's election results were released Friday, it was no surprise that religious Shiites dominated the polls.

But the hard numbers have given new steam to Iraq's politicians, who are wheeling and dealing to find enough common ground on which to build the country's first freely elected four-year government.

In a process that could stretch into April, Iraq's factions will decide on a governing program, agree on whether the new Constitution can be changed, and haggle over the crucial positions of president, prime minister, and cabinet ministers.

The Shiite alliance, with 128 of 275 seats, will dominate the talks, but its members must reach out to others to find the two-thirds majority needed to form a government. Whom they tap as allies or exclude may affect stability for years to come, experts say.

All of Iraq's politicians are touting national unity and the need for Sunni Arab participation in the government. It is widely believed to be a necessary step toward taking the steam out of a relentless insurgency.

But those politicians have very different ideas of what national unity and Sunni participation actually entails..

"There is no preordained outcome that we are actually going to get a deal involving all three of these groups," says one Western diplomat in Baghdad. "I can only tell you that they are all saying they are willing to explore it."

Shiites are insisting that the election results dictate the distribution of the spoils, meaning they should be given the majority of the cabinet posts. The Sunni Arabs are pushing for a piece of the pie that may not be justified by vote tallies alone. They hold a powerful bargaining chip: sway with the Sunni-led insurgency.

"If the country is going to be unified, then you have to take into account the armed resistance, which continues to show that it is capable of baring its teeth," says Wamidh Nadhmi, a professor of political science at Baghdad University. "Dealing with the resistance means making the Sunni politicians happy."

It's a reality that infuriates Shiites, who feel the threat of violence is compelling them to relinquish power they won fairly. If violence works for Sunni Arabs, they wonder aloud, then why should Shiites continue to show restraint?

"They can't do both at the same time, resistance and violence on one side, and playing politics on the other side. This is unacceptable," says Adel Abdel Mahdi, a powerful Shiite and a frontrunner to replace Ibrahim Jaafari as prime minister.

If current rhetoric is more than just political brinkmanship and tough talk, then Iraq's Sunni Arab and Shiite parties have seemingly irreconcilable differences on issues such as security policy, the exclusion of former Baathists from government, and amending the Constitution.

Among the principal stumbling blocks in negotiations is control of the ministries of Interior and Defense. The current minister of Interior, Bayan Jabr, essentially the country's chief law enforcement officer, is loyal to Badr, the Shiite militia aligned with the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI), the core of the Shiite political alliance.

Critics say Mr. Jabr has turned the Iraqi police force into a glorified Shiite militia that indiscriminately targets Sunni Arab neighborhoods and cities in an attempt to quash the insurgency.

"We must have the Defense and the Interior to ensure the security of our cities, and to stop the terrorizing of our supporters," says Salman al-Jumayli, a spokesperson for the Sunni Accordance Front, which has 44 seats in the coming parliament.

For Shiites such concessions are unlikely. After decades of suffering under the old regime, the recently empowered Shiites are not about to relinquish control of the ministries that were responsible for much of that oppression. "We won the elections and these ministries are our right," says Jawad al-Malaki, a leading member of the Shiite Dawa Party.

The issue of de- Baathification - a ban on former Baath Party members in government - will also figure prominently in the dealmaking. Shiites call many of the Sunni Arabs who have risen to the fore in recent months Saddamists, Baathists, and outright terrorists.

"The Shiites have turned de-Baathification into de-Sunnification," says Mr. Jumayli. "They're only targeting Sunnis and they've turned it into a weapon to get rid of all their political opponents."

Shiite unwillingness to negotiate on the issue has added to the Sunni Arabs' sense of exclusion and marginalization. It has also meant that even those posts that have gone to Sunni Arabs, such as the outgoing Ministry of Defense, have gone to Sunnis handpicked by Shiites, who are largely out of step with the majority of the country's Sunni Arabs.

What to do with the country's infant Constitution is another issue negotiators will have to address.

The drafting process and referendum on the historic charter last fall signaled a turning point in Sunni Arab willingness to engage with the political process. Their reluctant endorsement, however, came with a condition: The document could be amended at a later date to strengthen language aimed at preventing the breakup of Iraq. Earlier this month, some Shiite leaders seemed to be reneging on that agreement, calling any substantial changes to the Constitution unacceptable.

With such significant differences to overcome, many worry the Shiites will decide that a true national unity government is more trouble than it's worth, and team up with the Kurds as they did in the last government.

But even if Iraq's disparate factions find a way to put aside their differences to form an inclusive government, true national unity remains elusive, says Mohammed al-Sheikhly, president of the Center for Transitional Justice in Iraq.

"We got rid of Saddam Hussein, but now we have 40 Saddam Husseins, a bunch of political leaders with a power complex, who only want to rule. They are all hypocrites whose programs talk about national unity, and a united Iraq, but whose actions say the opposite."

At Least 23 Iraqis Die In Weekend Attacks (AP)

By Sameer N. Yacoub

The Associated Press, January 23, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Insurgents fired rocket-propelled grenades at a policeman's home northeast of Baghdad on Sunday, killing his four children and his brother and raising to at least 23 the number of Iraqis killed in attacks this weekend.

Also Sunday, police found the bullet-riddled bodies of nearly two dozen men abducted last week north of Baghdad after being rejected entry into a police academy, officials said.

The U.S. military announced Monday that a roadside bomb blast killed two U.S. airmen and wounded another Sunday near Taji, 12 miles north of Baghdad. At least 2,226 U.S. military personnel have been killed since the Iraq war began in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

The violence continued as Iraq's political parties began gearing up for talks on a new coalition government that U.S. officials hope will win the confidence of disaffected Sunni Arabs and undermine support for the insurgency. That would hasten the time when U.S. and other foreign troops can go home.

There was still no word on the fate of kidnapped American journalist Jill Carroll two days after a deadline set by her captors. They had threatened to kill the 28-year-old freelancer for The Christian Science Monitor unless all Iraqi women detainees were freed.

Iraqi officials have said they expect the Americans to free six of the nine women they are holding this week. U.S. authorities have not confirmed the claim.

The attack on the policeman's home occurred in Balad Ruz, 45 miles northeast of Baghdad, according to the Iraqi police Joint Coordination Center. The officer's four children, ages 6 to 11, and his brother were killed, the center said. The officer was unharmed, but his wife was wounded.

Sunni-led insurgents often target police as part of their campaign to try to undermine support for the U.S.-backed government.

Four policemen were killed and nine were wounded Sunday when a roadside bomb exploded near their patrol in the tense city of Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, police said. Police also said a man was gunned down at a west Baghdad gas station and another was slain in a market in the capital's Amil district.

DOJ_NMG_0010233

The bodies of the 23 men were found partially buried near Dujail, about 50 miles north of Baghdad, said Interior Ministry police Lt. Thair Mahmoud. They had been abducted Wednesday while traveling from Baghdad to their homes in Samarra after failing to be accepted at a police recruit center.

Elsewhere, the bodies of prominent Sunni Arab tribal leader, Sayid Ibrahim Ali, 75, and his 28-year-old son, Ayad, were found in a field near Hawija, 150 miles north of Baghdad, police said. They were shot as they left a funeral Saturday.

In the central city of Mashru, police found the bodies of two blindfolded men who had been shot in the head and chest.

U.S. soldiers, meanwhile, killed three gunmen firing from several cars north of Beiji, 155 miles north of Baghdad, on Saturday, the military said Sunday. Six Iraqis were detained and soldiers destroyed four cars after one was found rigged for use as a car bomb. Twelve other people were reported killed in sporadic violence on Saturday.

Nevertheless, U.S. Brig. Gen. Don Alston said insurgent attacks nationwide fell 40 percent during the week ending Saturday, compared with the previous week. Attacks in Baghdad fell 80 percent for the same period, he told reporters.

The reduction in attacks occurred as security was stepped up in Baghdad and other insurgent hotspots ahead of the announcement last Friday of the results of the Dec. 15 national elections for a new parliament. An alliance of Shiite religious parties won the biggest bloc of seats but not enough to govern without partners.

U.S. officials hope the Shiite alliance, which won 128 of the 275 seats, will include a significant number of Sunni Arabs in the new coalition. Contacts are under way among the nation's Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish politicians but the negotiations could take weeks.

Shiite leaders have said they would include Sunni Arabs if they are willing to work actively to lure fellow Sunnis away from the insurgency. Two Sunni coalitions won a total of 55 seats, far more than the 17 held by Sunnis in the outgoing parliament.

On Sunday, however, leading Sunni Arab politicians made clear they have conditions of their own, including moves away from sectarian divisions and curbs on Shiite-led government security services.

"We have `red lines' on some figures who harmed our people, and we will not allow anyone who participated in human rights violation to take any ministerial posts," Sunni politician Tariq al-Hashimi told reporters.

He appeared to be referring to Interior Minister Bayan Jabr, who is responsible for paramilitary police units accused of assassinating Sunni clerics and civilians as part of the battle against insurgents. Jabr has denied targeting innocent civilians.

Al-Hashimi said the new government must address Sunni Arab opposition to the new constitution, including provisions transforming Iraq into a federal state and purging members of Saddam Hussein's Baath party from government jobs.

But Iraq's most powerful Shiite politician, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, has said the Shiites would oppose major concessions on some key Sunni demands.

Also Sunday, a U.S. official said members of Saddam's ousted regime, including some in custody, may testify when the trial against the ex-leader and seven other defendants resumes Tuesday. The official did not identify the expected witnesses and briefed reporters on condition of anonymity due to security measures surrounding the trial.

Saddam and the others are charged in the 1982 massacre of more than 140 Shiites in Dujail following an assassination attempt against the former Iraqi leader. The official said the next session is expected to last three days.

Attacks In Iraq Jumped In 2005 Insurgents Widen Aim To Iraqi Forces (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, January 23, 2006

BAGHDAD — The number of attacks against coalition troops, Iraqi security forces and civilians increased 29% last year, and insurgents are increasingly targeting Iraqis, the U.S. military says.

Insurgents launched 34,131 attacks last year, up from 26,496 the year before, according to U.S. military figures released Sunday.

Insurgents are widening their attacks to include the expanding Iraqi forces engaged in the fighting, said Brig. Gen. Donald Alston, a coalition spokesman.

He added, “It tells me the coalition and the Iraqi forces have been very aggressive in taking the fight to the enemy.”

The number of trained and equipped Iraqi security forces has grown to 227,000. They outnumber U.S. forces in Iraq. They are often more exposed and are taking a more visible role in fighting the insurgency.

“They're easier targets,” said Andrew Krepinevich, a counterinsurgency expert at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, a Washington-based defense think tank.

In 2005, 2,713 Iraqi police and military were killed, according to the Brookings Institute, a Washington-based think tank. Similar numbers for 2004 were not available, and Iraq's government has not released comprehensive casualty numbers for Iraqi security forces. Thousands of Iraqi civilians have also been killed, but no precise tally is available.

DOJ_NMG_0010234

U.S. forces have become more effective at protecting against attacks. In 2004, 714 U.S. troops were killed in action and 673 last year, despite the increase in attacks. The number of wounded dropped 26%, from 7,990 to 5,939 during the same period.

The U.S. military attributes that to an increase in effectiveness in protecting its forces against roadside bombs and other attacks. Maj. Gen. William Webster said recently that 10% of the attacks against U.S. forces cause casualties, down from about 25%-30% a year ago.

The new statistics show:

·The number of car bombs more than doubled to 873 last year from 420 the year before. The number of suicide car bombs went to 411 from 133.

· Sixty-seven attackers wore suicide vests last year, up from seven in 2004. Suicide and car bombs are often targeted at Iraqis, causing high casualties.

·Roadside bombs, or improvised explosive devices, as the military calls them, continue to be the most common weapon. Roadside bombs increased to 10,953 in 2005 from 5,607 the year before. Those numbers include roadside bombs that are discovered and defused. These bombs account for nearly one-third of all insurgent attacks.

Professionals Fleeing Iraq As Violence, Threats Persist (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The office of Iraq's most eminent cardiologist is padlocked. A handwritten sign is taped on his wooden door in the private clinic in Baghdad: Patients of Dr. Omar Kubasi should call him in Amman, Jordan.

There, Kubasi, 63, spends his days sitting at a cafe with other physicians and professionals from Iraq. Frustrated, he watches from afar as the medical education system he helped set up during his 36-year career slowly disintegrates. His teaching doctors are fleeing the country in fear. Younger physicians are looking for other countries to train in. Even patients are leaving, no longer confident in the care they can get in Iraq.

"I think it's part of the plan for the country's destruction," Kubasi said by telephone. "The situation in the last six months has gotten so bad, we couldn't continue."

Kubasi left Baghdad in May after he and nine other doctors received letters, written in a childish hand, telling them they would be killed if they did not stop working in their native Iraq. He and his colleagues had been the objects of threats before, but the last carried a foreboding urgency, he said.

Iraq's top professionals -- doctors, lawyers, professors -- and businessmen have been targeted by shadowy political groups for kidnapping and ransom, as well as murder, some of them say. So many have fled the country that Iraq is in danger of losing the core of skilled people it needs most just as it is trying to build a newly independent society.

"It's creating a brain drain," said Amer Hassan Fayed, assistant dean of political science at Baghdad University. "We could end up with a society without knowledge. How can such a society make progress?"

Professionals and businessmen with the means to escape are going to Jordan, Syria, Egypt or, if they have visas, to Western countries. Those left behind say they feel abandoned.

Ahmed Meer Ali, a 27-year-old resident doctor, is left alone to man the private hospital where Kubasi's office is locked and shuttered. Most of the specialists who worked there, providing care to patients and guidance to Ali, have left.

"They are the ones with specialties from England or the U.S.A. They were the ones teaching me," he said. "Now, some patients even go to Iran to get care. In the past, no one in Iraq would go to Iran."

And many educated young Iraqis are hoping to follow.

"Of course I would leave if I could," said Ihana Nabil, 22, who will soon graduate from Baghdad University with a degree in political science. "There's no peace, no stability and no jobs here," she said. Other students at the campus, a temporary oasis in a violent city, agreed.

Exodus is not new to the country. Iraqis who could flee Saddam Hussein's repressive rule did: Poor Shiite Muslims sneaked across the border into Iran, and Sunni Arabs crossed the mountains into Syria or the desert to Jordan. People often waited years for permission to attend a seminar or do business in another country and then would disappear there. Hussein began holding such people's families hostage to guarantee their return.

Many of those émigrés flooded back into Iraq when Hussein fell. But the country's instability and daily regimen of violence have made some reconsider their return. Others who stayed throughout Hussein's rule are finally saying goodbye to their homeland now.

Numbers are impossible to document, partly because those who leave often tell passport officials they are going out of the country for a short visit. Often without telling friends or neighbors, they take a few things from their homes, lock the doors and vanish.

An official at the Interior Ministry's statistics office said the number of Iraqis traveling overland to Jordan held steady at about 200 to 250 a day from July 2004 to June 2005. Since last July, however, the number crossing the border -- excluding truckers and traders -- has ballooned to 1,100 a day, according to the official.

"They may come back if it's safe," Fayed said.

Or they may not. Since the fall of Hussein, kidnapping has mushroomed into a lucrative business. Even children are snatched, to be ransomed the same day for a few hundred dollars from their distraught parents.

Anyone displaying signs of wealth, often professionals and businessmen, are particular targets of kidnappers in search of high ransoms. However, payment is no guarantee a hostage will not simply be killed and dumped; some authorities claim dozens of bodies are found every day but never reported.

That danger is overlaid by the activities of an insurgency that aims to terrify the society by means of bombings, murder and abduction -- or threats. In addition, the death toll from sectarian violence among Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds has climbed steadily.

"Professors have been threatened. Doctors have been killed in their clinics. Killing has become common," Fayed said. "Some people believe this is intentional, to try to empty Iraq of its elite."

Kubasi, the former head of Iraq's military medical corps, believes that. In late April, his secretary handed him a letter written in what he called "bad Arabic" giving them all by May 6 -- 10 days -- to leave the country. He showed the letter to authorities, who suggested he had faked it. By May 8, Kubasi was in Jordan.

His three sons and his daughter are all physicians. They could not risk staying, he said.

"Every day, we sit here, 10 or 12 of us, senior professionals, just discussing the situation," Kubasi said from Amman. "It's mental death to sit here. But even my patients say I should not come back. Really, really, I could not pay for a kidnapper's ransom. And in that case, you would be killed."

It frustrates him to watch the medical training system he helped create fall apart. "The circuit of teaching, training and care is being broken. It may not be recovered," he said.

"Our medical schools and doctors are known all over the Arab world. The teaching care was excellent, based on the British system. We were successful under Saddam Hussein to start our own postgraduate studies, including many medical specialties. Now they are ridding the country of all of this."

Um Mustafa and her husband, a businessman, had hoped to stay. But they abandoned that goal when thieves burst into their bedroom, held their young son in a headlock, with a gun to his head, and demanded that his parents hand over all their gold and jewelry.

"We didn't want to leave," said Um Mustafa, 27, who still fears attack and asked not to be fully identified. "We were a very happy family. Wealthy. My husband had a good job. We had money, a house, car and servants."

The men terrorized the family for more than two hours, threatening to kill or kidnap their 6-year-old son, while their 2-year-old cried. They beat Um Mustafa's husband, finally leaving when they were satisfied they had found all the jewelry, guns and money in the house. They left the couple bound with plastic handcuffs and locked in a room, saying they would burn the house as they left.

"Maybe God wanted to give us a new life," Um Mustafa said. "They didn't kill us."

She and her husband decided to move to Jordan. But they heard that Jordanian authorities, worried about the influx, were making life more difficult for Iraqis there. So they have bought tickets to Cairo instead.

"We don't know how we will live there. My husband will have to find a new job. I will go to work," she said. "Leaving the country was not an easy decision. Any time you start a new life, it's very difficult. But it will be better than staying here in a country were there is no safety anymore.

"I've been through four wars. I never, never felt like leaving before," Um Mustafa said. "Now, life in Iraq has become unsafe. I don't feel safe in my own bedroom -- or in the whole country."

Contractors Leaving Iraq (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, January 23, 2006

U.S. private contractors, until now the biggest private-sector employers in Iraq, are preparing to leave as U.S. money runs out and Iraqi ministries take charge of the reconstruction effort.

"We are drawing down," said Ken Oscar, Fluor Corp.'s vice president for strategy. "We are not done by any stretch of the imagination, but we are drawing down."

DOJ_NMG_0010236

The engineering and construction giant at one time had 250 to 300 people from the United States in Iraq, and employed roughly 20,000 Iraqis.

Now, as the U.S.-funded part of the reconstruction effort comes to a close, Fluor has, perhaps, 100 Americans left in the country and is phasing out the Iraqi jobs.

"The net [result] is a lot less employment for Iraqis," Mr. Oscar said, even though much work remains to be done.

Most U.S.-funded projects are scheduled to be completed by the end of this year, and it is unlikely that any significant new U.S. funds will be forthcoming. Iraqi government ministries, which will be taking over responsibility for the reconstruction effort, tend to issue much smaller contracts that do not interest large U.S. companies.

"Congress has made it clear that it will not provide any more money," said retired Col. Paul Hughes of the United States Institute of Peace. "Those [companies] with existing contracts will fulfill those, while hoping for new funding sources from the international community."

The World Bank said in 2003 that it would take $56 billion to rebuild Iraq's infrastructure. The United States appropriated $18.7 billion toward the effort, much of which has been allotted to specific projects.

The non-U.S. donor community pledged $13.5 billion to help restore Iraq, but few countries are willing to fulfill their pledges amid a raging insurgency and perceived political instability. About $1 billion of that money has been disbursed.

"It takes time to do these things," Mr. Oscar said. "We got rid of their bad government, put them on their way to democracy and jump-started their infrastructure. Can [the Iraqis] pick it up from there? I don't know."

About 3,500 megawatts of electricity have been put online at a cost of $4 billion, Mr. Oscar said, but much of the work has been stopgap, such as refurbishing older plants rather than building modern ones.

"When summer comes, there may be serious power shortages," he said.

Fluor's experience is typical of the large U.S. contractors in the country. They did as much as they could given the security situation -- which absorbed 20 percent of the $18.7 billion -- and the time has come to leave.

"We are not here to rebuild the country," said Brig. Gen. William McCoy, the Army Corps of Engineers commander overseeing the work. "We are here to give Iraq a jump-start."

Some contractors say privately that they do not want to deal with the Iraqi government and that, without the protection and support of the U.S. military, it is simply not safe to work in Iraq.

"The only ones left are the ones who want to work for the [Iraqi] ministries, and there are not many of those because they are so corrupt," said Charles D. Hartman, chairman of the construction and energy committee of the Turkish-U.S. Business Council.

"None of my people are there," said Mr. Hartman, who also consults for a large Turkish company. "None of the big construction groups are down there."

Just last week, fatal attacks were launched against U.S. and Iraqi personal security details in Baghdad and in the southern city of Basra.

Nine bodyguards escorting an engineer working for the Orascom cell-phone company were killed in an ambush in Baghdad on Wednesday, unable to protect their client, who was kidnapped, a physician at the scene told The Washington Times.

The same day, a convoy carrying U.S. civilian security personnel in Basra was hit by a roadside bomb, killing two passengers and seriously wounding a third, the U.S. Embassy reported.

Former Abu Ghraib Guard Calls Top Brass Culpable For Abuse (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

Stepping into the Abu Ghraib prison for the first time, Megan Ambuhl was stunned. There were naked men in dusty cells, male prisoners wearing women's underwear, others hooded and shackled in contorted positions to metal railings.

An enlisted officer giving her a tour of the U.S. facility in October 2003 pointed to a group of detainees chained to a cell. He said the bars had often "been decorated like a Christmas tree," with prisoners as ornaments.

"He explained it was a military intelligence tactic," Ambuhl said in a recent interview, speaking publicly for the first time since the Abu Ghraib prison abuse was disclosed nearly two years ago. "He said it was to break the detainees that were being interrogated. It was clear it was a military intelligence facility. As I saw it, I thought that if they were doing it, it must be all right for them to be doing it."

One of the original seven military police soldiers singled out by the Pentagon for their roles in abusive techniques, Ambuhl is speaking out because she believes the truth has been obscured by high-ranking officials intent on covering up a policy of abuse. Though her defense differs little from the arguments made previously by the defendants' attorneys, Ambuhl's first-person description of the macabre world of Abu Ghraib provides a vivid perspective on how things went out of control at the prison outside of Baghdad, a place where there were few rules and little guidance. Her account also shows that some of the abusive tactics were in place when the MPs arrived at the prison.

Ambuhl has since married one of her fellow MPs -- Charles A. Graner Jr., the man the military has labeled the ringleader of the abusers -- and is on a mission to secure his release from prison.

Now out of the Army, punished with a reduction in rank and a fine for dereliction of duty but no prison time, Ambuhl says the military's top brass have dodged responsibility for what was going on at the prison by scapegoating her and other low-ranking soldiers.

By the time of her tour in 2003, Ambuhl had been in the Army reserves for about a year. She realized she was walking into something she clearly did not understand. Her unit, the 372nd Military Police Company, had been trained to do combat support jobs, not detention. She was ordered to work the night shift and said she asked few questions because she did not know what questions to ask.

Ambuhl says she and other MPs used aggressive techniques against detainees because that is what military intelligence soldiers and civilian interrogators told her to do.

She described a "roster board" that included which military intelligence "treatment" to give to certain detainees and said trainers from the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, taught the MPs how to put detainees in "stress positions." She said military intelligence officials told them to keep detainees naked, embarrass them or make them exercise until they reached exhaustion.

"We were told to handcuff people in uncomfortable positions, to put people on [Meals Ready to Eat] boxes, to pour cold water on them, to make them do physical training," said Ambuhl, who worked the night shift on Tier 1B. "We did what we were told to do."

That defense has not worked well for several of the MPs charged with abuse, most notably Graner, who worked the night shift on Tier 1A, alongside Ambuhl. Graner is serving a 10-year sentence at Fort Leavenworth, Kan.

Ambuhl married Graner last April after his conviction, sending marriage documents to him to sign in prison. The Army has prevented them from meeting or even speaking, alleging that they are co-conspirators.

Ambuhl knows that many people consider him a monster but says that is because the military has done an effective job of painting him as a ringleader and because people do not know him.

"I love being around him," said Ambuhl, 31, of Centreville, who has taken Graner's last name. Their relationship developed while the two were marooned for months at a base in Baghdad after the abuse was discovered and after Graner's relationship with Lynndie R. England, another MP serving a prison sentence for abuse, had ended. "We understand each other. I put my life in his hands day in and day out, and there isn't anyone I'd rather trust with my life, knowing everything I know."

Now back in her job as a histology lab technician, Ambuhl is determined to tell the public her version of events to free Graner. She has built a Web site, which includes documents and discussion, at http://www.supportmpscapegoats.com , where she also has a petition on Graner's behalf.

Military officials "have been trying to conceal that it was a policy that spiraled out of control," Ambuhl said, a rare moment of anger rising in her voice. "They made us out to be the cause of every ill in Iraq."

Paul Boyce, an Army spokesman, said there have been more than 500 investigations into allegations of detainee mistreatment and that the Army is taking each allegation seriously.

"Thus far, allegations against more than 251 military members have been addressed in courts-martial, non-judicial punishment and other adverse administrative actions," Boyce said.

It was in early October 2003 that Ambuhl's unit made its way to Abu Ghraib from an assignment in Hilla, Iraq, where it conducted neighborhood searches for insurgents in what the military calls "law-and-order missions." Ambuhl, a Humvee driver in Hilla, said she received no training in dealing with enemy prisoners of war, was never specifically instructed about the Geneva Conventions and was presented with no standard operating procedures for the prison. In the middle of a war, a world away from Northern Virginia, Ambuhl did not question her superiors.

Ivan L. "Chip" Frederick II, who worked in the prison's higher security facility -- called the "hard site" -- and was also convicted of abusing prisoners, told investigators after his conviction that he, too, was shown the aggressive tactics on his first tour of the prison.

"He didn't say anything about the detainees, how to treat them, etc., but when we went in 1A, I did see detainees handcuffed to the bars and naked," according to Frederick's sworn statement. "I asked him about it and he told me MI ran the section, they didn't want the detainees talking to one another and that was their punishment."

Ambuhl's unit arrived just weeks after Maj. Gen. Geoffrey D. Miller, then Guantanamo Bay's commander, made a visit to Iraq to help set up the Abu Ghraib operation. She said some of the tactics her unit employed -- such as stress positions, the use of dogs, and nudity -- came from teams Miller later sent over. Pentagon investigations have shown that such tactics were in use on high-value detainees held in Cuba almost a year earlier, but also determined that there was no policy of abuse.

Pentagon and Army officials have argued that the abuse at Abu Ghraib was isolated to a few individuals who decided to break the rules.

Ambuhl said some of the images seen in the photos depicted events that occurred every day.

"At the very least, there were a whole slew of people who knew about it," Ambuhl said. "These pictures were in no way hidden. We didn't sneak around pretending this wasn't going on."

Members of Other Government Agencies (OGA) -- a euphemism for the CIA -- were all over the hard site, keeping as many as 100 detainees there for interrogations. Once, two men with OGA had finished interrogating a detainee in a shower room and asked her to go get him.

"They said it would be funny if I burned him with my cigarette," Ambuhl said, adding that she tossed her cigarette before releasing the detainee, who was shackled to a window.

She said in hindsight she should have intervened.

"None of us were in the right frame of mind to get help for this situation," she said. "This was the norm. We didn't know any different. Maybe that's why they sent a combat support unit to do it. We wouldn't know how it was supposed to work, and we wouldn't question it.

"I wish I had done more to stop it," she said.

A Rebel Crack-Up? (TIME)

By tim mcGirk

Time, January 23, 2006

Even by the standards of al-Qaeda in Iraq, the suicide bombing in Ramadi on Jan. 5 was stunning for its audacity. The bomber had blended into the ranks of Iraqi police recruits outside the Ramadi Glass and Ceramics Works before blowing up his explosive vest, loaded with ball bearings for maximum devastation. The blast killed two U.S. service members and more than 70 Iraqi police recruits--but it also turned out to be a deadly miscalculation by the jihadis and their leader, Abu Mousab al-Zarqawi. Most of the victims were local Sunnis, and they were joining the police force under the protection of tribal chieftains who, with the U.S. military's approval, are trying to impose order over their violent swath of Iraq. After the Jan. 5 blast, according to insurgents, tribal chiefs in Ramadi notified al-Qaeda that they were withdrawing protection in the city for the group's fighters. The jihadis responded by gunning down several prominent Sunni clerics and tribal leaders. Now al-Qaeda fighters who once swaggered through Ramadi are marked men. "It's war," says an Iraqi intelligence officer with contacts among the insurgents.

For months, U.S. officials in Iraq have tried to exploit growing differences over tactics and aims among factions of the insurgency, a push first detailed by TIME in December. Although reports of clashes between Iraqi nationalist groups and religious extremists linked to al-Qaeda remain difficult to quantify, there are signs that at least in some parts of Iraq, the tension is boiling over. Iraqi security sources with contacts in the insurgency told TIME that fighting has erupted in several cities that have long been bastions of the resistance, including Fallujah, Samarra, Latifiya and Mahmoudiya. In one recent incident, according to an Iraqi security source, insurgents wounded a Palestinian member of al-Qaeda, tracked him to a Baghdad hospital and then kidnapped him from his bed and handed him over to U.S. forces. Some Pentagon decision makers believe that the feuding within the insurgency may help U.S. and Iraqi troops quell the terrorist attacks that have made parts of the country ungovernable. "We're starting to see a little bit more every day," says Army Lieut. General Ray Odierno, assistant to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. In places like Ramadi and Fallujah, Odierno says, "we've had some Iraqi insurgents' groups actually put up defenses to protect their people against al-Qaeda forces."

What's behind the rift? Even though some Iraqi insurgent groups have cooperated with jihadist fighters to battle U.S. troops, insurgent leaders say they have grown sick of al-Qaeda's killing innocent Iraqi Shi'ites, whom al-Zarqawi considers infidels. Cracks in al-Qaeda's alliance with the Iraqi groups became more pronounced after the Dec. 15 election. Al-Zarqawi saw the poll as a detour from his goal of turning Iraq into a base from which al-Qaeda could spread terrorism throughout the Middle East and Europe. Many Sunni resistance groups have a narrower focus: ridding Iraq of all occupation forces--U.S. troops and the pro-Iranian militias that slipped across the border. Sunni politicians managed to convince some key rebel groups that unless the Sunni minority voted, the elections would enhance the power of Kurdish and religious Shi'ite parties, some of which have ties to Iran. (Election results released last week showed that Sunni Arab parties will hold 55 seats in the new parliament, up from 17 in the previous one.) Abu Noor al-Iraqi, a leader of the Unified Leadership of Mujahedin, a new amalgam of four nationalist guerrilla outfits, tells TIME that "when al-Zarqawi's group threatened to attack the polling centers, we stood against them."

Since then, the fissures between the nationalists and al-Zarqawi have widened. U.S. political and military officers persuaded some Sunni tribal chiefs to send their youths into the security forces to ensure that Sunnisnot Shi'ite outsiders--would command their cities' police. But in recent meetings with various insurgent groups, says a nationalist field commander near Ramadi, al-Zarqawi's lieutenants made it clear that any Iraqi who joined the security forces was considered the enemy, thus drawing a battle line between the jihadis and their former comrades. In Latifiya, outside Baghdad, al-Zarqawi's fighters pressed Sunnis to desert a mixed Sunni-Shi'ite battalion under U.S. command. When the Sunnis refused, al-Qaeda shelled the camp with mortars. Local insurgents responded by hunting down al-Qaeda's chief for southern Baghdad and killing him and four Syrian fighters.

Al-Zarqawi's men, though, have shown few signs of backing down. In Latifiya last week, al-Qaeda fighters captured and murdered five members of the nationalist Islamic Army in Iraq and assassinated a Sunni colonel. After the backlash in Ramadi, al-Zarqawi's men supposedly retreated into the rocky western deserts but have continued to target local leaders. A senior security officer says jihadist fighters followed a Ramadi chieftain from the powerful Dulaimi tribe into Baghdad on Wednesday; handcuffed him, a nephew and a senior security officer for the western provinces; and executed each of them with a bullet through the head. In Samarra members of the Alboubaz tribe killed four foreign fighters and drove out 11 others after the assassination of a local police chief. After the tribesmen urged Sunni youths to join the local police, al-Zarqawi got his revenge. The instructors weren't going to make the same mistake they had made in Ramadi by allowing recruits to become an easy target for a suicide bomber, so they had them sign up in Baghdad. But al-Zarqawi's men were tipped off. Al-Qaeda ambushed the Sunnis' bus on the road and kidnapped the recruits. Their bodies have yet to be found.

Such clashes don't spell the end of the insurgency. U.S. officials believe that even if terrorist attacks subsided, many Sunni insurgents would continue attacking U.S. and Iraqi forces if they felt their interests were being shortchanged by a Shi'ite-led government in Baghdad. U.S. Senator Jack Reed, who was briefed on the insurgency during a visit to Iraq earlier this month, cautions against giddiness at reports of a backlash against al-Qaeda. "The center of mass of the insurgency is not the foreign terrorists," the Rhode Island Democrat told TIME. "They're a small band able to create spectacular attacks. But the real long-term danger is the Sunnis continuing to fight." The U.S. is still a long way from persuading them to stop.

Baghdad's Big Oil Bust (NSWK)

By Scott Johnson And Michael Hastings

Newsweek, January 23, 2006

Guarding the Fatah oil refinery used to be a pretty straightforward job for Saif Mohammed. Insurgents hit only sporadically, and usually missed important targets. But by early last year, attackers were using rocket-propelled grenades, mortars and heavy machine guns in brazen daylight assaults. They seemed to know about everything and everybody in the refinery. Ambushes were common. "We were afraid to even take vacation and go home," says 26-year-old Mohammed. "The people who worked with us used to tip off the fighters. They wanted to play both sides—to keep their jobs and be informants for the terrorists."

When insurgents killed the man Mohammed shared guard duty with last April, then threatened Mohammed with the same, he quit. In the past year, there have been close to 20 large-scale assaults on Fatah, part of Iraq's largest oil-production complex in Bayji. Last month the Bayji site shut down completely for two weeks. It re-opened with the New Year, but three days later insurgents pinned down a 60-truck fuel convoy in an hourlong gun battle. Across the country, there's a major attack on oil facilities about once every three days. December was the third month in a row that Iraqi oil production went down, and it marked the lowest level of exports since the invasion. At a time when global supplies are stretched to their limits, the Iraqi oil bust helps keep world prices near record highs. But most of all, it's a disaster for efforts to get the country back on its feet.

Only three years ago, before the United States led the invasion of Iraq, the Bush administration dreamed of liberating the country on the cheap. Billions in untapped oil reserves were going to pay for reconstruction and nation-building. But hundreds of billions of American tax dollars later, Iraq's oil still isn't flowing at prewar levels. And in a country where 90 percent of the government's $35 billon in revenues comes from petroleum, the old promise has come to seem a curse. "Some people wish we didn't have all this oil," says National Assembly Speaker Hajim al-Hassani, "because it has brought us all these problems."

What happened? There's certainly no question that the Bush administration, heavily peopled with veterans of the oil industry, focused on the importance of petroleum to Iraq's economy. Even as the rest of Baghdad was opened up to looters in April 2003, the Ministry of Oil was secured by U.S. troops. But no force was put in place to protect the pumps and pipes. In August 2003, the Americans awarded $40 million to a private security firm for the training of 5,500 Iraqis. But the program was quickly terminated as too expensive, say U.S. officials. Then the American military took responsibility for the Oil Protection Force, but guards were never deployed to cover 4,350 miles of pipeline. Finally, last summer, a new 4,000-man unit called the Strategic Infrastructure Battalions started training. But the SIBs quickly fell into bureaucratic cracks. "The ministers have had the hardest time figuring out who the SIBs even work for," says Brig. Gen. William H. McCoy, commander of the Army Corps of Engineers in Baghdad.

Washington has allocated $1.7 billion to finance oil projects across the country, but only $77 million worth of reconstruction has been completed. Oil Minister Ibrahim Mohammed Bahar al-Aloum says U.S confusion and incompetence has kept the work tangled in red tape. "Most of these projects were supposed to be done last year," Bahar al-Aloum told NEWSWEEK. "If U.S. money had been made available, Iraqis could have done the job faster." Yet the United States has signaled it no longer wants to be the principal donor. Other foreign investors are biding their time, hoping some sort of peace can be restored. For workers worried about ambushes, such notions seem lost in a distant future.

U.S. Army Officer Convicted In Death Of Iraqi Detainee (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

An Army interrogator who stuffed an uncooperative Iraqi general into a sleeping bag during questioning in northern Iraq in 2003 was convicted of negligent homicide and negligent dereliction of duty late Saturday after a military jury in Colorado decided the general's death was not murder.

Chief Warrant Officer Lewis E. Welshofer Jr., 43, was on trial for allegedly killing Iraqi Maj. Gen. Abed Hamed Mowhoush, a high-ranking Saddam Hussein loyalist who was believed to have been fueling the Iraqi insurgency in the Qaim area near the Syrian border. Mowhoush died while bound in the Army sleeping bag, which was part of an aggressive interrogation tactic aimed at getting the general to talk.

During his week-long court-martial in Colorado Springs, Welshofer testified that he used the sleeping bag after other attempts to elicit information from Mowhoush failed, and that he believed the "claustrophobic" technique had been approved by his commanders as a "stress position," according to reports by the Associated Press and trial observers with Human Rights First.

Welshofer's supervisor, Army Maj. Jessica Voss, testified that she approved the use of the sleeping bag but was unaware that Welshofer would bind the general with a cord or straddle his chest while questioning him.

Mowhoush, who the Army believed had met with Hussein after the United States invaded Iraq and who had allegedly financed insurgent attacks, was a huge catch for U.S. troops in November 2003. But he proved to be very stubborn, and several attempts over two weeks of interrogations at a facility known as the "Blacksmith Hotel" yielded little information.

According to court testimony and classified accounts of his treatment obtained by The Washington Post, Mowhoush was subjected to harsh beatings by a secret group of Iraqi paramilitaries, code-named Scorpions, who worked with the CIA. One witness who testified behind a curtain during Welshofer's trial was accidentally identified as having worked with the CIA, and witnesses also described how Mowhoush was beaten so badly by the Iraqi natives that he had a hard time breathing and could not walk on his own.

The case not only exposed the secret CIA group but also revealed how U.S. officials were giving unclear guidance regarding interrogation methods during a frustrating part of the war, including at least one message from Baghdad telling interrogators that the "gloves are coming off" and asking for interrogation-technique wish lists. The sleeping-bag technique was one Welshofer wanted to use and for which he sought approval.

"What he was doing he was doing in the open, and he was doing it because he believed the information in fact would save lives," said Frank Spinner, Welshofer's civilian defense attorney, according to the AP. Spinner added that he was disappointed with the verdict. "The verdict recognizes the context in which these events took place. It was a very difficult time in Iraq. There was confusion, and they were not getting clear guidance from headquarters."

David Danzig, manager of Human Rights First's "End Torture Now" campaign and a trial observer, wrote in a daily court-martial blog that Welshofer was trying to sort out guidance from superiors in Baghdad while coming up with interrogation tactics that went beyond outdated Cold War thinking.

"They recognized that what we practiced in the schoolhouse was not working," Danzig quoted Welshofer's testimony. "They were looking for ideas outside the box."

That Welshofer was spared a murder conviction -- and a potential life sentence -- indicates that the jury believed Welshofer did not try kill Mowhoush, but that he should have known the tactic he used could lead to death. Mowhoush stopped breathing during the interrogation, and attempts to revive him failed. The negligent-homicide conviction could result in a maximum three-year prison sentence, and the negligent-dereliction-of-duty conviction an additional three months. Sentencing hearings are to begin today.

Maj. Tiernan Dolan, who prosecuted the case, said that the treatment Welshofer imposed on Mowhoush "could fairly be described as torture" and that he "treated that general worse than you would treat a dog," knowing that he had an obligation to treat the detainee humanely, the AP reported.

Chief Warrant Officer Jefferson L. Williams, an intelligence analyst, and Spec. Jerry L. Loper, a guard, had murder charges against them dropped and received immunity to testify against Welshofer. A fourth soldier, Sgt. 1st Class William Sommer, also had a murder charge dropped and faces possible administrative punishment. All three were present during the interrogation that led to Mowhoush's death.

Interrogator Convicted In Iraqi's Death (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 22, 2006

FT. CARSON, Colo. — A military jury late Saturday convicted an Army interrogator of negligent homicide in the death of an Iraqi general who had been stuffed face-first into a sleeping bag.

After seven hours of deliberations, the six-officer panel found Chief Warrant Officer Lewis E. Welshofer Jr. guilty of the charge, which carries a maximum sentence of three years in military prison. Had he been convicted of murder, he could have been given a life sentence.

The panel also found Welshofer guilty of dereliction of duty.

Welshofer, 43, is the highest-ranking officer tried on murder charges in a case of detainee abuse in the Bush administration's war on terrorism, human rights monitors say.

Welshofer stood mute in his dark-green uniform as he listened to the verdict, swallowing silently.

Prosecutors left the courtroom without commenting, forbidden from talking to reporters by their superiors. Defense attorney Frank Spinner said: "I think the verdict recognizes the context in which these events took place. It was a very difficult time in Iraq."

The verdict in the court-martial came hours after Spinner contended that the interrogator had been heeding an August 2003 e-mail from the office of the U.S. commander in Iraq.

The e-mail cited by the defense, from Capt. William Ponce, said: "The gloves are coming off, gentlemen…. We want these individuals broken. Casualties are mounting."

In a reply to the e-mail, Welshofer wrote that the military needed to loosen its standards, which he said were more useful during World War II. "Today's enemies, especially in southwest Asia, understand force, not … mind games."

Welshofer was rebuked for suggesting violations of the Geneva Convention. But two weeks later, a Sept. 10 memo from the top commander in Iraq authorized several new interrogation techniques, including one that Welshofer says gave him permission to stuff Maj. Gen. Abed Hamed Mowhoush into the sleeping bag, bind him with an electrical cord, straddle his chest and occasionally cover his mouth.

Mowhoush, 57, who had been brutally beaten two days earlier — allegedly by CIA contractors — died in the bag, in a prison in the Iraqi border town of Qaim. The prosecution contended he suffocated; the defense argued he died of a heart attack.

"An interrogator's job, when you're told to take the gloves off and you have techniques called 'Fear Up, Harsh' … is to make the detainee uncomfortable," said Spinner, referring to techniques detailed in the Sept. 10 memo. "Your job is to put [the detainee] under stress."

That does not mean jettisoning decades of standards, countered the lead prosecutor, Maj. Tiernan Dolan. "This case … has been about our officer corps' need to maintain the high ground, especially in a country like Iraq, where our presence may be resented," he told the military panel. "If we can't set an example under harsh circumstances, we'll no longer be who we are."

Saturday's closing arguments encapsulated a debate since the Sept. 11 attacks over how to treat an enemy that does not follow the regular rules of war.

Mowhoush, once a confidant of Saddam Hussein, allegedly was leading the growing insurgency in western Iraq when he surrendered to U.S. forces in November 2003.

Shadowing the closing arguments was the CIA's role in Mowhoush's interrogations.

Welshofer had interrogated the general several times, once slapping him in the chest, before the interviews turned markedly more violent, according to witnesses at the trial. Iraqi nationals apparently in the employ of the CIA entered the interrogation room Nov. 24 and beat Mowhoush for 30 minutes with rubber hoses and insulation.

Welshofer said he did not control that session, but other witnesses testified that he seemed to be directing the questioning. Mowhoush had to be carried back to his cell.

The next day, Welshofer's team took Mowhoush to the prison roof and pinned him down while the lead interrogator poured water on his face, according to multiple witnesses. Welshofer and another interrogator also repeatedly hit the general's elbows — an action Welshofer has characterized as more like tapping, saying it was intended to be an annoyance.

That night, according to a witness who testified from behind a green tarp, Welshofer talked about the latest regulations from Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez, then U.S. commander in Baghdad. The witness, whom an attorney inadvertently implied worked for the CIA, said that Welshofer said "he was pretty sure they were breaking those rules every day."

The next morning, Mowhoush was stuffed into the sleeping bag, and soon died.

DOJ_NMG_0010242

Though court rules forbade anyone from naming the CIA during the trial, Spinner questioned why "civilian interrogators" who presided over a beating were not being prosecuted. "How is it that this … witness is so concerned about the Army applying their rules when we know his own organization was so flagrantly violating the rules?" Spinner said.

Spinner also scoffed at criticism of his client's tactics.

"We're putting interrogators on the front line, and even as people are dying, we are saying, 'Get that info,' " Spinner said, but " 'if there are gray areas, back off; take the easy right [action].' And so what if a few more U.S. soldiers die?"

Dolan replied that the urgency of the situation in Iraq did not give Welshofer permission to violate the law. "Because the need for intelligence was so great and soldiers are dying, we should abandon our values?" he asked rhetorically. "That ain't the law and that isn't what makes us what we are. We're a nation of laws."

The sleeping-bag technique had been approved by Welshofer's supervisor, but he said he had not told her that he sat on detainees' chests or occasionally covered their mouths to prevent them from talking over his questions.

He said he'd used the technique a dozen to two dozen times in Iraq.

Dolan said the fact that Welshofer had not told his supervisor all of the details of the sleeping-bag technique showed he had been trying to conceal illegal behavior. The prosecutor called the method "the most dangerous technique in [Welshofer's] bag of unauthorized tricks and techniques."

Dolan emphasized the testimony of two witnesses that the general had stilled for several minutes with Welshofer straddling him, and that Welshofer then stood. The witnesses said that the general gasped as if he had been drowning and that Welshofer expressed relief that he had not died, then flipped him over and sat on his back.

Welshofer denied their account.

The judge, Col. Mark Toole, instructed the jury that even if Welshofer believed the sleeping-bag technique was permitted, that did not clear him of criminal responsibility.

"Authority to use certain interrogation techniques does not justify or make lawful a death," he said. "The killing of a detainee during interrogation is never justified."

David Danziger of Human Rights First, a New York-based group that observed the trial, said the case demonstrated broader problems. "I think it's shocking what Chief Welshofer did, and I think it's shocking what was authorized," he said. "The Army, Sanchez and others opened the door to these abuses by putting out guidance that changed a lot, was unclear and didn't serve the soldiers in the field."

Welshofer's sentencing is expected Monday.

Army Interrogator Is Convicted Of Negligent Homicide (NYT)

By Eric Schmitt

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 - A senior Army interrogator was convicted late Saturday of negligent homicide in the death of an Iraqi general after he shoved the general head-first into a sleeping bag, sat on his chest and put his hands over his mouth.

A six-officer jury at Fort Carson, Colo., found the interrogator, Chief Warrant Officer Lewis E. Welshofer Jr., guilty of the charge, which carries a maximum sentence of three years in a military prison. He was also found guilty of negligent dereliction of duty. He was acquitted of murder and assault charges. Sentencing is scheduled for Monday.

Army prosecutors contended that Mr. Welshofer, 43, a chief interrogator with the Third Armored Cavalry Regiment in Qaim, Iraq, suffocated Maj. Gen. Abed Hamed Mowhoush after wrapping him in the sleeping bag and sitting on him during an interrogation session on Nov. 26, 2003. Prosecutors said Mr. Welshofer knew his interrogation techniques were potentially lethal and against Army standards.

Defense lawyers countered that Mr. Welshofer, a 19-year Army veteran, did nothing illegal and was using a technique that his commander had approved for use on uncooperative prisoners. They also said that General Mowhoush, 57, whom the lawyers said weighed more than 250 pounds, died from an irregular heart rhythm caused by heart disease and stress.

The widely publicized incident has drawn attention from human rights groups as one of the worst instances of abuse against detainees in American custody in Iraq, and because General Mowhoush had been beaten shortly before his death by a team that included one or more C.I.A. contract workers.

The case also underscores the confusion among military interrogators and their superiors over the use of aggressive interrogation techniques in the summer and fall of 2003, when the insurgency in Iraq was rapidly gaining momentum and ferocity, and top Pentagon officials and commanders in Iraq were demanding better intelligence with which to attack the militants.

Testimony at Mr. Welshofer's court-martial last week confirmed that a team of Iraqis had beaten the general two days before he died, but the C.I.A.'s involvement remained largely unaddressed.

DOJ_NMG_0010243

At one point, a defense lawyer, Frank Spinner, questioned a witness whose identity was so secret that he was shielded from reporters and others in the courtroom by a green tarp suspended from the ceiling, The Associated Press reported. The witness said that when he spoke to Mr. Welshofer on the day before General Mowhoush died, he was alarmed when Mr. Welshofer told him he thought the Army's interrogation guidelines were being broken every day.

"And you didn't report it to the C.I.A.?" Mr. Spinner asked. He then stopped himself and quickly apologized to the judge.

Mr. Welshofer and his lawyers argued that the Army had provided no guidance for authorized and unauthorized techniques. "It was not clear on what we were to do," Mr. Welshofer testified last Thursday, The Rocky Mountain News reported.

Mr. Welshofer said he received an e-mail message from his unit's commanders saying that there were no rules for interrogations yet, and that top officers were "tired of taking casualties and that the gloves were coming off." He said he never received memorandums from Sept. 14 and Oct. 12, which first authorized the use of "stress positions" but called for the prior approval of Lt. Gen. Ricardo S. Sanchez, the top general in Iraq at the time.

As a result, Mr. Welshofer said he escalated his tactics over the course of several interviews to frighten the general, who was providing little useful information. Mr. Welshofer and another interrogator designed the sleeping bag technique as a last resort, believing it would create a claustrophobic effect on a prisoner, Mr. Spinner said in a telephone interview on Sunday. A small hole was cut in the bottom of the sleeping bag to allow the detainee to breathe.

General Mowhoush was considered a prized intelligence prospect. He had been commander of air defenses in western Iraq under Saddam Hussein, and military intelligence officials believed he was a suspected leader and financier of the insurgency there, providing money and housing for fighters coming in from Syria. General Mowhoush had surrendered to military authorities two weeks before his death, saying he wanted to secure the release of his four sons in American custody.

But the military prosecutor, Maj. Tiernan Dolan, said Mr. Welshofer abused General Mowhoush, treating him "worse than you would treat a dog," The A.P. reported.

An Army spokesman, Paul Boyce, said in an e-mail message on Sunday that more than 500 investigations had examined allegations of detainee mistreatment. Thus far, he said, allegations against at least 251 military members have been addressed in courts-martial, nonjudicial punishment and other administrative penalties.

Workers Allege Halliburton Knew Their Water Was Foul (WP)

By Larry Margasak

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

Troops and civilians at a U.S. military base in Iraq were exposed to contaminated water last year, and employees for the responsible contractor, Halliburton Co., could not get their company to inform camp residents, according to interviews and internal company documents.

Halliburton, the company formerly headed by Vice President Cheney, disputes the allegations about water problems at Camp Junction City, in Ramadi, even though they were made by its own employees and documented in company e-mails.

"We exposed a base camp population (military and civilian) to a water source that was not treated," said a July 15, 2005, memo written by William Granger, the official for Halliburton's KBR subsidiary who was in charge of water quality in Iraq and Kuwait.

"The level of contamination was roughly 2x the normal contamination of untreated water from the Euphrates River," Granger wrote in one of several documents. The Associated Press obtained the documents from Senate Democrats who are holding a public inquiry into the allegations today.

Sen. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.), who is scheduled to chair the session, held a number of similar inquiries last year on contracting abuses in Iraq. He said Democrats were acting on their own because they had not been able to persuade Republican committee chairmen to investigate.

Ben Carter, Halliburton's former water-treatment expert at Camp Junction City, said he discovered the problem last March, a statement confirmed by his e-mail the day after he tested the water. Though bottled water was available for drinking, the contaminated water was used for virtually everything else, including handwashing, laundry, bathing and making coffee, Carter said.

Another former Halliburton employee who worked at the base, Ken May of Louisville, said there were numerous instances of diarrhea and stomach cramps.

A spokeswoman for Halliburton said its own inspection found neither contaminated water nor medical evidence to substantiate reports of illnesses at the base.

The company now operates its own water-treatment plant there, spokeswoman Melissa Norcross said.

DOJ_NMG_0010244

A military medical unit that visited Camp Ramadi in mid-April found nothing out of the ordinary in terms of water quality, said Marine Corps Maj. Tim Keefe, a military spokesman. Water-quality testing records from May 23 show the water within normal parameters, he said. "The allegations appear not to have merit," Keefe said.

Granger's July 15 memo said the exposure had gone on for "possibly a year" and added, "I am not sure if any attempt to notify the exposed population was ever made."

The first memo on the problem -- written by Carter to Halliburton officials on March 24, 2005 -- was an "incident report" from tests Carter performed the previous day.

"It is my opinion that the water source is without question contaminated with numerous micro-organisms, including Coliform bacteria," Carter wrote. "There is little doubt that raw sewage is routinely dumped upstream of intake much less than the required 2 mile distance.

"Therefore, it is my conclusion that chlorination of our water tanks while certainly beneficial is not sufficient protection from parasitic exposure."

Carter said he resigned in early April after Halliburton officials did not take any action to inform the camp population.

The water expert said he told company officials at the base that they would have to notify the military. "They told me it was none of my concern and to keep my mouth shut," he said.

On at least one occasion, Carter said, he spoke to the chief military surgeon at the base, asking him whether he was aware of stomach problems afflicting people. He said the surgeon told him he would look into it.

"They brushed it under the carpet," Carter said. "I told everyone, 'Don't take showers; use bottled water.' "

A July 14, 2005, memo showed that Halliburton's public relations department knew of the problem.

"I don't want to turn it into a big issue right now," staff member Jennifer Dellinger wrote in the memo, "but if we end up getting some media calls I want to make sure we have all the facts so we are ready to respond."

Hussein's Trial Is Set To Resume, But Who Will Preside? (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Jan. 22 - Two days before the trial of Saddam Hussein is set to resume after a month's recess, confusion surrounds the tribunal that is trying him, with the identity of the judge who will preside in court still uncertain.

The judge who has become the trial's most public face, Rizgar Muhammad Amin, submitted a letter of resignation this month, saying he was fed up with criticism by high-ranking Iraqi officials who wanted him to be tougher with Mr. Hussein. A colleague on the five-judge panel, Said al-Hammash, is prepared to replace Judge Amin if he does not return Tuesday.

But in recent days President Jalal Talabani and other Iraqi leaders, apparently eager to dispel the widespread impression that Judge Amin was forced off the case through political pressure, have urged him to stay on. The tribunal has not accepted Judge Amin's resignation. An American official who is close to the tribunal said Sunday that he did not know which judge would be presiding.

"We'll know for sure on Tuesday morning at about 10 o'clock," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity in an effort to avoid the appearance of interfering in the tribunal's decisions.

Judge Amin's potential successor is facing troubles of his own. Last week, a senior Iraqi official petitioned the court to bar Judge Hammash from presiding at the trial, saying the judge was a former member of Mr. Hussein's Baath Party. The official, Ali Feisal al-Lami, is a director of the de-Baathification commission, set up to purge former high-level Baathists from public office. Judge Hammash has denied that he was a Baathist.

The office of Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari has told the tribunal to ignore Mr. Lami's petition, saying he has no authority over the judges. But one tribunal official said he believed that to avoid controversy, the body might choose to pass over Judge Hammash even if Judge Amin resigns. The official spoke on condition of anonymity, saying he was not authorized to speak publicly.

The judicial disputes have threatened to bring further disarray to a trial that has already seen its share of chaos. Some judges on the tribunal say they fear that Mr. Hussein and his fellow defendants, who have unleashed repeated broadsides against the tribunal, will pick up on the questions surrounding Judge Amin's resignation and stir further conflict.

The trial, which started on Oct. 19, will resume with more testimony from witnesses to the massacre of 148 men and boys in the Shiite town of Dujail, north of Baghdad, in 1982 after an assassination attempt there against Mr. Hussein. Former members of Mr. Hussein's government could be among those who are called to testify in the next two weeks, the American official said.

The current phase of the trial, the first of several expected cases against Mr. Hussein and other top officials in his government, is likely to last at least until the end of May, the official said.

As Iraqi parties positioned themselves on Sunday after the release of election results, Tariq al-Hashemi, a leader of Iraq's largest Sunni Arab political coalition, said Sunni Arabs would not accept the inclusion in a new government of any official who was involved in violence against Sunnis by the Shiite-led security forces. The warning appeared to be aimed at Bayan Jabr, the current interior minister, who is widely believed by Sunnis to have orchestrated death squads that have carried out killings.

Mr. Hashemi's coalition, the Iraqi Consensus Front, won 44 of the new Parliament's 275 seats in the December elections, and is expected to be part of a government with the Shiite and Kurdish alliances. But at a news conference on Sunday, Mr. Hashemi also said the group's leaders would consult with party members before deciding whether to be part of a government or the opposition.

Insurgent violence left at least a dozen people dead across Iraq on Sunday. In Baquba, the bodies of five policemen, some mutilated, were left outside a hospital, police officials said. In Balad Ruz, northeast of Baghdad, insurgents fired rocket-propelled grenades at the home of a police officer, killing five of his relatives but leaving the officer unharmed, the police said.

North of Baghdad in Hawija, the bodies of a prominent Sunni Arab tribal leader and his son were found shot to death with their hands bound. The leader, Ibrahim Ali al-Neami, 75, and his 28 year-old son, Ziad, were last seen Saturday leaving their home south of Kirkuk for a funeral in Hawija, the police said.

The last of three Reuters journalists who had been detained by the American military in Iraq was freed Sunday after nearly eight months without being charged, the agency reported. Samir Muhammad Noor, a 30 year-old cameraman, was arrested in June. Two other Reuters journalists, also Iraqis, were released Jan. 15, also without being charged.

After Bode Miller's Downhill Turn, Two Weeks On The Lift (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

Bad-boy behavior pays off, big time.

Skiing star Bode Miller goes on "60 Minutes," shoots off his mouth about getting drunk before a big competition, rips the CBS program for airing his remarks, holds a news conference to apologize and winds up on the cover of Time and Newsweek. Not exactly a downhill trajectory.

Journalists can't resist a troublemaking athlete who produces a blizzard of controversy instead of the usual sports cliches. And in the media world, doing bad things only fuels your celebrity, as Martha Stewart's post-jail television and radio gigs make clear.

"Skiing's Wild Child," declared Time. "Fast, loose and seemingly out of control," with "a smirking disrespect for the media," gushed Newsweek. In the run-up to the Olympics, it was Miller Time.

The storm began days before the Jan. 8 edition of "60 Minutes," with a CBS press release headlined "Bode Miller on Skiing Drunk." Miller told Bob Simon about his Saturday night drinking, saying: "There's been times when I've been in really tough shape at the top of the course" and that it's hard to ski "when you're wasted." It was presented as a light moment, but there was no missing the potential for a media avalanche.

While some sportswriters dismissed this as less than shocking, Ron Judd wrote in the Seattle Times: "Miller's confession to skiing drunk was highly uncouth, and it makes you want to slap the guy upside the head." Ray Grass wondered in Salt Lake City's Deseret Morning News: "Tell me, please, why anyone would go before millions of viewers and brag about being 'wasted' in the starting gate?"

Maybe because all publicity is good publicity?

Miller's agent, Lowell Taub, complained about an "out-of-context and salacious headline involving drunkenness." Miller, in his Denver Post blog, called "60 Minutes" "probably the most reputable and prestigious news program in the U.S., and I told them the story to test their integrity. . . . If they were interested in doing the right thing, or doing what they should be doing in terms of painting a role model for kids, they would have left that stuff out."

Say wha' ? Miller says on camera that he skis impaired to see whether television's oldest newsmagazine would protect him by cutting it out?

In any event, the head of U.S. skiing was not amused, calling Miller's comments "unacceptable" and "irresponsible." Under pressure, Miller summoned journalists in Switzerland and apologized to his friends, family and supporters.

"I don't need the media," Miller boasted to Newsweek, but he's too smart to believe that he could have amassed millions of dollars without all the journalistic adulation.

There was a time when an athlete's reputation might have been marred by such frank talk about drinking and hangovers, but that now seems very 20th century. Miller already has a Sirius satellite radio show and the kind of swaggering image that money can't buy. If he misbehaves at the Olympics, he'll probably get his own cable show.Thumbs Down

Fred Barnes, executive editor of the Weekly Standard, is pretty conservative. And his forthcoming book, "Rebel-in-Chief: Inside the Bold and Controversial Presidency of George W. Bush," sounds like it would appeal to the right. But the Conservative Book Club has not only declined to offer the Barnes volume, it has also attacked the book.

"Rebel-in-Chief" is filled with "empty puffery," writes book club Editor-in-Chief Jeffrey Rubin. Barnes is too favorable toward "all those things that Bush does to drive traditional conservatives to despair" in a way that "call[s] into question his own understanding of conservatism. . . . Fred Barnes isn't doing the president -- or the country -- any favors by celebrating his worst political tendencies."

Barnes says he doesn't believe that an unsuccessful bid for his book by Regnery Publishing, owned by the book club's parent company, was a factor in the slam. "I guess they don't like Bush, or me, either," he says of the club. "But going out of the way to say 'don't read this book' is a bit unusual."Explosive Story

In reporting last week that the FBI was making progress in identifying the origins of homemade bombs used against Americans in Iraq, CBS News agreed to withhold some details at the bureau's request.

Rome Hartman, executive producer of the "CBS Evening News," says CBS News President Sean McManus and correspondent Jim Stewart spoke with FBI officials who "made the case that putting in certain details might in their view jeopardize American lives. They felt very strongly about it."

During a "very spirited" internal debate, Hartman says, the FBI's case "felt to me, and to Sean and Jim in the end, to be a pretty persuasive argument. You ought to err on the side of discretion and caution." Stewart's report mentioned that CBS was withholding part of the story.Blogging Manifestos

The lightning-quick online pundits known as bloggers are turning to a far older and slower technology: book publishing.

In his forthcoming "An Army of Davids," Instapundit's Glenn Reynolds casts bloggers as an increasingly influential check on the mainstream media: "Where before journalists and pundits could bloviate at leisure, offering illogical analysis or citing 'facts' that were in fact false, now the Sunday morning op-eds have already been dissected on Saturday night, within hours of their appearing on newspapers' Web sites." He also predicts a backlash from "Old Media guys" who resent the scrutiny.

Reynolds praises "flash media" -- bloggers who spontaneously organize around a sudden event -- and says that "even when Big Media snubs such coverage, bloggers let hundreds of thousands of people read about, see and sometimes even experience via video a story that they would otherwise miss."

Daily Kos founder Markos Moulitsas, who speaks regularly with Democratic leaders, will soon publish "Crashing the Gate," his indictment of "a progressive movement that is failing to keep up with the times," including "issue groups that don't realize it's no longer 1975 or even 1995" and "an incestuous relationship between the party committees and consultants that serve themselves more than our candidates."

Urging people to pre-order the book online, Moulitsas writes: "Help us debut on the best seller list. Wingers like [Ann] Coulter get an automatic berth on the best seller list thanks to TWO conservative book clubs (our first doesn't launch until March or so) and bulk purchases from organizations. We don't have those advantages. But we've got you guys."

Andrew Sullivan, one of the blogging pioneers, is finishing "The Conservative Soul: How We Lost It; How to Get It Back." He calls it "an attempt to grapple with the way in which American conservatism has shifted in recent years from an emphasis on small government, individual freedom and a 'leave-us-alone' coalition into a big-spending, big-government force for correcting human immorality and delivering us from foreign evil."

Why do folks with instant access to an audience labor over manuscripts? Sullivan puts it this way: "The blog is a short form. It's provisional and meandering. A book is a longer project, it requires sustained concentration on one line of argument or one central topic. I find it really hard to flip from one mode of writing to another. . . . So right now, I try not to blog at all until I have spent a few hours on the book."If Only the Democrats Had Known

The Exponent, the student paper at Purdue University, carried a routine wire-service item that began: "Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito told senators Monday that good judges don't have an agenda." The final sentence said: "His motive for shooting John Paul in the abdomen on May 13, 1981, remains unclear."

A subsequent correction, as noted by the Web site Regret the Error, said nothing about the charge of attempted assassination. The item, the paper said, merely "contained a sentence that was not intended to be part of the brief."

Jill Carroll: Chorus Of Support From Muslim Leaders (CSM)

The Christian Science Monitor, January 23, 2006

A delegation from the Council on American-Islamic Relations arrived in Baghdad Saturday, adding its voice to what is described as an unprecedented outpouring of Muslim support for the release of American reporter Jill Carroll.

DOJ_NMG_0010247

"The kidnapping of Jill Carroll does not benefit the kidnappers," said Nihad Awad, executive director of the Washington-based group that represents US mosques and Islamic associations. "She has been friendly and respectful of the Iraqi people, not an enemy," he added.

At press time Sunday, David Cook, the Monitor's Washington bureau chief, said that there has been no new information about Ms. Carroll. "We are continuing to watch developments in Iraq and doing all we can to speed Jill's release, unharmed, to her family."

Also joining the Muslim voices calling for Carroll's release was Yasser al-Sirri, director of the London-based Islamic Observation Centre. He called on the "Brigades of Vengeance" - the group that is demanding Iraqi women prisoners be let out - to release Carroll rather than tarnish the image of Islam.

A spokesman in Iraq's Justice Ministry said Sunday that it still expects US forces to release six of nine Iraqi women prisoners this week, despite US comments to the contrary.

"The Iraqi detainees will be released within a week from today," the Justice Ministry spokesman told Reuters. A US military spokesman declined comment.

US troops have raided homes in several areas of Baghdad in recent days. "All of a sudden we heard an explosion. They blew open the front door and fired stun grenades into the living room. They rounded us up and threw me on the floor and a soldier put me on the floor and kept his boot on my back," Hamdiya Sabri told Reuters.

The US soldiers asked if the family members knew anything about the neighbors and then they asked about Carroll. "They told us that they had a tip that the American journalist was being held in this area and asked me what I thought of her," said Thamir Nazih. "I said I was sympathetic about Jill Carroll and that she is innocent. Then they asked me if I knew any terrorists - this only after they stormed the house and humiliated my family."

After the search, a US soldier promised $300 compensation and apologized. The soldiers took away Jassim, the youngest son of the family, saying he would be questioned and freed in a day or two.

On Friday, Adnan al-Dulaimi of the Sunni Iraqi Accordance Front, a leading Sunni political group, held a press conference to denounce the kidnapping. "I am asking you to release this woman. By kidnapping her, you are insulting me. You're insulting the work that I've been doing for Iraq. To the men who are kidnapping her: You know that the woman has a special status in our religion, our culture, and our principles. I'm asking those men who have kidnapped her to release her unconditionally.... I have worked hard in the past to secure the release of Iraqi prisoners. The arrest of this noble journalist will complicate my efforts to release Iraqi prisoners."

Abduction Of U.S. Reporter Underscores Risks In Iraq (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Jan. 22 - The tools of her trade were a notebook, pen, Islamic head covering and Arabic name to pass unnoticed through Iraqi streets.

Together with an interpreter and a driver, Jill Carroll, a 28-year-old American journalist, was able to slip quietly inside Iraqi society, telling stories about the lives of the Iraqis she met.

But on the morning of Jan. 7, Ms. Carroll was kidnapped, seized by gunmen in Baghdad who blocked her car and killed her interpreter as he tried to call for help.

Now her threadbare room in an inexpensive hotel here is the command center that other reporters are using to try to secure her release.

The seizure of Ms. Carroll, whose image from a video with armed men at her side is now familiar in many American households, has underscored the risks to foreigners of working here, particularly freelance journalists, who operate with little or no protection.

When Ms. Carroll arrived in 2003 - fresh from Arabic lessons and a job at an English-language newspaper in Jordan - Iraq was wide open. Journalists drove around in their own cars, talking to Iraqis as they emerged in a daze from cramped lives under Saddam Hussein.

"You were eating at restaurants," said Ashraf Khalil, a reporter for The Los Angeles Times who was working in Iraq as a freelancer at the time and knows Ms. Carroll. "You were hailing cabs at night. You were speaking English on the street."

Freelancing was not easy. Mr. Khalil described how Ms. Carroll and he discovered a $5 special of Middle Eastern salad and a hard boiled egg with beef at a nearby hotel. Her hotel, the Musafir, was one of the cheapest frequented by Western reporters: two-room suites were shared for $30 per person per night.

DOJ_NMG_0010248

But Ms. Carroll, who graduated from the University of Massachusetts in 1999 with a bachelor's degree in journalism, was glad for the chance to work on such a big story.

She described the motivation in an article for The American Journalism Review published last year. "The cubicle walls are closing in," she wrote. "You'd rather jump off a cliff than cover one more zoning board meeting and just when one of the biggest stories in years is developing in Iraq, those foreign correspondent aspirations seem ever further out of reach."

"There's only one way out," Ms. Carroll wrote. "Pull up stakes, clean out that savings account and get on a plane to Baghdad."

As a woman, Ms. Carroll had a special advantage. She could dress in the Islamic head covering, a hijab, and the long black cloak, the abaya, and move around Baghdad's streets relatively unnoticed. Women who were reporters often saw themselves as less vulnerable to kidnappings than their male colleagues, partly because of the disguise afforded by Iraqi dress.

"We can put on our scarves and abayas," said Jackie Spinner, a reporter for The Washington Post. "She felt that it was an extra security blanket. I definitely felt that way."

Ms. Carroll got to know the story well. She went into Iraqi homes. She shopped for clothes in Baghdad. She used her Arabic and went by the name Zaineb.

As the months passed, Baghdad became increasingly dangerous, and news organizations began to require reporters to travel with two cars - a passenger car and a backup or "chase" car - and armed guards. In September 2004, two American engineers and a Briton were kidnapped and beheaded. A month later, a British-Iraqi aid official and longtime Baghdad resident, Margaret Hassan, was kidnapped and later killed.

But Ms. Carroll, who had begun to write regularly for The Christian Science Monitor, continued to work with her small team. She wrote in her Journalism Review article that it seemed safer that way.

It is still unclear precisely what happened on Jan. 7. At least one witness said the kidnappers mistakenly drove down a dead-end street, suggesting that the seizure was not well planned and that another car could have helped stop them.

In Iraq, danger presents itself on a daily basis, and the taking of Ms. Carroll, who was described by her colleagues as cautious, probably had as much to do with circumstance as anything else.

The Monitor was one of the few American news organizations with a bureau in Baghdad that did not use a Western security adviser. The paper's Washington bureau chief, David Cook, said by telephone on Sunday that the paper left decisions of whether to use guards or a chase car up to the reporters, and that Ms. Carroll, as a freelance reporter, had the same access to these things as did staff employees.

Still, Ms. Carroll talked to the paper's foreign editor about security issues on more than one occasion, Mr. Cook said. She is covered under a life insurance policy paid for by the paper while she is on assignment, he said.

Freelance writers who have worked in Baghdad expressed concerns about returning solo. Kimberly Johnson, who worked here this summer, said she had been told by one large American news organization that it could not accept her articles because it could not pay for adequate security. David Enders, a freelance writer based in New York, said an assignment with an American magazine had fallen through, apparently because of security concerns.

"You can go days and weeks and there's no significant event," Ms. Spinner said. "Then something happens and you are reminded again that you are in the most dangerous place the press has ever known."

In Iraq, Specter Of Kidnapping Keeps Journalists On Edge (USAT)

USA Today, January 23, 2006

In September 2004, Wall Street Journal reporter Farnaz Fassihi wrote in an e-mail to friends that reporting from Baghdad "was like being under virtual house arrest."

The threat of bombings and kidnappings, she said, precluded her from living anything close to a normal personal or professional life.

"My most pressing concern every day is not to write a (great) story but to stay alive and make sure our Iraqi employees stay alive," she wrote in her e-mail, which got national attention after it was posted on websites. "In Baghdad I am a security personnel first, a reporter second."

On Sunday, kidnapped freelance reporter Jill Carroll began her third week of captivity in Iraq with no further word on her status after Tuesday's video in which her captors threatened to kill her in 72 hours unless the U.S. military released female Iraqi prisoners.

And Fassihi says that although the threat level for reporters in Iraq has ebbed and flowed, not much had changed. Iraq, she says, is a dangerous place, especially for American journalists.

"I'm terrified for Jill. I'm terrified for everyone I know in Baghdad," Fassihi says from New York, where she is awaiting a new assignment in Beirut after three years in Baghdad. She left there last month.

DOJ_NMG_0010249

Carroll is the 36th reporter to be kidnapped since April 2004, according to the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists. Six of them have been killed. Her abduction has resonated with the tightknit press corps in Baghdad, where she is well-known.

Her kidnapping has prompted media outlets to revisit security precautions and share information with each other, just as network and cable news outlets do in set weekly meeting, says Chuck Lustig, who directs ABC's foreign coverage.

News outlets know "that at any time you could get a phone call saying something has happened," Lustig says. "Every time something like this happens, you review your security procedures to make sure you are doing everything you can to make your people safe."

NBC News correspondent Richard Engel, who has spent three years in Iraq, says reporters there go through stages about the possibility of being kidnapped. "The first is, 'It'll never happen to me.' The next is, 'It might happen.' The third is, 'I've been here long enough it's probably going to happen.' And the fourth is, 'I've got to get out of here.' "

Engel describes himself as being between "two and three." He says, "I don't think anyone who is there is under the impression that it couldn't be them."

CBS News correspondent Lara Logan, who has traveled back and forth to Iraq frequently in recent years, says, "Your whole ability to function is affected by the possibility of being kidnapped, and you trying to limit the possibility of anything like that happening to you."

Logan, who reported on Carroll's abduction on Friday's CBS Evening News, says she looks at Carroll's case "as a story, but also, 'What did she do that I cannot do the next time I'm there?' "

Though print reporters, by wearing local clothes and keeping a low profile, can often do their work without attracting attention, TV correspondents and photojournalists have a harder time, because "when you pull out the camera, the game is over," Logan says.

No reporter — print or electronic — is safe in Iraq, Engel says. "In Iraq you can't do anything privately. You can't move around the country and not have people know where you are going. People talk; you can't keep secrets very well."

But, notes Cox Newspapers correspondent Larry Kaplow, "the situation is still much worse for Iraqis than for us. There are about 10 to 30 kidnappings of Iraqis daily, according to officials. It's dangerous for everyone, and you can get in trouble even if you do everything right."

History Lessons (WT)

The Washington Times, January 23, 2006

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, Dec. 16, 1998:

As a member of the House Intelligence Committee, I am keenly aware that the proliferation of chemical and biological weapons is an issue of grave importance to all nations. Saddam Hussein has been engaged in the development of weapons of mass destruction technology which is a threat to countries in the region and he has made a mockery of the weapons inspection process. The responsibility of the United States in this conflict is to eliminate weapons of mass destruction, to minimize the danger to our troops and to diminish the suffering of the Iraqi people... I believe in negotiated solutions to international conflict. This is, unfortunately, not going to be the case in this situation where Saddam Hussein has been a repeat offender, ignoring the international community's requirement that he come clean with his weapons program.

Pentagon Hails Military Meeting (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 23, 2006

Pentagon officials say this month's closed-door conference of the military's top field commanders was gratifying, describing it as an uninhibited exchange of ideas rather than a fixed-agenda meeting monopolized by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Officials said Mr. Rumsfeld, four-star generals and admirals, and top civilians brainstormed over two main topics: how to fight the war on Islamic terrorists and how to reconfigure the military for future threats.

"Four years ago, we could not have had a discussion like this without people getting into parochial interests," said a senior defense official. "Rumsfeld didn't steer the discussion. They all went at it."

The Pentagon conference room was full of top brass Mr. Rumsfeld handpicked during the past five years in a search for out-of-the-box thinkers who would "lean forward" in a war against Islamic terrorists.

It is clearly Mr. Rumsfeld's Pentagon today, but it was not always that way. Mr. Rumsfeld inherited Joint Chiefs and four-star combatant commanders, in this case ones promoted by President Clinton. "Rummy would have to drive the discussion at earlier commanders' conferences," said the defense official.

In those days, Mr. Rumsfeld did not always share his thinking with them, and in some cases had outright clashes, such as with Gen. Eric Shinseki, the former Army Chief of Staff. Mr. Rumsfeld solved his Army problem by picking Mr. Shinseki's successor from the ranks of the retired. The new chief, Gen. Peter Schoomaker, had worked closely with Mr. Rumsfeld on transforming U.S. Special Operations Command.

At the Jan. 9-11 biannual commanders' conference, around-the-table discussions kicked off once the Joint Staff -- the planning and operations arm of the Joint Chiefs of Staff -- presented a slide show on a particular topic. There were candid back-and-forths about both successes and failures.

One failure, two defense officials said, is that Mr. Rumsfeld still does not think the Pentagon is doing a good job of destroying al Qaeda cells planning attacks on Americans. He has come to call the problem "find, fix and finish -- in other words finding their general location, getting an exact fix on their whereabouts, and finishing them by killing or capturing them.

"It's got to get a lot better," said a second senior defense official. "The conference got very passionate. It's passion with a purpose."

Asked which general talked the most about the need for intelligence, the source declined to name names, but said it was "the commander where most of the action is right now." That would be Gen. John Abizaid, who heads U.S. Central Command. He is overseeing wars in Afghanistan and Iraq and is in charge of the military's hunt for Osama bin Laden.

Sources said Mr. Rumsfeld already has improved Pentagon intelligence collection by beefing up the Defense Intelligence Agency and giving its agents more power; naming an undersecretary of defense for intelligence; empowering special operations forces to spy; and embedding intelligence officers in newly configured Army combat brigades.

The conference was composed of the most powerful military men in the world. Besides Mr. Rumsfeld, there were the nine combatant commanders from Europe, the Middle East, Asia and other commands; the four service chiefs; the Joint Chiefs chairman and vice chairman; defense undersecretaries and assistant secretaries; and the services' civilian secretaries.

All of them were picked by Mr. Rumsfeld, some after closely working with the secretary in other roles. Gen. Abizaid, for example, had directed the Joint Staff, putting him in frequent contact with the chief.

The conference typically convened at 8 a.m. and lasted until the late afternoon.

Mr. Rumsfeld's spokesman, Larry Di Rita, said of the conference, "It's freewheeling, but it's not unstructured. When this group gets together, it's not like some off-site corporate retreat. It is people focusing on real problems and working off an agreed set of assumptions."

Fighting Ourselves In Falluja (NYT)

By Bing West

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

Newport, R.I.

THE persistence of the insurgency in Iraq has divided America in a way not seen since Vietnam. Now the blame game among the principals has begun. The former presidential envoy to Iraq, L. Paul Bremer III, has written in his new memoir that he informed President Bush that the military did not have "a strategy to win."

Quite. The lesson the Pentagon should learn from Iraq is to avoid another L. Paul Bremer. This is less a reflection on Mr. Bremer, who accurately described himself as "the American viceroy" in Iraq and "the president's man," than on the position he and the American military commanders in Iraq were placed in by the White House's failure to put one person in charge.

In 1967, when confusion among military and civilian officials in Vietnam was undermining the war effort, President Lyndon B. Johnson placed all civilian reconstruction and security functions under the top general, William Westmoreland, insuring unity of command under Westmoreland's successor Creighton Abrams. Confronting similar confusion in Iraq, President Bush unfortunately assigned to the military the responsibility for security but gave Mr. Bremer the authority to shape, recruit, train and finance the Iraqi military and police.

Mr. Bremer writes that he believed the Iraqi military should not "have internal security duties" and that the police should be trained by American civilians. But not enough civilians ever arrived to do the job. Mr. Bremer was unable to design a strategy for building up the Iraqi military and police. This failure extended the period in which the American military had to do the fighting while also taking over the training of both Mr. Bremer's new army and the police.

This disunity of command reached its tragic apex in the spring of 2004, during what Mr. Bremer calls "the most critical crisis of the occupation." When four American contractors were killed and their bodies mutilated in Falluja on March 31, Mr. Bremer joined with Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and Gen. John Abizaid, the commander of American forces, in ordering the fractious city seized.

DOJ_NMG_0010251

Five days later, however, Mr. Bremer changed his mind after Sunni members of the Iraqi Governing Council threatened to quit in protest. He prevailed on General Abizaid to order the Marine battalions that were advancing through Falluja to halt. Mr. Bremer acknowledged that this "temporary cessation of offensive action" would be "rough on the military."

Secretary Rumsfeld, for his part, disagreed with the halt and urged General Abizaid to finish the attack. But as the military prepared to end things quickly, Mr. Bremer changed his mind about the "temporary" cessation. He told President Bush that the assault would "collapse the entire political process"; the president sided with his viceroy and told General Abizaid "to let the political situation there develop."

Develop it did. The insurgents' morale soared and their defenses toughened. According to Pentagon reports, 21 marines were killed around the city in April, and 25 were killed over the next six months as Falluja degenerated into Taliban-style rule and became the lair of the terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. And then 70 American soldiers and marines were killed in the main assault on Falluja that eventually took place in November. The cost of dithering: 116 American lives. Because of the stop-and-start decision-making, Falluja developed into the fiercest battle yet of the Iraqi war.

The lines of authority, responsibility and communications to the president were fatally tangled. The establishment of two independent chains of command in the midst of war guaranteed error and human loss. The result was indeed "rough on the military." Ask the soldiers and marines who fought at Falluja.

The singular lesson in war is to put either the civilian viceroy or (better) the general in charge, but not both.

Iraq's Power Vacuum (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, January 23, 2006

In the State of the Union address, President Bush will surely assert, to choreographed applause, that he has a strategy for victory in Iraq. I don't believe him. In fact, I believe that three years into the conflict his administration refuses to admit defeat but has given up even trying to win.

To explain myself, let me tell you some stories about electricity.

Power shortages are a crucial issue for ordinary Iraqis, and for the credibility of their government. As Muhsin Shlash, Iraq's electricity minister, said last week, "When you lose electricity the country is destroyed, nothing works, all industry is down and terrorist activity is increased."

Mr. Shlash has reason to be strident. In today's Iraq, blackouts are the rule rather than the exception. According to Agence France-Presse, Baghdad and "much of the central regions" - in other words, the areas where the insurgency is most active and dangerous - currently get only between two and six hours of power a day.

Lack of electricity isn't just an inconvenience. It prevents businesses from operating, destroys jobs and generates a sense of demoralization and rage that feeds the insurgency.

So why is power scarcer than ever, almost three years after Saddam's fall? Sabotage by insurgents is one factor. But as an analysis of Iraq's electricity shortage in The Los Angeles Times last month showed, the blackouts are also the result of some incredible missteps by U.S. officials.

Most notably, during the period when Iraq was run by U.S. officials, they decided to base their electricity plan on natural gas: in order to boost electrical output, American companies were hired to install gas-fired generators in power plants across Iraq. But, as The Los Angeles Times explains, "pipelines needed to transport the gas" - that is, to supply gas to the new generators - "weren't built because Iraq's Oil Ministry, with U.S. encouragement, concentrated instead on boosting oil production." Whoops.

Meanwhile, in the early days of the occupation U.S. officials chose not to raise the prices of electricity and fuel, which had been kept artificially cheap under Saddam, for fear of creating unrest. But as a first step toward their dream of turning Iraq into a free-market utopia, they removed tariffs and other restrictions on the purchase of imported consumer goods.

The result was that wealthy and middle-class Iraqis rushed to buy imported refrigerators, heaters and other power-hungry products, and the demand for electricity surged - with no capacity available to meet that surge in demand. This caused even more blackouts.

In short, U.S. officials thoroughly botched their handling of Iraq's electricity sector. They did much the same in the oil sector. But the Bush administration is determined to achieve victory in Iraq, so it must have a plan to rectify its errors, right?

Um, no. Although there has been no formal declaration, all indications are that the Bush administration, which once made grand promises about a program to rebuild Iraq comparable to the Marshall Plan, doesn't plan to ask for any more money for Iraqi reconstruction.

Another Los Angeles Times report on Iraq reconstruction contains some jaw-dropping quotes from U.S. officials, who now seem to be lecturing the Iraqis on self-reliance. "The world is a competitive place," declared the economics counselor at the U.S.

embassy. "No pain, no gain," said another official. "We were never intending to rebuild Iraq," said a third. We came, we saw, we conquered, we messed up your infrastructure, we're outta here.

Mr. Shlash certainly sounds as if he's given up expecting more American help. "The American donation is almost finished," he said, "and it was not that effective." Yet he also emphasized the obvious: partly because of the similar failure of reconstruction in the oil sector, Iraq's government doesn't have the funds to do much power plant construction. In fact, it will be hard pressed to maintain the capacity it has, and protect that capacity from insurgent attacks.

And if reconstruction stalls, as seems inevitable, it's hard to see how anything else in Iraq can go right.

So what does it mean that the Bush administration is apparently walking away from responsibility for Iraq's reconstruction? It means that the administration doesn't have a plan; it's entirely focused on short-term political gain. Mr. Bush is just getting by from sound bite to sound bite, while Iraq and America sink ever deeper into the quagmire.

Pakistan Says U.S. Should Communicate Before Airstrikes (AP)

Associated Press

AP, January 23, 2006

Pakistan's prime minister yesterday condemned an American airstrike on a remote Pakistani village, saying such attacks should be cleared with Islamabad first.

Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz said no understanding exists between U.S. and Pakistani officials that allows American military forces to attack alleged terrorists in Pakistan without first consulting the government.

"The understanding is that we will work together," Aziz said. "We will work in collaboration with each other."

Aziz said Pakistani officials were given no notice before the Jan. 13 attack that killed at least 13. The attack was apparently aimed at al Qaeda's No. 2 leader, Ayman Zawahiri, who was not there.

Pakistan, Aziz said, "has regretted and condemned the incident and said that such incidents should not reoccur. We need to work together. There is no difference in the objectives of the two countries, so there is no reason why we shouldn't communicate."

Pakistan is a key U.S. ally, but it has strongly protested the airstrike, which has angered many in the Muslim nation of 150 million and sparked friction between Islamabad and Washington.

Aziz is to meet this week with President Bush and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Attacks Strain Efforts On Terror (WP)

By Griff Witte And Kamran Khan

The Washington Post, January 23, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Jan. 22 -- Events along the ever-volatile Afghanistan-Pakistan border this month have exposed deep fault lines in the anti-terrorism alliance among the United States, Afghanistan and Pakistan, and officials on all sides say their joint efforts against militants in the region are now highly precarious.

The heightened tension comes as militant extremists and the United States have both become more aggressive in their tactics, with the Pakistani government caught in between.

Two incidents in particular, which each killed more than a dozen people, have revealed just how tenuous relations among the countries have become.

In the first, U.S. missiles struck a house in the Pakistani village of Damadola where Ayman Zawahiri, the deputy leader of al Qaeda, was thought to be having dinner. In the second, three days later in the Afghan town of Spin Boldak, a man drove a motorbike into a crowd gathered to watch a wrestling match and blew himself up.

Because the incidents took place on opposite sides of the border, they elicited responses with vastly different focuses. After the U.S. missile strike, thousands of Pakistanis took to the streets to condemn the United States. After the suicide bombing, thousands of Afghans took to the streets to condemn Pakistan.

The United States -- long frustrated because its soldiers are in Afghanistan while most of the militants they are hunting are believed to be in Pakistan -- has begun using unmanned aircraft known as Predators armed with Hellfire missiles to reach across the border. Pakistani officials are apparently notified in advance of such missions, and assist with intelligence. But the angry public response there to this month's attack raised questions about whether the government of Gen. Pervez Musharraf -- which has sought to cultivate ties to the West without alienating radical Islamic groups at home -- can handle the domestic political fallout.

Afghanistan, for its part, has applauded the more aggressive U.S. stance. Afghan officials say they want the United States to go even further to stop Pakistan-based militants, who are hitting hard at a time when international commitments to securing Afghanistan have come into doubt.

Meanwhile, along the border, tensions continue to rise.

"We have a lot of grief in our hearts," said Abdul Hakim Jan, an Afghan tribal leader who helped organize a protest beside a border crossing Wednesday following the deadliest suicide bombing in Afghanistan in the four years since the fall of Taliban rule. "All the terrorists and the enemies of Afghanistan are because of Pakistan. They are receiving their training there and they are being sent to Afghanistan for attacks."

Pakistani tribal leaders, for their part, look a few miles west for the source of their troubles: the American military presence in Afghanistan. Throughout the past week and continuing Sunday, tens of thousands of Pakistanis have participated in boisterous rallies at which protesters burned effigies of President Bush, chanted "Long live Osama!" and denounced the Pakistani government for cooperating with the United States.

"People are so angry that this could become a major movement against the American slaves who are ruling Pakistan these days," said Liaquat Baluch, a leader of Jamaat-e-Islami, the country's largest Islamic party.

Volatility in the border region is nothing new. For centuries, the rugged, mountainous area has been largely beyond the control of any government. Both sides of the border are populated by religiously conservative Pashtuns, who in recent decades have freely transported money, drugs and weapons back and forth across the porous boundary.

But since the United States invaded Afghanistan and toppled the Taliban after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the border has taken on special significance. On the Afghan side, the United States has 19,000 troops who provide crucial support for the government and who enjoy a relative degree of popularity. On the Pakistani side, U.S. troops are officially forbidden from pursuing terrorists. As a consequence, many Islamic militants who found sanctuary in Afghanistan before Sept. 11 reportedly have taken refuge in the semiautonomous tribal areas where sympathies for al Qaeda and its leader, Osama bin Laden, run high.

Until recently, the United States had been dependent on raids by Pakistani security forces to catch the fugitives, with mixed results. But in the predawn hours of Jan. 13, the United States used a different tactic, firing Hellfire missiles from drones in a bid to kill Zawahiri. Pakistani and U.S. intelligence sources have said they expected him to show up for dinner at a house in Damadola, but they now believe he was not there.

The missiles killed at least 13 others. After the attack, local officials said that only villagers were killed, among them women and children, who were buried nearby. But Pakistani intelligence sources have since asserted, without offering proof, that a handful of foreign al Qaeda militants also died, possibly including its chief explosives expert, a son-in-law of Zawahiri and an operational leader in Pakistan and Afghanistan.

The Pakistani government's response has been as conflicted as the reports. Some officials joined with the protesters in vehemently denouncing the attack, while others acknowledged that militants operate in the area. Even as the Foreign Ministry lodged a formal objection with the U.S. Embassy, Musharraf stayed silent in public, except to warn his countrymen not to harbor terrorists.

Pakistani Foreign Minister Khurshid Mahmud Kasuri acknowledged in an interview that the strike has put stress on the government, which since 2001 has walked a fine line of assisting the U.S. anti-terrorism campaign -- and receiving billions of dollars in aid in return -- while also trying to appease radical Islamic constituencies at home.

"Such an action creates immense internal problems for us as the perception grows that the U.S. has no respect for our sovereignty," Kasuri said.

U.S. officials, however, say Pakistan's objections amount to posturing. According to American military and intelligence sources who spoke on condition of anonymity, Pakistan had signed off on this month's strike beforehand and had even assisted with gathering pre-attack intelligence.

The use of Predator drones to strike targets in Pakistan is relatively new, and several security officials said it could not happen without the consent of the Pakistani government. There have been at least three such attacks since last May; one in December reportedly succeeded in killing a senior al Qaeda commander, Hamza Rabia.

But now, it remains unclear whether Predator attacks will be allowed to continue.

On Saturday, in a meeting with U.S. Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns, Musharraf said attacks such as the one aimed at Zawahiri "should not be repeated," according to Pakistani Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Tasneem Aslam.

Pakistani Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz, who on Sunday denied that Pakistan had received prior notice of this month's attack, is expected to raise the issue with Bush when they meet at the White House this week.

A senior Pakistani intelligence official, however, said nothing was likely to change in terms of actual U.S. and Pakistani efforts at hunting militants.

"Proper protest has been made, but this will not alter the ground rules and intelligence cooperation with the U.S. It will continue as usual," the official said.

DOJ_NMG_0010254

The latest U.S. missile strike came as suicide attacks by militants have been on the rise in Afghanistan, particularly in southern and eastern areas bordering Pakistan. In a country where such attacks have traditionally been rare, Afghan officials blame foreigners.

"It is difficult for me to imagine how it can happen without some kind of support from outside Afghanistan," said Foreign Minister Abdullah Abdullah.

Others direct blame squarely at Pakistan, which they believe is trying to gain more influence in Afghanistan by sowing instability.

"We were using Pakistan as a base during the resistance times," said Hakim Taniwal, governor of Paktia province, referring to the U.S.-funded guerrilla war against Soviet occupation troops during the 1980s. "Now al Qaeda and Taliban are also using the Pakistani side to attack in Afghanistan."

Afghan government officials are feeling especially vulnerable now because the United States announced late last year that it would reduce its troop strength from 19,000 to 16,500. NATO soldiers are supposed to fill the gap by taking over some operations in the south, but the Netherlands, seen as pivotal to that transition, has wavered over whether it will send troops.

Meanwhile, the Taliban, al Qaeda and other groups that are trying to destabilize the nascent Afghan government appear to be taking advantage of the uncertainty.

"At the strategic level of war, this is a defensive insurgency," said Chris Mason, a retired U.S. diplomat who served in Afghanistan and is now a senior fellow at the Center for Advanced Defense Studies in Washington. "They're inserting just enough insurgents to shut down meaningful reconstruction in the south and keep the population on the fence."

Nato's Force Will Live Up To Its Afghan Pledges (FT)

By Jaap de Hoop Scheffer

Financial Times, January 22, 2006

As Nato prepares to expand the operations of its International Security Assistance Force in Afghanistan to the country's more volatile south, where violence is intensifying, debate is under way about the role the alliance will play. Taliban fighters, meanwhile, are stepping up terrorist attacks on international forces, trying to scare us off before we even arrive.

The debate surrounding this mission comes as no surprise. After all, Nato's operation in Afghanistan has been, from the start, a fundamentally new step for the alliance. It is also the most ambitious mission in Nato's history, in terms of the strategic distance from our home countries, in terms of the complexity of the challenges we face in Afghanistan and in terms of the multiple roles the alliance must take on.

In all these ways, this mission may be a first for Nato – but I do not believe it will be the last of its kind. The alliance will probably be called on in future to take on other, similar challenges. That is one reason why it is so important to get this one right.

We have already made a good start. Less than five years ago, Afghanistan was the launch pad for the worst terrorist attacks in history. It was also one of the most wretched countries on earth. Today, the Taliban and al-Qaeda are out of power and under pressure. And the people of Afghanistan have just elected their first true parliament, with levels of representation by women that could not have been imagined just a few years ago.

This is enormous progress but there is a long way to go. Afghanistan still needs our help and it will get it. The Afghanistan conference in London next week will show that the international community – including Nato – is still standing squarely behind this country. None of us can afford to let it slip back into chaos and become once again a breeding ground for international terrorism. Our commitment to Afghanistan is not only a question of self-interest: it is also a question of solidarity and obligation. Solidarity with the Afghan people, who have asked for our help. Solidarity between all Nato allies, who decided together to take this mission on, and who should implement that decision together. Solidarity with the United Nations, which passed the resolutions guiding Nato's mission. And it is an obligation for Nato, as the security foundation for Afghanistan's recovery, to stay the course and continue to play an essential role.

We will meet that obligation. Isaf will continue to contribute to stability, and will help to extend the authority of the Afghan government. Nato Provincial Reconstruction teams, joint civil and military groups, are in the provinces of Afghanistan helping rebuild the infrastructure, promoting development and defusing tension as "honest brokers". They are protected by larger military forces, whose job is to ensure that the teams can carry out their mission unimpeded and in safety. And Nato is also helping the Afghan security forces develop, so that they can increasingly provide for their country's security.

Of course, Isaf – a Nato-led force that takes its political direction from Brussels – is not the only international military force in Afghanistan. The US-led coalition, Operation Enduring Freedom (which also includes some Nato member states), has been taking on the Taliban and al-Qaeda there since 2001. Nato's mission is different and it is distinct. With this in mind, allies have agreed command arrangements to ensure that the two missions do not get in each other's way.

Let there be no doubt, however: Isaf forces will not go to the south with one arm tied behind their back. All Nato allies are aware that there are real security challenges in the region and that violence is escalating. They must, and will, meet these challenges. Nato forces will have the rules of engagement and the equipment they need to deal head-on with any dangers to their security or to their mission. If potential attackers threaten Nato personnel or their ability to do their job – which is to help create a secure environment so that Afghans can build better lives – then Isaf will be able to undertake robust military action.

No one should doubt Nato's resolve to carry out this mission. All 26 allies realise that fighting terrorism, and helping the Afghan people and their government, is a collective effort – not a matter of picking and choosing where one might wish to chip in.

We have already been delivering for quite some time, with 10,000 troops in the country. In coming months, we will expand southwards, as an alliance united in our determination to help the Afghan people build the stability and peace they deserve.

Alliance Upgrade (WSJ)

By Marshall Billingslea

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2006

As times have changed, so has the North Atlantic Alliance. That is particularly evident in the way NATO has moved to protect our citizens from terrorism. Over the past few years, the Alliance has intensified armaments cooperation, and has launched and expanded several operations and missions (among other things) to address this threat.

The most dramatic illustration of NATO's new priorities is our support for the democratically elected government of Afghanistan. More than 9,000 troops and military advisers are currently deployed throughout multiple Afghan provinces in the form of Provincial Reconstruction Teams (PRTs). These troops from 25 NATO members and 11 partner nations are there to provide both security and support to local authorities and people, and are doing such things as digging wells, building schools and refurbishing mosques. In a similar vein, NATO is facilitating, together with several international organizations, the rehabilitation of Kabul International Airport, and has made significant investments in airports in Herat and Mazar-e-Sharif. While these airports are important for NATO operations, they are also crucial to Afghanistan's new free-market economy.

Importantly, in a clear demonstration of resolve and determination to support the Afghan people, the Alliance has recently taken decisions to boost its forces even further, and to deploy additional Provincial Reconstruction Teams in the southern part of Afghanistan. A number of NATO nations are now undertaking the necessary domestic processes to deploy the needed forces.

Both in and out of Iraq, NATO maintains a training mission for Iraqi military officers. Last year, several hundred officers were trained at NATO facilities in Europe, and at various national institutions. New training facilities at Ar Rustimiyah, near Baghdad, were constructed and are now functioning alongside the new Iraqi military academy. Likewise, NATO nations supplied thousands of tons of weaponry and equipment to the new Iraqi military. From assault rifles to more than two battalions' worth of tanks and several dozen armored combat vehicles, NATO nations have shown that they are firmly committed to helping the government of Iraq. This year we will see a further increase in these efforts to help the new Iraqi democracy.

Closer to home, NATO runs both naval and air missions to protect the security of its members. At sea, Operation Active Endeavor is NATO's ongoing maritime interdiction effort. The operation has led to several critical boardings of suspect vessels and multiple findings of explosives, weaponry and drugs being smuggled on vessels in the Mediterranean. From the air, the NATO AWACS fleet has provided critical monitoring of air traffic during high-profile events such as the 2004 Olympics in Athens.

As importantly, NATO has intensified its armaments cooperation to ensure that the troops deployed in these operations are equipped with the right kinds of technologies and capabilities.

Two years ago, NATO created an ambitious technology program. Ten critical areas were identified to strengthen our collective defense against terrorism, and each is led by a member country. Spain heads efforts to disable homemade terrorist bombs, Germany to develop new counter-terrorist reconnaissance capabilities, Britain to minimize the danger to civilian aircraft from shoulder-fired missiles, Italy to protect harbors from underwater divers with explosives, the U.S. to improve the aerial deployment of special operations forces and equipment, and so on.

This "Defense Against Terrorism" program has already brought results in a short period of time. For example, a new laser system capable of detecting trace amounts of explosives on surfaces (e.g. car door handles) is being prototyped. A novel technique for creating a sonar "wall of sound" as a trip-wire across harbor entrances is also making progress. Bulgaria is now testing new composites to shield helicopters against the blast of a rocket propelled grenade.

That said, while we are moving in the right direction, a significant infusion of expertise, and funding, is needed for NATO to move forward more quickly on devising better technologies. Despite its successes, the program remains underfunded. We also need additional, dedicated test facilities and training ranges where we can experiment with emerging prototypes.

But perhaps our biggest challenge is that of simply getting visibility on all the potentially useful technologies "out there." Across North America and Europe, there are tens of thousands of large and small companies, universities, government institutes and -- in some cases -- garages and hobby shops of inventors, all of whom may have something to offer the fight against terrorism. The inventiveness and creativity of our private sectors is one of the greatest assets NATO nations have in the fight against terrorism. We need to do a better job of tapping into that creativity.

In the United States, through the Pentagon's Technical Support Working Group, the federal government solicits proposals from a broad segment of the private sector on counterterrorism technology. This group has had remarkable successes. But the group still is limited in the people it can reach, restricted principally to North America and a few partner countries.

NATO needs this kind of solution which would let its member nations reach out to the private sector, across national boundaries, for counterterrorism technology. For instance, the U.S. Department of Homeland Security recently solicited industry proposals on 26 specific technologies such as small, portable masks for law enforcement officers to help them escape suddenly contaminated areas. I am sure that there will be dozens of ideas on how to manufacture these masks. But who knows what other innovations and capabilities are out there in Europe, in someone's hobby shop? * * *

When NATO's 26 armaments chiefs meet in Brussels this spring, they will sit down to review NATO's counterterrorism technology efforts. My hope is that they will come armed with ideas on how to press ahead in the fight against terrorism. Our first challenge will be to review all the operations to see where additional support to NATO troops is urgently needed. Certainly we need to expand, intensify and better fund the ongoing technological program of work. But perhaps more importantly, we need to create a NATO-Technical Support Working Group on a trans-Atlantic scale.

Bin Laden TV (WSJ)

By Jonathan Stevenson

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2006

Last week's videotaped missive from Osama bin Laden -- his first in over a year -- confirmed several things that we knew or at least suspected: that he is isolated, besieged and physically weak. More substantively, it continued a general pattern, but with significant variations. After the Madrid bombings in March 2004, bin Laden attempted to isolate the U.S. by offering to refrain from attacking its European allies if they withheld assistance in any American strategic endeavor affecting Muslims. In the recent tape, he asks the U.S. itself to stand down in Iraq and Afghanistan in exchange for a "long truce." As with the Madrid tape, bin Laden has made an offer that he knows will be refused.

Why the truce offer? By merely indicating a desire for the peaceful reconstruction of Afghanistan and Iraq, he may secure broader Muslim support. In turn, he might erase any political dividends, in the Muslim world, accruing to the West on account of its state-building efforts.

Although the tape was made before the qualifiedly successful Predator strike on high-level al Qaeda operatives in Pakistan, its release following that attack still could prevent actual or potential recruits from becoming demoralized. By way of the threat of planned terrorist attacks on U.S. territory, the tape could constitute a "strategic communication" aimed at shifting U.S. energies away from Iraq and Afghanistan and toward homeland security. Such reallocation would be to al Qaeda's advantage in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Bin Laden's démarche has other, more opaque, designs. In threatening the U.S. with attacks that are purportedly being planned in Baghdad, and declaring that "our situation is getting better while yours is getting worse," he is making four observations: (1) the U.S. counterterrorism campaign in Iraq is failing; (2) Iraq has indeed replaced Afghanistan as a training ground for jihadi terrorists and a center for global (not just local and regional) operational terrorist planning; (3) American homeland security is ineffective; and (4) bin Laden, despite his besiegement in (most likely) the tribal areas of Pakistan, still has strategic control over the jihadist movement in general, and over Abu Musab al-Zarqawi -- leader of al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, the foreign component of the Iraq insurgency -- in particular. The bad news is that bin Laden's first two points appear valid, the third at least partly true, and the fourth untrue but largely irrelevant to the counterterrorist effort.

The fact that violence in Iraq has continued unabated since the elections indicates that despite a more conciliatory attitude on the part of many Iraqi Sunnis, a critical sufficiency of those engaged in political violence remain unmoved. Whether apparent infighting between foreign jihadists and Iraqi nationalist insurgents will significantly compromise the overall effort is uncertain. Moreover, evidence has emerged that Iraqi Sunnis are increasingly susceptible to Islamist radicalization, and that insurgents blooded in Iraq itself are more interested in operating outside Iraq (e.g., in Jordan).

Most likely bin Laden's hope is that his wider audience -- especially potential recruits -- will read U.S. beleaguerment as proof of al Qaeda's might. In suggesting that he himself maintains a significant degree of command over far-flung assets, he wants the world to believe that he and al Qaeda possess concentrated power that has not substantially diminished since 9/11. It would seem, then, that he is still in a position to dictate his own strategic agenda. But this is not the case. Although he and his right-hand man, Ayman al-Zawahiri, appear to have some differences with Zarqawi, there is little evidence that they have been able to influence his tactics. And Spanish and British authorities have been unable to find an operational link between al Qaeda's core leadership and the European jihadists who bombed Madrid and London.

The overarching significance of bin Laden's counterfactual assertion of authority, however, is how little it matters. It has long been clear that al Qaeda was forced to disperse and atomize after the Afghanistan intervention in late 2001. For some time thereafter, though, it appeared that al Qaeda middlemen remained integral to local operations. The situation changed after Madrid, and London reinforced it. The clearest lesson of those bombings was that jihadis were increasingly homegrown. Indeed, the emerging pattern is for diaspora Muslims (especially European ones, alienated from host and home country) to seek identity in the ummah, the "universal community" of believers. In that community, bin Laden's narrative of Islam's humiliation, and its need to respond with violence, flourish. Accordingly, recruits to the jihad can be moved to politically and religiously motivated violence regardless of his personal fate or actions.

In this light, it is tempting to dismiss bin Laden's offer as a haughty act of desperation, or an effort to buy time, as terrorist cease-fire proposals often are. A more nuanced extension of this logic would be that he is explicitly dialing back his ambition of a global caliphate and would now settle for a limited U.S. stand-down, which could help render his demands moderate enough to become subject to at least tacit accommodation. Such thinking would be wishful, and not much more. Even if he really wanted to work toward coexistence, he wouldn't be able to deliver his end of the bargain precisely because he no longer enjoys close operational control over most of those he inspires. His word could be countermanded by Zarqawi, by a Moroccan in Spain, or by a British Pakistani. Quite simply, bin Laden's ideology and résumé have become bigger than the man himself.

To Muslim Ears, Bin Laden's Words Carry Different Meaning (USAT)

USA Today, January 23, 2006

Osama bin Laden is almost certainly hiding in a cave somewhere in wild, western Pakistan. He has a $50-million bounty on his head — not exactly something that encourages him to trust those around him. He can't touch a cell or satellite phone for fear it will give away his location. He is isolated.

Yet last week he managed to get a new and bizarre audiotape aired on his favorite TV station, Al-Jazeera. It was the first time in more than a year that the world has heard from him. In it, he threatened the USA but offered a vague, conditional truce. The tape raised an interesting, and increasingly perplexing, question: What power, exactly, does the terrorist leader, who is likely living much as a cornered animal, have?

To non-Muslim ears, bin Laden's message was clumsy and easy to dismiss. Quite apart from grandiose declarations the USA is destined to "loss and shame forever," for example, and his off-base descriptions of U.S. anti-war opinion polls and their meaning, who could seriously consider the offer of a truce? His message echoed a similarly crude bin Laden attempt to influence a vote against President Bush before the last U.S. election, as well as earlier truce offers to European countries if they withdrew from Iraq.

But to Muslim ears — and here is the problem — the same words sound very different. Bin Laden spoke in terms steeped in Islamic tradition. The truce that he offered, for example, recalls great past leaders, including the prophet Mohammed, who offered one in his battle with the Quraysh tribe that he eventually defeated. Bin Laden's aim was to give himself the stature of a leader — specifically the leader who can realize the Muslim dream of establishing a caliphate, or worldwide Muslim superstate. And though it might seem ludicrous for a man on the run to pit himself against the most powerful nation in history, for many Muslims it isn't.

Bin Laden's inspirational power can't be quantified like missile strikes and battles. But it's evident in the waves of recruits for suicide bombings in Iraq and, increasingly, in Afghanistan. It's in surveys that show Muslims increasingly seeing the war on terror as a war on Islam.

The most effective way to strike back is to help stoke a war within, not against, Islam. Many Muslims do not want to follow the medieval version of Islam that bin Laden promotes. Yet many U.S. policies and practices — notably the ill-considered war in Iraq and the government's weak reaction to torture there — played into bin Laden's effort to cast the fight as a clash of civilizations.

Bin Laden is a mass murderer with the blood of thousands of Americans on his hands, and he promises to kill more. His capture or assassination should remain a priority. But the power of his message, too, has to be killed off. That requires an equally potent message that leads Muslims away from the common perception that the United States is the cause of their problems.

Bin Laden's message offered nothing useful for Americans. Its value lies only in reminding us that Muslims are reacting to our messages in much the same way.
